AND PROTECTION ACT, 1995LOI DE 1995 SUR LA PROTECTION
ET L'AMÉNAGEMENT DU TERRITOIRE

Consideration of Bill 20, An Act to promote economic growth and protect the environment by streamlining the land use planning and development system through amendments related to planning, development, municipal and heritage matters / Projet de loi 20, Loi visant à promouvoir la croissance économique et à protéger l'environnement en rationalisant le système d'aménagement et de mise en valeur du territoire au moyen de modifications touchant des questions relatives à l'aménagement, la mise en valeur, les municipalités et le patrimoine.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Seeing a quorum present, I call the meeting to order.

Mr Ernie Hardeman (Oxford): After further consultation, the government is still of the opinion that the 90 days in Bill 20 is appropriate rather than extending to 120 days. If an application is not proceeding and local council is not in the process of making a decision, we do not feel it appropriate that the applicant should have to wait 120 days before they would be allowed to appeal it to the Ontario Municipal Board. We feel that if the application was proceeding, it would be to the advantage of all concerned not to proceed with the appeal, but we do think the option should be there if things were not proceeding in the appropriate manner. So we will not be supporting the amendment.

The Chair: Any further discussion on that motion?

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Prescott and Russell): You say that the developer will have to proceed with the appeal to the OMB, but you have to remember that it is going to incur some costs to the municipality to go to the OMB. This is what we're looking at. If the municipality has to hire a consultant and then hire planners to be in front of the OMB after, it's going to be a cost added.

One thing I said yesterday is that most of the municipalities have a bylaw that has a set fee for a zoning amendment or official plan amendment. They will have to come up with a new bylaw to change the fee or change the text within their bylaw that if it goes to the OMB, additional costs will be added to the bill.

Ms Marilyn Churley (Riverdale): Mr Lalonde makes a very good point, and it was made yesterday. For what reason does the minister not want to reconsider this? I mean, he makes a very good point, and obviously government members felt as well that a good point was being made here. Perhaps you explained it in your opening remarks about this, but I still don't understand why you're not willing to consider this.

Mr Hardeman: As to the cost of the application or the cost to the municipality of going to the Ontario Municipal Board, the cost of doing that would be identical whether it was done at the 90-day deadline or whether it was done at the 180-day or the 120-day deadline, for that matter. The reason the government feels it inappropriate to extend that is that we believe that in situations where council is not prepared to make a decision, 90 days for seeing whether they are or are not going to do that is sufficient time.

In those situations where the process is under way but is being delayed for certain studies or certain things that the planning department is doing that they could not accomplish in the 90 days, there would be absolutely no benefit to anyone requesting to go to the OMB because they have reached a 90-day deadline. They would in all probability carry on in that process to reach a conclusion so council could make a decision. There would be no benefit to anyone to taking a no decision from council and going to the Ontario Municipal Board unless they were convinced that they could not proceed in a timely fashion with the local municipality.

We see this as a way of shortening the time frame but not really penalizing anyone in the process.

Mr Lalonde: In the past, some municipalities had a hard time to meet those 180 days, and I agree with the PA, Mr Hardeman, that probably a municipality didn't proceed fast enough; they just kept putting it to the side. But cutting it down by half, 50%, from 180 days to 90 days, we think is going a little bit too far.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Those contrary? I deem the amendment to fail.

I believe there were successful amendments to section 9, so I'll put the question. Shall section 9 carry as amended? All those in favour? Contrary? That section carries.

Seeing no amendments put forward for sections 10 through 12, are there any comments, questions or suggestions for sections 10 through 12?

Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour that sections 10 through 12 carry? Contrary? Those sections carry.

Are there any comments, questions or suggestions regarding section 13?

Mr Hardeman: I move that clause 22(1)(a) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"(a) forward a copy of the request and the information and material required under subsection (4) to the appropriate approval authority, whether or not the requested amendment is exempt from approval; and."

Ms Churley: Okay, tell us what that means.

Mr Hardeman: This is a consequential amendment to remove the phrase that the prescribed information is "required by council due to changes under subsection (4)." The current provision provides that upon receipt of a request to amend the official plan, the council shall forward the prescribed information material that a council may require by bylaw under subsection 22(4) to the approval authority. The provision that council may pass a bylaw before it can require the proponent to submit the prescribed information and material is to be removed from subsection 22(4) because it may give the erroneous impression that council can add to the prescribed information by bylaw. The provision will specify that the proponent must submit the prescribed information and material to council on a private official plan amendment whether or not the council passes the bylaw. The submission of the prescribed information will trigger the time period for the right of appeal to begin.

In simple terms, the prescribed information will be in the bill as that which is designated by the minister. The municipalities will not be able to increase the prescribed information which triggers the time starting for an appeal. When an applicant puts in an application with the ministry-prescribed information the clock starts to tick. The municipality cannot add information to that list and delay the starting of the time frame from the introduction of the application to the appeal period.

Ms Churley: To be even more simplistic on this, can you give me an example, a very concrete example of a situation where that could happen and delay things? I don't quite understand where this is coming from.

Mr Hardeman: As the minister has prescribed this certain group of criteria that has to be met to be a completed application, the municipality may decide that it would require more on that application to make an educated decision on that application. If it was a development application, it may require a market study for council to adequately make a judgement on that application. That would not be necessarily a required criterion in the list that the minister has prepared. This is to make sure that the time starts when they file the original application with the prescribed information, not with that information that the municipality has prescribed beyond that.

Ms Churley: So within that time frame they can prescribe, but after that deadline that's it?

Mr Hardeman: No. The prescribed information from the minister is the only thing required by any applicant to start the clock on an application. The municipality may require more information in the process of reviewing the application, but the time lines are ticking on.

Ms Churley: But the clock starts there; I see.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? I deem the amendment to pass.

Are there any further amendments to section 13? I think the NDP one is the next one there.

Ms Churley: I move that clause 22(1)(b) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be amended by striking out "65 days" in the first line and substituting "120 days."

This is again dealing with time frames, in this case for municipalities to deal with applications to amend the official plans. The current legislation provides that it must be referred to a public meeting after 120 days. The reduced time frame neither permits adequate study of major changes to directions established by the municipal council, nor does it recognize official plans as documents with some degree of permanence. It assumes official plans can be constantly amended as though they have no long-term substance. While the change might seem to help streamline the process, once again it's going to lead to difficult and time-consuming debates about where exactly the municipality is headed. So time will be lost, not saved. I think it's important that we bring the time frame back to 120 days to permit for greater public participation.

This comes back to the same argument I've made time and time again throughout this bill and that you'll hear more of, that the public is not the problem here. Public participation, in my view and I think the public's view and I'll bet you in many municipalities particularly a developer's view—things get held up at the bureaucratic level constantly. Reducing the time for public participation is just not fair. It's not getting at some of the real problems.

This is a case where once again throughout the bill you're going to find out that you're going to lose time, you're not going to save time, so on both counts: You're reducing time for public participation, and it's not going to save time. If you look at it from the proper perspective here and see what's really going on, you wouldn't do this. I assume the parliamentary assistant is going to dispute that, and we're not going to agree.

I think Mr Sewell made it very clear after his extensive consultation and his really profound knowledge of how the system works and where the problems are. He has a tremendous amount of expertise in the area that we really should pay attention to. He's convinced that time will be lost here, not saved. I don't know if those comments were taken into account at all by the government when it looked at reducing this time frame.

Mr Hardeman: I just want to point out that the time frame that's being proposed to be extended is in fact the time frame to get to a public meeting. It is not an opportunity to prohibit or to eliminate the public participation; it's the time line between which a private amendment to the official plan is proposed and the time which the municipality has in order to call the public meeting for that public participation. So we think that the time line of the proposed time is appropriate.

Mr Gilles Bisson (Cochrane South): With respect, parliamentary assistant, I think you're looking at clause 22(1)(b); we're talking about clause 22(1)(a) here. Clause 22(1)(a) is the "forward a copy of the request and the information and material...under subsection (4)."

No, I apologize. I'm looking at the government motion. Excuse me.

Mr Hardeman: Thank you. I think my former remarks stand.

Mr Bisson: They do.

Mr Hardeman: It is the time frame between the time that the clock started to tick on the amendment and that the municipality must hold a public meeting for public participation.

Mr Bisson: Okay. Now we're on the clause that I did want to make a comment on. Just for clarification first, clause 22(1)(a) we haven't dealt with yet, have we? The government motion.

The Chair: Clause 22(1)(a)?

Ms Churley: Yes.

Mr Bisson: Is has been dealt with?

The Chair: It was passed.

Mr Bisson: I forgot to turn the page. Very good. Thank you.

On the subsection 22(b) in regard to the 65 days, the question I would have is, what was the notice requirement pre-Bill 163 for the public meeting?

Mr Hardeman: I'm informed that it was 90 days in 163.

Mr Bisson: Okay. You're saying it went from 90 days to 120 days under Bill 163.

Mr Hardeman: My apologies; a correction. It was 120 days.

Mr Bisson: So it stayed at 120 days. I thought so. The point here is that often, as you well know, when amendments to the official plan are sought because of a particular development, one of the problems that we encounter is that there's always somebody in the area who has views one way or another that they'd want to express in regard to the particular amendments that are being sought. My experience has been, in the communities I have dealt with—allowing the proper amount of time for the public to be involved, number one, but more importantly, I would say for the public to be informed only adds and strengthens the planning process to make sure that people have an adequate opportunity to find out that the public meeting is going to happen so that they're able to prepare themselves to go there, they're able to take a look at what the council is proposing on behalf of the applicant and are able to come together to that meeting with some understanding of what the issue actually is.

I'm saying the gist of all this is that if you have a public meeting and it's where people are just coming in off the mark—"I just heard about it two days ago and I'm upset and I'm coming down in order to voice my opinion"—compared to trying to get people to come in with as much information as possible so that you can have a logical debate and a good presentation, I think the time required under 163 was not all that onerous at 120 days. I think it only strengthens the process. People are able to come into that meeting much more informed. Often what happens, and I don't know why this is—it's just the way it is—most people tend not to find out about these things until fairly late into the process. I worry somewhat that the 65 days is going to be inadequate in allowing the public sufficient time to get prepared to come to the meetings and even to find out about them.

The question I'm asking the parliamentary assistant is—I asked you this question earlier yesterday—do you believe that the planning process could be made stronger by greater public involvement?

Mr Hardeman: No, I don't believe that the planning process would be strengthened by removing public involvement.

Mr Bisson: That's not what I asked. What I asked was, do you not believe that the planning process is made stronger by public involvement?

Mr Hardeman: I believe Hansard will show that I did answer that question quite directly yesterday.

Mr Bisson: And the answer is?

Mr Hardeman: Yes.

Mr Bisson: If your answer is yes, to have the public involved, number one, you need to have sufficient time for them to find out; and number two, to get ready so that they can properly understand the issue coming into the meeting. I'm trying to say to you that I've seen examples in my community where people have found out, even though the requirements—that's why I asked the pre-163 issue. I can think of two projects, amendments to subdivision plans, where people came to the meeting, finding out maybe a week or two before, and that was at 120 days. How are they going to find out within 65, is what I'm saying.

Mr Hardeman: In the process, if the time lines would be changed—this is the time line that requires municipalities to hold that public meeting—if you lengthen that time line, it does increase the length of time involved in the planning process, but the notification times would also in all probability be extended. So the length of time that the public would have to participate, coming into the public meeting, would in all probability not be lengthened. They would find out about the application at the three-month interval as opposed to finding out at the one-month interval, and the public meeting would be held approximately the same distance from the notification and the public meeting. So we feel this is an improvement in the time line of getting an application approved.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): It's a problem for the public, but the background problem, I emphasize again for everybody concerned, is that all levels of government, including municipalities, are reducing staff. While I recognize we're talking about something more in the public domain here, the preparation time available to the municipality is also reduced. I'm not convinced, with the drastic cuts we're seeing in the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing and other ministries, in the municipalities themselves and in the various agencies, boards and commissions, that we're wise in moving this time line as your bill suggests to the extent that you have suggested. There may have been a compromise somewhere along the line that you might have found, but this is a fairly substantial movement on that date. I think you're going to find problems arising as a result of this, which is why I support the motion.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question.

Ms Churley: Recorded vote.

Ayes

Bisson, Bradley, Churley, Lalonde.

Nays

Baird, Carr, Fisher, Galt, Hardeman, Murdoch, Smith.

The Chair: I deem that amendment to fail. Any further amendments?

Mr Bisson: We have another motion, section 13 of the bill, clause 22(2)(b) of the Planning Act.

I move that clause 22(2)(b) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be amended by striking out "65 days" in the first line and substituting "120 days."

I guess it's the same argument. The government voted in opposition to the first amendment. They're obviously going to vote opposed to this one.

Just by way of example, I'll give you an idea of what we're trying to get at here. The city of Timmins, in preparing to build a second river crossing across the Mattagami River was quite a public process. I would say all the people knew about that project for some 10 years. It was sought after first of all under a Conservative government, through Alan Pope as our sitting member at the time, it was sought through the Liberal government, it was sought finally through the New Democrats, and I'm glad to say we were able to deliver it.

The point I'm getting at here is that even though this was a very public process where there was hardly anybody who did not know about this project going forward, it required a change to the official plan because of where they wanted to put the access roads coming into the bridge. They needed to change it because they were going to cut right across what was on the official plan a subdivision, so there needed to be some changes from residential to industrial, if I remember correctly.

That's why I asked the question a little while ago of how long it was pre-163. The notifications that were given to the public in order to come to the meeting, in order to take a look at them—if I remember correctly, that meeting took place shortly before I was elected, or just after 1990. There were I would say a lot of people who showed up at that meeting, but what really struck me was the number of people there who said they had only heard about this particular meeting within a fairly short period of time a couple of weeks before.

I guess I come back to the same point again. With such a public project, which everybody knew was going on and didn't find out about the notice of the meeting until two weeks before the 120-day deadline, I wonder how well people are going to be prepared to do that within 65. I would repeat the argument from Mr Bradley, that with the reduction in staffing that municipalities are going to have to do to their planning departments and to their municipalities overall because of provincial cuts, they're really not going to have the staff to be able to deal with this adequately, to do the kind of outreach that happened at that time, where the city of Timmins was very proactive in getting the public involved.

I didn't convince you?

Mr Hardeman: As the member said, I think it's quite evident that this is an identical motion to the previous one as it relates to planning boards as opposed to council. I point out that in a previous amendment, to the act, that was dealt with, we have included the fact that we have a 20-day period where the official plan amendment must be presented to the public prior to the meeting. I think that part of it makes this system far improved over Bill 163, where though there were longer days to call the public meeting, no information was mandated to be given to the public to help in their deliberations prior to that public meeting.

Though the time frames are somewhat shorter, we think that the involvement of the public will be increased and their ability to deal with the application will be increased because they will be provided with information prior to that meeting.

Mr Bisson: I hear what you're saying, but I think it's not a bad idea with regard to the other amendment you put forward with regard to requiring the information that has been put forward.

I just want for the record to show that I really believe you need to have, and that for good planning to happen there has to be, public participation, and to have public participation, you need to have adequate time to get people to organize and mobilize and come to those meetings.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? That amendment fails.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 22(4) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Prescribed information

"(4) A person or public body that requests an amendment to the official plan of a municipality or planning board shall provide the prescribed information and material to the council or planning board."

This is a clarification for dealing with the prescribed information, as prescribed by the minister, that it must be provided for the clock to start to tick on an application, that the municipality cannot by bylaw require further information, but the proposal or the private amendment must provide all that required information in its application.

The Chair: Any further comment? All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? That amendment is deemed passed.

Mr Bradley: I move that subsections 22(4) and (5) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Required information

"(4) A council or a planning board may require a person or public body that requests an amendment to its official plan submit such information and material as the council or board considers necessary to determine the matter."

Mr Hardeman: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I believe that's a resolution or amendment totally contrary to the amendment that was just passed.

Mr Bisson: What should have happened is that we should have dealt with the opposition motion first, and then the government motion. I think there's been a bit of a slipup here.

Mr Bradley: What happened was, in our chronologically ordered one, the government amendment came first, so I let the government amendment come first.

Mr Bisson: That's how we ended up that situation.

Mr Bill Murdoch (Grey-Owen Sound): What you're saying is you want to use yours instead of ours.

Ms Churley: Well, the difference is, it gives council discretion.

The Chair: The clerk informs me it can be considered. Mr Bradley.

Mr Bradley: All right, I will proceed with the little speech on it.

This motion allows municipalities to determine by bylaw what constitutes a complete planning application with regard to an official plan amendment. The existing act and the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing can determine in part what constitutes a complete application.

Currently, a complete application as defined does not include enough information for council to make an informed decision on the planning merits of an application. For example, a preliminary storm water management report is not prescribed information for subdivision applications, nor is a soil study if the site was formerly used for industrial purposes.

In such instances, how can a municipality make a sound decision that safeguards the interests of the community and the environment? When presented with an inadequate application, the time limits prescribed in the act will continue to run, and a proponent may then appeal to the OMB if a decision has not being made.

Municipalities must have the authority to pass a bylaw setting out what information is required for a complete application in addition to the legislated and provincial prescribed information. This will ensure better and appropriately local implementation of planning decisions. Neither Bill 20 nor Bill 163 achieve the intent of the complete application content to reduce the number of files contained within the planning system that contain inadequate information and to make it clear to applicants what will be required in the application.

Municipalities were simply asking that municipalities be able to pass an additional bylaw setting out the information that's required for a complete application in addition to what the province prescribes, and I think most municipalities would appreciate that opportunity.

The Chair: Further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Those opposed? I deem the amendment to fail.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 22(6) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be amended by striking out the portion that precedes clause (a) and substituting the following:

"Refusal and timing

"(6) Until a council or planning board has received the prescribed information and material required under subsection (4) and any fee under section 69,"

This is a consequential amendment as a result of the amendment to subsection 22(4), as discussed previously. That amendment clarifies the proponent needs only to submit the information and material prescribed by provincial regulation to trigger the time period for the right of appeal to begin.

Mr Bisson: It's only the prescribed information that's being requested, just be more specific.

Mr Hardeman: Yes, it is.

Mr Bradley: Even though, as the parliamentary assistant points out, this is contrary, or it could be considered to be contrary, to the motion I presented, because it has some merits to it, I'll be supporting it. This is very technical when you get into this. It's not as attractive as the motion that the official opposition suggested, but there is sufficient merit in it that we will support it.

The Chair: Further comment? All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? I deem the amendment passed.

Mr Bisson: I move that subsection 22(7) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be amended as follows:

"1. By striking out "45 days" in clause (a) and substituting "90 days."

"2. By striking out "45 days" in clause (b) and substituting "90 days."

"3. By striking out "90 days" in clause (c) and substituting "180 days."

"4. By striking out "90 days" in clause (d) and substituting "180 days."

I guess this comes back to the work John Sewell did in regard to the extensive consultation that happened at the time leading up to Bill 163, and I think what expert people, more learned in this field than us, had to recommend is that there needs to be sufficient time for the work to be done. What happens is, our amendment would restore the existing Planning Act time frame, after which an appellant for the OPA can bypass council and go right to the OMB. It says that 45 days is not enough, so we need to go back to the 90, or in the case of a planning board, from 90 to 180. This applies where councils have not moved quickly enough to call the public meeting.

Councils need more time to do the job properly. Piling up applications at the OMB ultimately won't save time, it'll just bump the problem up to the next level of government and really deny local democracy to happen when it comes to the work that needs to be done. It seems to me what we're going to end up with is sort of like an automatic referral to the OMB if we don't have sufficient time for the local councils to deal with the application. It's like we've mentioned on a number of occasions, municipalities, it's no big secret, have—the city of Timmins, for an example, has lost over 40% of its provincial transfers over the next couple of years due to provincial cuts.

In talking to mayor and council and administration of the city of Timmins, they know that in the end it's going to mean they're going to have to reduce staff. If they don't have the amount of staff necessary in the planning department to deal with all the applications, it seems to me they are going to be even more pressed to try to meet the time lines set out under what you're trying to do under Bill 20.

We can all support the idea that you want to be able to streamline and make things faster, but if you don't have the staff to deal with the applications, you're going to get quite the opposite happening here, it seems to me. You're going to have people going automatically to the OMB after 45 days on the basis that the planning department hasn't had the time to do the work, and rather than allowing the local council to do their work and try to make local democracy work, you're going to end up with things just automatically being referred to the OMB.

I'd like to know your view on it. Do you recognize that can happen? It probably will most definitely happen.

Mr Hardeman: We do not believe it will increase the applications going to the OMB. We think the time lines are appropriate in dealing with the streamlining of the process, recognizing that if we don't streamline the process and get the applications approved, and encourage development and increasing the economy, we will end up with having to lengthen the time frame, if we're using your analysis, because we will keep going where the municipalities will have to keep laying off more and more people because they do not have the ability to increase development and the growth of their community, as is necessary. There is a holdup in that process and we really are convinced that those time lines and the process have to be streamlined to get development on the move again.

Ms Churley: That's BS.

Mr Bisson: Took the words right out of my mouth.

Ms Churley: I guess that's unparliamentary, isn't it? Must I withdraw?

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): That's that acronym stand for?

Mr Bisson: Bullshit.

Ms Churley: Determine for yourselves. The public participation is not the problem. I keep telling you that. I can assure you this is going to be a problem. I would like to know what you base this figure on. How did the ministry, the minister, the officials, come up with this time frame? Do you have any proof that it's going to work, that the staff are going to be there to do the documentation, the work? What do you base it on?

Mr Hardeman: The time frame is based on looking at the process and trying to find places where the process can be streamlined to increase the ability of the economy to build. I suppose it's fair to say that all numbers are somewhat subjective. Someone has to look at the applications that are presently going through the system and decide where we could reduce the time lines and make the system still as effective as it is today.

I point out that in these time lines the applications are on private official plan amendments. No individual or applicant putting forward a proposal that was being processed but was not quite completed by the deadline would see it to their advantage to appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board and start from square one, so in all probability, if things were progressing but not completed, the applicant would not appeal to the OMB. In applications that are being unduly held up or where an applicant felt there was no ability to see that dealt with in the foreseeable future, it seems appropriate not to wait 90 days as opposed to 45 days. If the application is not proceeding and it is going to end up going to the Ontario Municipal Board, we feel the process and the public would be better served by having that proceed at that time.

Mr Bisson: I'd just come back that if your belief is that you're going to slow down economic development in a community on the basis of moving this from 45 to 120 days, I think you're—

Interruption.

Mr Bisson: I don't know if I'm going to wait for this to stop. I'm used to working in high-noise areas.

Mr Hardeman: It may not be as loud at that end, but I can't hear you at this end.

The Chair: The committee stands recessed for five minutes.

The committee recessed from 0953 to 0954.

The Chair: Let's proceed, shall we? I call the meeting back to order. Mr Bisson, you have the floor.

Mr Bisson: I'm waiting for the parliamentary assistant to get back.

Interruption.

Mr Bisson: I recognize that my good friend from Grey-Owen Sound doesn't find this matter to be very important to the public good, but some of us understand that proper planning is something that's important in this province.

If the parliamentary assistant believes that a clause going from 45 to 120 days or 90 days to 180, depending on the situation, is going to hamper economic development and curtail the municipal tax base, I think you're really mistaken. I make the plea once again that this is an "I told you so" kind of amendment here. What's going to end up happening, and I think you need to realize, is that people will end up bumping things up to the OMB automatically at the 45-day level, rather than trying to work out their differences if they had been given adequate time to do it in the first place. I think you're going to end up with more objections at the OMB by moving in this direction, quite contrary to what you're trying to achieve. We just have that on the record, and I look forward to raising that in the House a couple of years down the road.

Mr Bradley: I would make a similar argument. One of the problems I've found, just from my own personal observation—I don't want to offend anybody personally—that when dealing with the government, the problem is we're dealing with ideology as opposed to practicality. I remember that the Davis administration, when we were sitting in opposition, was very practical on motions of this kind. We're talking about the practicality of this, and your government appears to be ideologically committed to absolutely streamlining, and if anything varies from that, somehow it can't be right.

You have to look in this bill at the practicalities of it in the Planning Act. Although it's unfair to do so, I'd like to hear from the member for Middlesex, who is the only member here, I think, who is a professional planner and who has some expertise and some direct experience, whether he believes—and perhaps he's not in a position to say if it's contrary to government policy; I understand that. But I'd be interested in his observation, if he can make one, as to whether he thinks the time lines the government is suggesting in this legislation can be met by a municipality. You were with London, I believe, Mr Smith. Is it possible to hear from Mr Smith? Perhaps he doesn't want to, and I understand that.

Interruption.

The Chair: It worked last time to call a recess. The committee stands recessed for five minutes.

The committee recessed from 0957 to 1005.

The Chair: I don't think we can wait any longer. I call the meeting back to order. I believe Mr Bradley had posed a question, but as he's not here, I don't know if it's all that apropos.

Mr Bisson: We're still on 22(7), right?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Bisson: To finish what we were saying before, I think what's going to happen here is that over the longer term you're going to get quite the opposite effect from what you're looking for in regard to keeping stuff away from the OMB. If the intent of the bill is to allow the local level of government to deal with planning issues, your idea of going down to 45 days will go contrary to that. What's going to end up happening is that, once the time lines expire, people are automatically going to bump it up to the OMB, not giving the municipality the opportunity to deal with the concerns raised. You know as well as I do that the vast majority of things are dealt with locally when given the chance. This is an "I told you so," as we said a little while ago. We'll talk about this in a couple of years.

Mr Lalonde: I am referring to the submission presented by the county of Oxford council on February 27 in London. I feel they have a very competent planner over there, and they stressed that the time frame was really tight in there. I'm going to read what is written on page 4:

"The purpose of the change to the application processing time frames is to streamline the development approval process. These time frames are tight, particularly when the proposals are large, complex or problematic. Successful implementation of these approval time lines will be dependent upon:

"(1) Proponents providing at the time of the application submission all the information required to adequately access the technical merits of the proposal; and

"(2) The establishment of an efficient and timely administrative process for soliciting comments from all the relevant provincial agencies."

It goes on, and then in the last part of the second paragraph, this is the most important part:

"Unless municipalities have the ability to require that sufficient information necessary to adequately process the application is received when the application is submitted, the abovenoted time frames are unrealistic. Without complete application information submitted up front in the process, municipalities could be forced to refuse applications on the basis of lack of technical merit to achieve the proposed time frames."

I think that part is very important. They could send it back and say, "We don't have enough information." This is going to repeat and repeat again, because I think this is the tool for the municipality to get out of that 90 days as spelled out in the bill.

Mr Hardeman: I would just point out that the government agrees with the statement read into the record in that the time frames are important, and all the participating parties will have to work to achieve those time lines.

I also want to point out that the amendment we're presently dealing with, in reducing the 90 to 45, is the need for municipalities to call a public meeting for the public participation in a private OP amendment. This is not to say that the public involvement can only be in 45 days and from then on someone else will be dealing with it. This is the stipulation that municipalities cannot have a private official plan amendment laying on desks in offices that are not being dealt with, that the applicant has an ability to proceed in an orderly fashion. Whether the municipality supports the amendment or whether they do not, they will be obligated to hold a public meeting and call it on the 45-day process.

The other part of the amendment dealing with the 90 to 180 days again will allow an applicant to appeal an application if it's being unduly held up. We do not see that applicants will be rushing to the Ontario Municipal Board to have decisions made that could've been made at their local municipality 30 days hence. We do not see this as a delay tactic; we see it as a streamlining of the system to get applications moving through the system in a more orderly and timely fashion.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question.

Mr Bisson: Recorded vote.

Ayes

Bisson, Churley, Lalonde.

Nays

Baird, Carr, Galt, Hardeman, Smith.

The Chair: I deem the motion to have failed.

Any further amendments?

Mr Lalonde: Yes, we have one. I move that clause 22(7)(c) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be amended by striking out "90" and substituting "120."

We're coming back to the same reason, just because the time frame is too tight and we say it will be impossible for a municipality to proceed. As I just read a little while ago, a municipality could be forced to refuse the application due to lack of information they would receive at the beginning. This would delay instead of proceeding or meeting the 90-day time frame we have.

Ms Churley: Given that our amendment failed on this, the 180 days, I'd be willing to accept this amendment as a compromise. It does give a little more time, not as much as we had hoped, but hopefully the government will be willing to compromise as well and accept the 120 days, for all the reasons mentioned before.

The Chair: Further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question.

Ms Churley: Recorded.

Ayes

Bisson, Churley, Lalonde.

Nays

Baird, Carr, Galt, Fisher, Hardeman, Smith.

The Chair: I deem this amendment to fail.

Further amendments?

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 22(12) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be amended by striking out "are withdrawn or dismissed by the municipal board" in the second and third lines and substituting "are dismissed by the municipal board without holding a hearing or are withdrawn."

This amendment is just to clarify the process to include "without holding a hearing" as to the notification from the Ontario Municipal Board.

Mr Bisson: Is a hearing presently required? It isn't under 163, is it?

Mr Hardeman: For clarification, adding the words "without holding a hearing" returns it to be identical to what is in Bill 163.

Mr Bisson: Exactly. We like that one.

The Chair: Seeing no further comment, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion? Contrary? Carried.

Further amendments?

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 22(13) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Same

"(13) If all appeals under clause (7)(e) or (f) are dismissed by the municipal board without holding a hearing or are withdrawn, the secretary of the board shall notify the council or the planning board and the decision of the council or the planning board is final on the day that the last outstanding appeal has been withdrawn or dismissed."

This amendment clarifies that this section applies only where the board dismisses an appeal without holding a hearing. Where the Ontario Municipal Board holds a hearing and dismisses an appeal, the OMB's decision is final. The matter does not return to the council or the planning board.

Mr Bisson: Just for clarification, it basically makes it the same as 163. That's what you're doing.

The Chair: Further comment? All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment's passed.

I'll put the question regarding section 13. Is it the favour of this committee that section 13, as amended, shall carry? All those in favour? Contrary? I deem that section passed.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 14 through 18, I'll ask if there are any comments, questions or suggestions to sections 14 through 18. Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of sections 14 through 18? Contrary? Those sections have been carried.

Section 19: Are there any comments, question or amendments?

Mr Bisson: I have an amendment to subsection 19(1) of the bill, subsections 31(3.1) and (3.2) of the Planning Act. I move that subsection 19(1) of the bill be struck out.

This brings us back to the debate of yesterday in regard to apartments in houses. We tried to argue, but not very successfully, that basically the government's biting off its nose to spite its face on this one. On the one hand, you want to allow individuals to increase their investment opportunities, both as an investment and also as a home. Bill 120 provided for that. It allowed people in a legal way not to be blocked by their municipal councils from adding an apartment in a house, if need be, either to be able to afford to buy a new home it or so they are able to move someone in there that they're caring for.

I'll just say it all over again. It is really strange that a Conservative government would take away the opportunity of the individual trying to make a buck. Sometimes this is the only way a lot of working people have an opportunity to make an investment that when they retire, they'll have a few bucks in the bank. I think we can all look at our communities and see how many people we know who retired at age 55, 60, 65 who are able to do so because they have income from an asset such as an apartment building, at first the house they owned that they put an apartment into and eventually rented out and built up some equity, $120,000, $150,000, and put that money towards their retirement. I just can't see why the Tories would not want to go forward with that.

The whole housing strategy the government is putting forward, not only in what you're doing under Bill 120 and what you're doing in the Planning Act by not being consistent with provincial policies that say subdivisions have to have 30% of homes that can be bought by people with 60% of the lowest incomes, but also what you're doing with rent control, what you're doing with the housing protection act, what you're doing with the non-profits—it's all towards a system where if you've got the bucks you'll do fine, and if you haven't got the bucks, you ain't going to do nothing at all. I just find it distasteful for a government to do such things.

Ms Churley: The more I look at this bill and talk to people and consider this particular section—everything to do with secondary apartments, basement apartments—what really strikes me about this section is that it's designed, and it's very unfortunate, to have a disproportionate effect on the poor people in our province, the disadvantaged.

There is a litany of policies and cutbacks that have already been made by this government in the name of a 30% tax cut that will mainly benefit the well-off. They are disproportionately affecting the poor and the disadvantaged, and this is another example. I wish the government members would take a look at the reality of those cuts, their effect on poor people in our province. It really is having a disproportionate effect.

I believe this is going to harm people more at this time in Ontario. More and more people are starting to become aware of that, and I think this will add to that. I think this is going to hurt the government in the long run—not that I object to that, of course; that's part of my goal here. I do object and I do regret, though, that in the process, while the government starts falling in the polls when people see more and more how people are being hurt, the problem is that people really are being hurt. We must not forget, when we sit around these rooms making policy, that there are real people being affected.

This is one of those that is going to add to the disproportionate effect. The price and the sacrifice that poor and disadvantaged people, people who through no fault of their own are out of a job or will be out of a job soon because of the many thousands that this government is going to lay off—I do not see any jobs being created by this government whatsoever while it's in the process of laying people off. At a time when there are going to be more disadvantaged people in our society in Ontario being affected by this government, and while the rich get richer, there is going to be less affordable housing for poor people. I really regret that. It's quite disgusting. That's my view of it. These particular sections that disproportionately hurt the poor—it disgusts me and upsets me, and I think overall it's going to upset the people of Ontario.

Mr Bisson: I just want a last attempt to appeal to government members. I have to ask you, who you are speaking for by opposing Bill 120? You're really speaking for those people who are most well-off in our society. For a lot of people in our communities—John, you know this as well as I do—the only way they can enter into the market is to buy a house and put an apartment in it. Sometimes it's the only way they can get in the market.

It seems to me that as legislators, never mind our political stripes, we have to figure out ways we make an economy that everybody can share in. I think that's the goal of the government—it's certainly the goal of the Conservative Party—and I would say that's the goal of both opposition parties. We want an economy where everybody can participate, and part of the problem here is that you're going to have a lot of people who won't be able to enter the housing market in communities like Ottawa or Timmins by virtue of not being able to afford a mortgage. The only way they can do it is by having an apartment in their house.

You know in Ottawa, as well as I do, if you go to Gloucester or other communities around the Ottawa region, their councils are dead set against people putting apartments in those subdivisions for all the reasons we talked about yesterday. I don't think it's such a widespread problem that the concerns of councils are valid. I think the only way you can do this is to allow the bill to stand forward so councils can't block that. I take it the member wants to say something. I'll just stop at that point.

Mr Baird: This issue is an issue of concern to many of my constituents. I'll tell you, just from the addresses and the neighbourhoods I get them from, they're not from the most wealthy people in my constituency, as you suggested at the beginning of your statement. It is very much an issue to do with zoning and what the local municipality is best able to determine in the interests of the community. These councils aren't some sort of independent body; they are elected by the folks in that community and I think are best able to represent issues of this concern. I would agree with Mr Bradley's comments yesterday with respect to zoning and intensification and the changing aspects of neighbourhoods, that people buy into particular bylaws when they are making what will be, for them, their biggest investment: the purchase of their home.

Mr Bisson: Councils, you know as well as I do, are very influenced by the people most well-off in our communities. The councils I've dealt with over the years tend to succumb a lot easier to the interests of those people who have the influence in the community from an economic standpoint than to the people at the bottom end of the economy. I just think that's false.

I guess what bothers me is the trend of our economy over the last number of years. In fairness to the Conservative reform party here, I wouldn't say this is all your doing. I would say this is something that probably started in the later 1970s, where we started moving from an economy where people were able to participate. Through the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s, if an individual wanted to go into a business and start up a business of some type in order to support himself or herself or the family, it was very easy to do so. The banking policies allowed it, I think the economy allowed it a lot easier in regard to consumers, and what we've seen is multinationals and larger companies over the years really grabbing a larger share of the market, to the point that it's very difficult for the small entrepreneur to get involved in our economy. I think that's a detriment to the economy.

I think an economy only works well when people have access to it, when the average Joe who's working on the plant floor says: "I have an idea. I want to invest the money that I've got and move forward to be able to make a contribution to the economy." That's when the economy works best. I think we're going into an economy where the larger corporations are the ones that control the larger part of the market and it's much more difficult for the average Joe to get in.

So I say this is a small opportunity that we have, at least in the housing market, to allow the individual with not as much money as others to be able to get the share of the economy. Again, I find it surprising that the Tory members wouldn't support this.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Opposed? The amendment fails.

All those in favour of section 19 passing? Opposed? I deem section 19 to pass.

Section 20, are there any amendments, comments or suggestions?

Mr Bradley: This is an amendment that the Liberal Party is proposing. I believe it's the first one in order. It reads as follows:

I move that section 20 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"(4.1) Section 34 of the act, as amended by the Statutes of Ontario, 1993, chapter 26, section 53 and 1994, chapter 23, section 21, is further amended by adding the following subsections:

"Other exceptions

"(9.1) A building shall be deemed to comply with a bylaw passed under this section in all the following circumstances:

"1. The building is used as a residence.

"2. The building was constructed at least 20 years before the bylaw was passed.

"Same

"(9.2) A structure shall be deemed to comply with a bylaw passed under this section in all the following circumstances:

"1. The structure forms part of a building that is used as a residence.

"2. The structure was constructed at least 20 years before the bylaw was passed."

The amendment deals with non-conforming sites. We've had to deal with those as municipal councillors on a number of occasions. It proposes that residential buildings over a specified age, say 20 years, should be deemed to comply with zoning bylaws—for example, a house built in the 1950s that sits back from the street 45 feet instead of the 50 required by present bylaws—in order to significantly reduce the existing workloads of committees of adjustment related to the conformity of older buildings with setback and similar provisions of zoning bylaws.

This would permit alterations and adjustments to receive building permits without having to obtain committee of adjustment approval for historical variations from the zoning bylaw. Again, this would remove an obstacle to affordable renovations and unburden municipalities of a costly and redundant review process.

So the example is you have the old house from many years back and somebody didn't see it and it was built with the 45-foot setback instead of the required 50-foot setback. If you wanted to do anything to that in terms of renovation, under the present legislation you would have to fix up the old non-conforming use, that is, that you're at 45 feet instead of 50 feet. This is saying you don't have to go through that process any more to deal with that portion which is in non-conformity.

I don't know whether the ministry has had a chance to look at that and see if it makes any sense to them, but that is what we're proposing.

Mr Bisson: I just have a point of clarification. For example, let's say that this was to pass and I was to have an apartment in a house that doesn't meet certain safety standards. Does that mean to say that those safety standards that are not met are now deemed to be in compliance with the existing bylaws?

Mr Bradley: It deals essentially with the committee of adjustment problems, where the house—as I say, the example is the house is 45 feet from the street instead of 50 feet from the street, as it should have been. It simply solves that problem so that yes, you have to meet any of the building standards that people have, but you don't have to go through the process of getting the approval now for the 45 feet instead of 50 feet.

Mr Bisson: So the example would be that I had a house and 20 years ago I put an addition on it, and the addition makes the building out of compliance with the regs. That's the kind of stuff you're talking about; you're talking about additions, garages, that kind of stuff that should have got a minor variance.

Mr Bradley: Mostly buildings that were built out of compliance in the first place. I don't know how the ministry feels about that. They may want to look at it. They may feel it's not practical. Is there any response to it?

Mr Hardeman: The government does not support the amendment. The municipalities have the authority to do what the amendment suggests by bylaw at the present time. The interior uses of those buildings are covered by the non-conforming standards within the present bylaws, so the amendment deals with the outer perimeters of that structure and we feel that it's appropriate that the municipality—it would be a local zoning-type situation.

We feel that should be in the local autonomy, should be a decision made by the local municipality, whether they feel it appropriate to give a blanket approval to eliminate the need for a committee of adjustment or to proceed with the committee of adjustment process. We don't believe that should be a provincial statute, imposing that upon the municipalities.

Mr Bradley: So you see it that they could do it as a blanket approval right across the city if they wanted, in all these circumstances, simply deem that across the city, at the local municipality.

Mr Hardeman: Yes.

Mr Lalonde: The municipality definitely could have it in their official plan, this clause, but very few have it. With this amendment here, it would protect those that are in place and in those municipalities that don't have this section in their official plans.

In the past, at the municipal level, we have experienced some problems concerning this. It delays some sales closures because the municipality didn't have that incorporated in its official plan and they have to proceed with a minor variance or also proceed with a zoning change. So this law really would eliminate all the questions that would be brought to the municipal council if it's not indicated in their official plan.

The Chair: Further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? I deem the amendment to fail.

Further amendments?

Mr Bradley: I have another amendment—I thought there was a government amendment in here. Did the government one come before mine, or not?

The Chair: No, yours comes first, Mr Bradley.

Mr Bradley: I move that subsections 34(10.1) and (10.2) of the Planning Act, as set out in subsection 20(5) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Required information

"(10.1) A council may require a person or public body that applies for amendment to a bylaw passed under this section or a predecessor of this section to provide such information and material as the council considers necessary to determine the matter."

That's fairly straightforward, I believe, and I'll leave that with you.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? I'm assuming you two voted in favour of it. I deem the amendment to fail.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 34(10.1) of the Planning Act, as set out in subsection 20(5) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Prescribed information

"(10.1) A person or public body that applies for an amendment to a bylaw passed under this section or a predecessor of this section shall provide the prescribed information and material to the council."

Mr Bisson: That's subsection 20(5)?

The Chair: Subsection 20(5).

Mr Bradley: This is similar to the earlier amendment that you had, that provincially required background must be provided even if there is no local bylaw.

Mr Hardeman: The amendment is identical to deal with the same prescribed information as we dealt with previously for an official plan amendment. We are now dealing with it in the zoning bylaw.

The Chair: Any further discussion? All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment's passed.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 34(10.3) of the Planning Act, as set out in subsection 20(5) of the bill, be amended by striking out the portion that precedes clause (a) and substituting the following:

"Refusal and timing

"(10.3) Until the council has received the prescribed information and material required under subsection (10.1) and any fee under section 69,"

This amendment again is to deal with the delivering of the prescribed information and paying the prescribed fees before the time starts to tick as we approach the time frame for the appeal process.

The Chair: Further comment? All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? I deem that amendment to pass.

Further amendments?

Mr Bisson: This is on subsection 20(11) of the bill, clause 34(25)(a) of the Planning Act. I move that subsection 20(11) of the bill be struck out.

I guess it's fairly simple as far as explanation. What you end up with here is that really you can end up with amendments to the official plan, a developer wanting to go in and do a development in an area where the services haven't yet been put in place and really forcing the municipality to bear the cost of doing such where, quite frankly, they haven't planned to do it at that time.

I recognize that it's a council decision. The council may decide that they want to do that, but the problem is, again it comes back to what we argued a little earlier, that some of the aldermen and some of the councillors tend to be somewhat unable to sometimes say no to a particular developer, and we just think that's not in the light of good planning.

Mr Bradley: The Liberal Party had exactly the same amendment and we believe that there is a compelling case for this amendment being proposed. This motion would re-establish the prematurity tests, the power of the OMB to discuss matters regarding the basis of the prematurity because the necessary public water, sewer, road services in the proposed development are not available or will not be available within a reasonable time.

Municipalities should not have to bear the costs of an OMB hearing where there's clear information that there's no servicing capacity, or in anticipation of when future capacity will be available. Approval without the assurance of servicing gives the developer and prospective purchaser false expectations and it can put pressure on municipalities to finance new development without the benefit of good, comprehensive planning.

This motion, as a matter of fact, is in line with the stated mission of the government to give municipalities more local autonomy. I think it's a reasonable motion. I would have thought that some of the people with municipal experience would have been in favour of this.

Again, I think one of the detriments we have in this committee is—and I know you're going to think I'm trying to be mischievous, but the member for Middlesex is far more expert on some of these issues than I can ever be, planning issues—one of the problems with our system of government when it's so partisan—that is, parties seem to line up—is that it prevents a person who's got some expertise from expressing views which I think would be very helpful to the committee. Sometimes I say things to be mischievous, it is alleged, and this time I'm not. I'm really looking to see. If he said that in many of the cases the government was right, I might say, "Well, okay, I'll go along with that."

I'm just wondering if Mr Smith has been muzzled by somebody over there and I really look at that. Here we have members elected to the Legislature, some from various backgrounds who have some expertise. Heaven knows, if I wanted to know anything about severances, I would ask the member for Grey-Owen Sound. He could tell me all about them. If I wanted to know anything about hockey, I could ask the member for Oakville South.

Mr Baird: Or the escarpment.

Mr Bradley: Or the escarpment. I mean, there are all kinds of things. But when we have people who have some expertise in this area, I wish the government would unleash them. Even if they'd have to vote with the government, it would be helpful to me as a committee member to get through this muddle. So I just leave that on the record.

Mr Bisson: I'm surprised that the member for Middlesex doesn't respond. If people are cynical with politicians and are cynical with the political process, I think it's because of part of what we're seeing right now. Supposedly they're elected as the elected member in their local riding to go to Queen's Park in order to represent them and to bring, first of all, the view of the constituents, but also it's incumbent upon the member to bring forward his or her experience that he or she can bring to a debate. I just would repeat the same comments Mr Bradley makes. I really would like to know what Mr Smith thinks about this and other sections of the bill. Have you been muzzled? I take it the answer is yes.

The Chair: Further comments?

Mr Bisson: If we're not going to get the expert opinion of Mr Smith, I'll give you one example. In the city of Timmins there was an amendment to the official plan to allow a subdivision to go forward somewhere that was premature. What you end up with at times is that—in this particular case the subdivision went forward and was allowed. I don't exactly know how that happened, but it was allowed. What they did was that they allowed the subdivision to go forward with its own internal sewer system. Basically, every lot had a septic bed on these particular lots. They weren't the 50-by-100s. These were half-acre lots that were being put in place, maybe a little bit smaller than that. The water was brought in at a cost to the developer.

I remember at the time of the debate the proponents, people who supported the developer, said, "We're not going to go to the city in order to ask them for the sewers some time after the project is finished." So the developer paid for the water to come in from the city and then paid to develop all of the sewer systems on all of these lots. Lo and behold, two or three years after this thing is built and you've now got, I think, about 20 or 30 homes that are built in that particular subdivision, guess who they came to in order to get money to pay for their sewers? They came to the province. One of the people in 1991 came to me and said: "This thing should have never been allowed to go forward on the basis of water and sewers not being completely installed on the city system. The developer was allowed to put the water forward. We were told that the septic bed that was being installed in our lots was going to be adequate and, as it turned out, it wasn't." It was actually quite a problem.

So the municipality—it was a quite a controversy—had to stir for two or three years figuring out how they were going to pay out of their own pockets as the municipality for the installation of sewer lines about half a mile to the nearest hookup on to that particular sewer system. First of all, we, the province, weren't about to pay because we had said no to that application. Then the municipality was faced with the second problem: The sewer system at that particular end of the community wasn't big enough to be able to take the development that had happened and what future development might happen in that particular subdivision. So I think the interests of the municipality and residents weren't well taken by allowing that particular subdivision to go forward. I think there are a lot of examples of that.

Ms Churley: If I could ask the parliamentary assistant, in Bill 163, if I recall it correctly—

The Chair: You have to speak up.

Ms Churley: Thank you for telling me I have to speak up, but I don't know how many people are listening here.

Mr Bradley: I'm listening.

Ms Churley: Thank you, Jim.

Mr Hardeman: We're all listening.

Ms Churley: Oh, thank you. Look, they're all perking up over there now. Listen.

Mr Hardeman: We always listen to you.

Ms Churley: Bill 163 gave the municipalities the power to turn down applications if they so chose, if those infrastructure aspects weren't there. Why would you not just allow them to make that decision? I don't quite understand why. If, for instance, a municipality has had problems with that in the past, why would you not let municipalities make that decision?

Mr Hardeman: Bill 20 does not attempt to take away any authority that municipalities have had in Bill 163 as it relates to denying an application based on its prematurity because sewer and water service is not available. It also does not take away the ability of the Ontario Municipal Board to turn down that application through the hearing process because of the lack of water and sewer facilities.

Bill 20 puts in place the inability of the Municipal Board to refuse to hear an appeal to a zoning or an application based strictly on the fact that it is premature. The government feels it appropriate that an applicant should have the ability to go before the board and have their day in court, so to speak, on that issue. The prematurity or the availability of sewer and water is one of the criteria that planning applications are and should be judged on. We do not believe that it should be the reason that an application was not heard. We believe it should be part of that hearing process.

Ms Churley: I think that's part of the problem with this. It's such an important part of planning today, especially in trying to curb urban sprawl. I recognize this bill has the opposite effect: it promotes urban sprawl. But let's just suggest for a moment that it is the goal of many people in Ontario to curb urban sprawl. In my view, taking this out will mean that the opportunity for urban sprawl has been opened up even more. That's the problem with this. It seems to me, as I said yesterday about this, that in fact you're going to have more cases going to the OMB because of this, to resolve the matter one way or the other. It just doesn't make any sense whatsoever. I can't understand why you'd do such a stupid thing.

Mr Bisson: Just to clarify, you're basically doing with Bill 20 what was allowed pre-163, if I'm correct. Right?

Mr Hardeman: The answer would be that pre-163 the OMB could not dismiss based strictly on prematurity.

Mr Bisson: That's why I'm saying what you're doing is Bill 20 is returning us on this issue to what it was basically pre-163. The answer is yes. What I'm trying to say to you is that the whole intent of this bill is in order to streamline planning and, at the same time, try to prevent appeals to the OMB that don't need to be there. It seems to me that the government, in its own deliberations through this bill, has agreed that even with 163, and pre-163, there was a problem there, that you had appeals going before 163 that didn't need to be there, that were taking up time with the board. It really meant also that at the same time there were applications that were being made that shouldn't have been made in the first place, that at the local level they should have said, "This can't even be allowed." So you're going to end up here with developers taking a decision of a local municipality not to allow a development to go forward, and automatically you're going to have more cases at the OMB with this.

I have to repeat what my friend from Riverdale, or Riverside—

Ms Churley: Riverdale.

Mr Bisson: Excuse me. I used to live in your riding; I should know.

She said really it doesn't make a whole bunch of sense. Let me ask you this question: What you're specifically trying to do in this bill in regard to the OMB is to reduce the number of appeals going to the OMB, right? This is what you're trying to do here, right?

Mr Hardeman: The removal of the prematurity in Bill 20 is to deal with the issue that prematurity should be decided in the hearing process, not prejudice the whole case based on one criterion that was used in denying the application.

Mr Bisson: That's the other part of the debate. The question I'm asking is simply this: Is it not the intent of the government, through Bill 20, to make sure that we have a minimum number of appeals before the OMB? Isn't that what you're trying to do?

Ms Churley: Streamline.

Mr Bisson: You're trying to streamline and at the same time make sure you don't have, as you put it, frivolous and vexatious applications before the OMB. Isn't that what you're trying to do?

Mr Hardeman: The intent of Bill 20 is to streamline the planning process.

Mr Bisson: And to not have as many appeals to the OMB, right?

Mr Hardeman: One other intent of Bill 20 is to ensure that everyone is being treated fairly and has a right to the system, the same as all other sectors.

Mr Bisson: To make sure the developers are treated fairly I think is what you're trying to say, but you don't want to say it, because if you answer yes to this question, you're going to have to vote with my amendment, I would say. What you're doing with this is, you're going contrary to what you're trying to do with the bill.

I come back to the point that Mr Bradley makes, that the idea of the committee of the whole is so that legislators can have a pragmatic view of what we've heard from submissions before the committee so that then we collectively as legislators, be it opposition or government, can make the bill better, can make it stronger, can make it do what the government wants it to do in the first place.

I don't take any particular pleasure out of this, but it's another "I told you so" clause. You're going to end up with more applications before the OMB that don't need to be there. Sewell recognized that through his work, developers recognized it, planners recognized it, that—

Mr Murdoch: Sewell?

Mr Bisson: Where did you dig this member up from? Bill, you are, I'll tell you—

Ms Churley: Do you mean the member for Grey-Owen Sound?

The Chair: Order.

Mr Bisson: To finish what I'm saying, everything pointed to the fact that there was a problem pre-163 on this particular issue. The Sewell report recommended that applications on prematurity be allowed in order to do away with the problems we were having at the OMB. Everybody agreed that had to be done. I can't understand why you're coming back with this.

Mr Bradley: This makes one suspicious—and one shouldn't be suspicious, I suppose—that this is almost as though a consultant for the developers came in and said to you, "Here's what we want," and that's what we see in the bill. With a couple of exceptions, that's what we see in the bill. It's a bill almost written by the developers. Certainly, I can't think that the officials of the Ministry of Housing would have written this particular bill this way unless given instruction by the government, which obviously they have been.

The reason I say that is, look again at the practical effect. By having an additional number of OMB hearings, that means local planners—as Mr Bruce Smith used to be when he was in London as a planner—have to spend even more time then dealing with these matters that go to the OMB, because the municipality has to be represented at the hearing. The developer will be there large as life, even though there isn't the capacity existing, nor is there likely to be the capacity in the foreseeable future, and planners of the local municipality have to go to the hearing. So it's tying up more of their time on something that really has no particular future.

By allowing the OMB to say, "Look, this is premature; we're not going to hear it," you avoid tying up the limited time of the ever-shrinking staff of each municipality. Now, you may say, "Well, that staff won't shrink." The only way it can't shrink is they have to make sacrifices in other areas, so, "We'll cut the staff at the senior citizens' homes, nursing homes, so we can have more planners to service the developers." The only way they're going to be able to deal with these is if they push more people into the planning department, the engineering department, and take them out of other departments that deal with human beings on a very direct basis with their health and with problems of aging.

Interjections.

Mr Bradley: We're just looking at practicality, people.

Interruption.

Mr Bradley: It stops after a little while, the noise.

The Chair: The Hansard tapes are still recording too. Proceed. Speak loudly into your microphone.

Ms Churley: Okay, I'll yell into the mike. I wanted to add a comment here that some of these issues are, as Mr Bradley was saying, practical planning issues and not partisan. It's just practical in terms of looking at speeding up the process. We have an interest in the opposition as well to speed up the process and cut red tape, and when we point out particular areas like this that we know from our own experience and from our own consultation are actually not going to do that, I don't understand why you don't listen to us and perhaps take it back to the minister responsible and say on a couple—we know you can't run in and out all day long, but every now and then we are actually making some very serious practical points that some of us have had experience in.

We know this. We know this is going to be a problem, and we're being stonewalled. We have the government members sitting over there, some of whom have had experience in this area. It's as though they've been muzzled. I'm starting to feel frustrated, because on some of these issues, I know we're not going to agree. The "have regard for," "be consistent with," basement apartments, we're not going to agree. And part of that is a philosophical, political, partisan difference in views. But in these practical areas, I do not understand why we can't have an intelligent, non-partisan discussion about how to make this bill work.

There is a serious problem with this. We know that. It's not going to work. I would find it quite interesting to have some of the government members who have experience in this area, if they think it is going to work, given their own experience, tell us, given what happened before, how they see it working. Perhaps we can be convinced, but certainly nothing the parliamentary assistant said makes any sense whatsoever. It isn't going to work, and with all due respect, I have not heard an explanation that gives me any comfort whatsoever that this is going to improve the planning process. It is not. And I use the word "stupid" again. This is downright stupid, when you're bringing in a new bill that's supposed to be cutting red tape and cutting down on time, to be bringing in parts of the bill that are actually going to slow it down.

Mr Bisson: Can I ask a question? If I would have brought forward an application, let's say I made application to the city for a development in an area in 1990, under pre-163, and the city said it's premature. I was able to bring them to the OMB, right, as a developer? We talked about that a little while ago.

We had one particular one in a place called Kenogami Sea where there was an application for development for converting what was a trailer park into a different kind of commercial operation. What happened was that the city had said no, it didn't want to allow it to go forward because of the reasons actually spelled out in this particular clause in regard to it wasn't within their official plan to allow that particular development to go forward for a number of reasons, including servicing.

What happened is the developer, because the developer had the bucks, and that's understandable, brought that thing all the way to the OMB. It took like three or four years to get there, because this started about 1989 or 1990 and he finally got there I think in 1994, and finally the thing was turned back. I don't know what he's going to do from there, the point being that the city must have spent on that particular application I would say in the hundreds of thousands of dollars of staff time and legal time to go fight that one before the OMB. I know I was lobbied on both sides of that issue by numerous people in the area, the amount of time myself and my staff spent on that particular issue, not to count what happened in the community itself, for an application that wasn't supported by the official plan in the first place.

It seems to me it would have made more sense to just say at the very outset: "It is not allowed. It is not something that falls within the official plan of the city of Timmins, and let's not waste each other's time here." We ended up there with an application before the OMB that didn't have a chance of being approved. It comes back to what we were arguing with you a little while ago. Why allow that practice to happen?

Just on the point that both Mr Bradley and Mrs Churley raised—

Ms Churley: Ms.

Mr Bisson: Ms Churley—in regard to the issue about the role of the opposition and government members in committee of the whole, I spent, in 1994, a lot of time with Conservative members, the now Minister of Northern Development and Mines, on the sustainable forestry development act, and I can tell you that when the Tories came forward with amendments to our legislation that were practical in nature—not on philosophical, because I agree with the member for Riverdale; on philosophical things we're not going to agree—when the Honourable Mr Hodgson brought forward suggestions to make the legislation work, because what we intended to do and what we told the drafters of the bill to do didn't quite work out in practicality, I can tell you, as a government member, I was out talking to the ministry staff and saying: "Is what this guy saying real? Is he right?" They would say, "Well, yeah, he is right," and I'd say, "Fine, we're going to change it." "Well, you can't do that." "Never mind, we are going to change it." We'd talk to the Minister of Natural Resources, the Honourable Howard Hampton at the time, and we would get the darned thing changed. Because why would we want to allow, as government members, the minister's bill standing in the name of the government to have flaws in it? Then we end up with a bill that doesn't do what we want it to do in the first place, and I would think it would be to the interests of the government members to make sure that they do their jobs in making sure that when Bill 20 comes out, it does what they want it to do.

I'm telling you on this particular clause, this is going quite in the opposite direction. So what's the role of the government members on this committee? Are they here just to vote and support the bureaucrats and the minister? Is that what the role is here?

The Chair: Further comment? Seeing no comment, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment fails.

You can disregard the next amendment because it was identical. I'll put the question regarding section 20. Section 20, as amended, carries? Contrary? Section 20 carries.

Section 21.

Mr Bisson: I move that section 21 of the bill be struck out. This is the apartments in houses issue. Obviously—

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Bisson, but that motion is out of order. You can't move to delete an entire section. The proper course of action is to simply vote against the section.

Mr Bisson: Thank you very much. We will do that.

The Chair: All those in favour of section 21 carrying? Contrary? Section 21 carries.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 22 and 23, are there any comments, questions or suggestions for sections 22 and 23?

Mr Bisson: I do with regard to sections 22 and 23. I ask the question again, what is the role of the government members on this committee? Is it strictly to support the wishes of the minister and the chosen few and the political staff in the Premier's office, or are they here to do their jobs and to make legislation better for the people of Ontario? I want to know.

Ms Churley: No, for the developers. They're here for the developers.

Mr Murdoch: You want to know.

Mr Bisson: Because if this is the case, I don't know why we're even bothering going through the farce of going through the rest of these amendments. We may as well just say to hell with it, quite frankly. We all have better things to do here.

Ms Churley: Bill Murdoch thinks that's a good idea, actually.

Mr Bisson: I would have a suggestion. You should take Murdoch and not put him on committees, because quite frankly he's not playing even in the minimal role that the other members are doing trying to be quiet.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): He knows more about planning than you will ever know.

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, point of order.

Ms Churley: He certainly does know what a severance is.

Interjections.

Mr Carr: —and you're criticizing other people. Don't start the bullshit, Bisson.

The Chair: Mr Hardeman has the floor. Order.

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, on a point of order: I do believe that the purpose of this committee is to discuss and to debate Bill 20 and not for either party or either side of the room to debate the responsibility of other members on the committee.

Mr Carr: I hear you yapping. Don't you criticize people who know more than you do, Gilles. Get up and leave and go back to Cochrane.

Interjections.

The Chair: Order.

Mr Hardeman: On the point of order, Mr Chairman: If a certain member of the committee does not feel that they are spending their time wisely, it is their choice that they are here. All members of the committee are here for their purposes, and if they do not feel that their time is appropriately spent, they can make those decisions on their own. I believe we should be debating Bill 20, not the merits of what other members of the committee are here for.

Mr Bisson: I would say on Bill 20 the point of committee of the whole is in order to take a look at the sections of the bill in order to make sure that the bill does what the government intends it to do. I just ask, what's the role of the government members? I've never seen government members on a committee be so quiet as what we're finding here in regard to their views on particular sections.

The Chair: I would ask all members to direct their comments to the sections of the bill under discussion, and, Mr Carr, I would ask you to withdraw your one unparliamentary phrase.

Mr Carr: I will not withdraw it.

Ms Churley: Say BS then.

Mr Carr: I believe in everything. You cannot criticize that member, Gilles. You can disagree, but do not criticize a man who knows more about it and has given more to the planning of this. You might disagree, but that man knows more about planning than you will ever know.

Mr Bisson: Mr Chair, just on a point of order.

The Chair: No, no. Mr Bradley's next.

Mr Bisson: On a point of privilege: I certainly don't want to offend Mr Murdoch—

Mr Carr: Well, you did.

Ms Churley: Let him speak for himself.

Mr Bisson: Listen, I certainly don't want to offend Mr Murdoch, but understand what we're trying to say here. I'm not going to go into the whole debate again. We would just like government members to participate in the process.

But I do believe there was an unparliamentary comment that was made by Mr Carr and I would ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr Baird: Did the honourable member not make the same comment yesterday in telling us what the acronym that the member for Riverdale used was?

Mr Bisson: Check Hansard. It wasn't raised at the time, and check Hansard. If it was, I will withdraw it. I have no problem with saying that. I ask the member from Oakville to do the same.

The Chair: Mr Carr, would you please consider withdrawing that one word.

Mr Carr: In the interest of peace I will—well, first of all, before I go through it, just refrain from criticizing individuals. To keep the peace, I will withdraw.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Carr. Are there any further comments regarding sections 22 or 23? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the favour of this committee sections 22 and 23 carry? All in favour? Contrary? Sections 22 and 23 carry.

Section 24.

Mr Bradley: I have an amendment to section 24. Again, I believe this amendment to section 24 is most helpful, and I'll explain in a moment, after I read the amendment.

I move that section 24 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"(4) Subsection 41(10) of the act is repealed and the following substituted:

"Notice and enforcement of agreements

"(10) The applicable municipality may enforce an agreement entered into under clause (7)(c) or (8)(b) against the owner and, subject to the Registry Act and the Land Titles Act, each subsequent owner of the land,

"(a) if the agreement is registered against the land to which it applies; or

"(b) if the agreement is recorded by the municipality in the same place that it records information about the zoning status of properties.

"Notice and enforcement of approvals and conditions

"(10.1) The applicable municipality may enforce the terms of an approval under subsection (4) and the conditions imposed under subsection (7) against the owner and, subject to the Registry Act and the Land Titles Act, each subsequent owner of the land,

"(a) if the terms and conditions are registered against the land to which they apply; or

"(b) if the terms and conditions are recorded by the municipality in the same place that it records information about the zoning status of properties."

Let me briefly explain why I want to see this motion carry. The issue is this: how to make binding site plan approval not only the developer who seeks the site plan approval in the first place, but also all subsequent owners and mortgagees.

Municipalities should be given two options re site plan approval enforcement: registering against the land to which it applies, that is, registering the agreement on title; or recording the approval and conditions with the zoning status of properties by the municipality. This is a simpler, less costly, less time-consuming alternative to the present system of preparation and registration of agreements regarding site plan approval.

This is a problem, I know, and some municipalities have expressed this concern about the ability to enforce these site plan agreements on the people who own the property later on or the mortgagees. Anybody who sat on a municipal council has to go through these problems from time to time; where the original owner may have been in compliance and may have been cooperative with the municipality, subsequent owners and mortgagees are people who have simply not lived up to those obligations.

My amendment I hope is a practical solution to this. I'd be interested in the reaction of the ministry, whether it believes that this would be helpful to the municipalities or whether it believes it would not be helpful.

Mr Hardeman: The government will not be supporting the motion. Site plan agreements bind subsequent owners of land and consequently affect interest on the land. Given this effect, agreement should be registered on title to the land to give affected individuals fair notice. Land owners should not be obligated to conduct a zoning bylaw search to determine if there are any outstanding obligations relating to the land. Cost and time efficiency may not be available for subsequent land owners or other individuals who simply wish to determine if there are any outstanding obligations relating to the land.

A search can be done in the registry office on the same day for $5. If a copy of the agreement is required, it costs 50 cents per page. Currently, a search with the city costs $60, requires a written request and takes two to three days for a response. If the Planning Act is amended to allow municipalities to have an alternate method of keeping records of these agreements, municipalities could charge any amount they see fit to individuals requesting this information, and there is no obligation to make the agreement available on the same day as requested.

An amendment may eliminate the opportunity for subsequent owners to have notice of site plan agreements affecting their land if they do not know that both a title search and a search of the municipality's zoning records could be required. Currently, agreements and other instruments affecting the land are registered on title. By recording site plan agreements in an existing zoning recording system, the city is treating them as if they were like zoning bylaws. These agreements, however, are quite different from the zoning bylaws as they impose conditions on land owners which a zoning bylaw cannot do. A more likely comparison is a subdivision agreement which must be registered on title in order to bind subsequent owners.

An amendment could introduce an inconsistent system varying from municipality to municipality across the province. Some site plan agreements would be registered on title and others would require a zoning bylaw search. The government does not deem it appropriate for individuals to not know which system was in place across the province.

Ms Churley: I must admit that I haven't paid a whole lot of attention to this section in the bill. It seems a bit technical, although I'm concerned that it may have wider implications than I'm aware of here. It seems to me to be a minor change, but you seem to make it more major than I thought it was. It's my understanding that this amendment requires agreements with a developer to provide amenities to be recorded by a municipality in a publicly accessible place. Is that the difference? I don't know which one of you can answer that.

Mr Bradley: Mr Murdoch might be able to.

Ms Churley: He's the expert. Mr Murdoch has, according to Mr Carr, this great wealth of knowledge on the Planning Act. I wonder if he could, because of his knowledge, explain the difference, because it is quite technical. I would ask the Chair if—

Mr Murdoch: You go ahead, Ernie. You're the parliamentary assistant.

Mr Hardeman: The concern of the government, first of all, is the inconsistency. The system is available in Toronto today. It is not available in the rest of the province. The majority of the province would still be registering these agreements on title. It would be very difficult for an individual or anyone wishing to know whether there were impediments to the title of the land if in some areas it's registered with the municipality through their zoning process and in other areas it's in the registry office. So for consistency, we believe we should not pass a law that says that in some areas they can do it in one way and in some areas they can do it in another way.

Ms Churley: This question around consistency, I again find you're not at all being consistent in where you consider you should be consistent and where you don't need to be. It's okay in some municipalities, for instance, to have different laws about basement apartments. That's one example where you don't mind inconsistencies.

I'm not so sure that in this case the inconsistencies would cause any harm, why you couldn't have where possible, where available, a difference. What harm would it cause? Would it delay a process somehow? I don't see the reasoning there. I admit I'm not really knowledgeable about this aspect, but it appears to me on the surface that it wouldn't cause any difficulties.

Mr Hardeman: As it relates to the comparison of apartments in homes and this amendment, the information that would be created by removing the right of accessory apartments will be the type of information that is and always has been available through the zoning process. Everyone involved in that process would know that they would look to the municipality for that information.

A site plan agreement, as we're talking about in this, if an individual from—just to pick a place—southwest Oxford were to come into Toronto and had sufficient financial resources and were to purchase a property, he would in this case look in a different area for the site plan information than he would if he purchased that property in Oxford county.

Having said that, it's quite possible that they would not do that, that they would end up purchasing property and they did not know everything that was on title. In the process of searching title, you would find that information as it's registered in the registry office. In this process, you would not find it. You would have to go to city hall to find that information. You may already own the property when you find that out. So I think to protect the public, it requires a uniform system as to where this information would be available.

Mr Bisson: Just for clarification, presently outside of the city of Toronto the practice is that that information is kept by the municipality?

Mr Hardeman: In all areas, to legalize this type of agreement, it must be registered on title. In the city of Toronto, my understanding is that they have another system that registers it on the property within the municipal structure.

Mr Bisson: So in regard to the site plan, the site plan is on my title of property? I'm asking the question.

Interjection.

Mr Bisson: Then I'm not quite clear what the Liberal amendment is trying to do here. You're trying to set up a dual system?

Mr Hardeman: We did have a presentation to the committee structure from the city of Toronto requesting that this be added to the bill, to deal with how they are presently registering the site plan agreements. It seems to be working very well. It's the age of technology; it's working well in Toronto.

The question is, under the present statutes of Ontario, whether registering that way would bind subsequent owners of those properties. They requested that it be added into the bill that that was as efficient and as binding, being registered by the city on their zoning process, as others are registering at the registry office. That's where the government has concerns about the consistency. Subsequent owners would not know in all cases where to look for that information. They could be owners of property that had great impediments on it that they were never made aware of in the title search when the transfer of that property was done.

Mr Bradley: I appreciate the clarification from the parliamentary assistant and the members of the Ministry of Housing. Indeed, that's where the motion did come from, a presentation that was made to committee, and I was very interested in how you felt it would impact across the province.

The Chair: Any further discussion? Seeing none, all those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? I deem the amendment to fail.

I'll put the question on 24. Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 24 carries? All those opposed? The section carries.

Section 25. Any comments, questions or amendments?

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, the government will be voting against section 25. This is a consequential amendment, since the minor variance provisions in sections 45 and 45.1 of the Planning Act are being removed. Again, this deals with the appeal to the OMB on minor variances, so we will not be supporting this section.

Mr Bradley: I have a little note written on this that says: "Bill 20 originally added a new provision requiring a majority of the committee of adjustment to make a valid decision. A smaller quorum would not be allowed. This amendment deletes this provision." Is that what this does? Yes? What are the merits of that, then? What are the arguments that are put forward on that?

Mr Hardeman: We'll ask legal branch to tell us.

Ms Elaine Ross: Elaine Ross, Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing, legal services branch. The reason that we're now removing these sections is because they're already in pre-Bill 20, section 45. So when we vote down section 26 of the bill, that will make the existing minor variance provisions in the act bounce back, and these sections are already in there, so we won't need them here.

Mr Bradley: On the matter of a quorum, could you explain that? What specifically happens with a quorum now and after we vote on this?

Ms Ross: There's no difference now and afterwards.

Mr Bradley: No difference. Okay.

Mr Bisson: Just so that I understand, taking 25 in basically deals with later sections that deal with section 26, just to make them all concur with each other. That's all we're doing here?

Mr Hardeman: This goes back to the way it was written in Bill 163.

Mr Bisson: Can I just saying something here on this? I would for once congratulate the government in actually listening to what presenters had to say on this particular issue. I think it's fairly clear that pretty well everybody who came before the committee, by majority—

Ms Churley: Except AMO.

Mr Bisson: Except AMO, I would point out—said that really this idea of taking away the ability to appeal to the OMB minor variances was the wrong thing to do. I congratulate the government for once actually listening to somebody. It's one of the few times I've seen that happen.

Ms Churley: It's true that it was everybody except AMO, which really astounded me because a lot of the representatives from municipalities and developers agreed that this was a problem. Not to take away from my colleague's congratulations, but I expect that in keeping with this government's approach to the new Planning Act, this would change, because even the developers had a problem with it.

Mr Bradley: Well, if they have a problem with it—

Ms Churley: So if they have a problem with it, it gets changed.

The Chair: Are there any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 25 carry? All those in favour? All those opposed? I deem section 25 does not carry. It's defeated.

Section 26.

Mr Bisson: Just to make things go a little bit quicker, we all have the same motion here on section 26 of the bill. Seeing that the government is going to amend this—both the NDP and the Liberals have amendments on section 26 that I take it will basically bring us back into sync with what the government was trying to do in section 25. I would withdraw, if it's in order, the NDP motion, section 26, and just put on Hansard that by doing so we're going to allow the minor variances to go forward. Can we do that?

The Chair: If you don't make the motion, it's deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr Bisson: I'll let the Liberal Party do its own.

Mr Bradley: Similarly, the Liberal motion is identical to the NDP motion and is in keeping, I think, with what the government wants to do. However, the government motion looks like it's much shorter, if I have the right version. Is there any reason the government motion is much shorter?

Mr Hardeman: It has to do with streamlining the planning process.

Mr Bradley: I'm prepared to move my motion, but if your motion does exactly the same thing—

Mr Hardeman: I think for clarification of the committee, the two motions from the opposition were putting a whole framework in place. The government's motion is to revert back to the Bill 163 wording, so it requires much less wording.

Mr Bisson: Yes, because it's already in the bill.

Mr Bradley: It accomplishes the same thing. If you're going to move it, I guess we will support it, if it accomplishes the same thing and there are no tricks to it.

The Chair: So you're not making a motion either, Mr Bradley?

Ms Churley: Well, I think he'd like an answer on that. Is there any difference?

Mr Bisson: It brings you back to 163.

Mr Hardeman: Take my word for it, there are no tricks.

Ms Churley: There are no tricks.

The Chair: Are there any further amendments?

Mr Bisson: Oh, here come the tricks.

Mr Hardeman: My apologies. It's not a trick, but there is a change from 163 and it deals with the board's ability to make a change to the original application without giving notice that that was done in the board process—if it's a minor change.

Mr Bradley: In that event, I will move my motion then. Does a motion, by procedure, have to be read into the record or may it be deemed to have been read?

The Chair: It has to be read, Mr Bradley.

Mr Bradley: I will read it then. Here it comes, moved by myself, section 26 of the bill, subsections 45(10) and (11) to (11.13) of the Planning Act. That's what we're talking about.

I move that subsections 45(10) and (11) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 26 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Decision

"(10) The decision of council on an application shall be in writing and shall set out the reasons for the decision.

"Notice of decision

"(11) The clerk of the municipality shall send out a copy of the decision, certified by him or her, to the following persons not later than 10 days after the decision is made:

"1. The minister, if the minister has notified the council that he or she wishes to receive a copy of all decisions of council under this section.

"2. The applicant.

"3. Each person or public body who has asked in writing to be notified of the decision.

"Appeal to OMB

"(11.1) The applicant, the minister or any other person or public body who has an interest in the matter may appeal the decision of the committee to the municipal board by filing a notice of appeal with the secretary-treasurer of the committee within 20 days after the decision is made and paying the applicable fee under the Ontario Municipal Board Act.

"Notice of appeal

"(11.2) The notice of appeal must set out the objection to the decision and the reasons in support of the objection.

"Same

"(11.3) The secretary-treasurer shall promptly forward the notice of appeal and the fee to the municipal board together with everything filed with the committee of adjustment relating to the matter being appealed and such other things as the board may require.

"No appeal or appeal withdrawn

"(11.4) If no notice of appeal is given within 20 days after the decision is made, or if all appeals to the municipal board are withdrawn, the decision of the committee is final. The secretary-treasurer shall notify the applicant and shall file a certified copy of the decision with the clerk of the municipality.

"Powers of the OMB

"(11.5) The municipal board may make any decision on the appeal that the committee could have made on the original application.

"Same

"(11.6) The board may dismiss an appeal after holding a hearing or without holding one, as the board considers appropriate.

"Representation

"(11.7) Before dismissing an appeal, the municipal board shall give the appellant an opportunity to make representations in respect of the appeal.

"Dismissal without hearing

"(11.8) The municipal board may, on its own motion or on the motion of a party, dismiss all or part of an appeal without holding a hearing,

"(a) if the board is of the opinion that,

"(i) the reasons set out in the notice of appeal do not disclose any apparent land use planning ground upon which the board could allow all or part of the appeal,

"(ii) the appeal is not made in good faith or is frivolous or vexatious, or

"(iii) the appeal is made only for the purpose of delay;

"(b) if the appellant has not provided written reasons for the appeal;

"(c) if the appellant has not paid the applicable fee under the Ontario Municipal Board Act; or

"(d) the appellant has not responded to a request by the board for further information within the time specified by the board.

"Notice of hearing

"(11.9) The Municipal Board shall give notice of its hearing to the applicant, the appellant, and the secretary-general of the committee—"

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Bradley, you added a word there.

Mr Bisson: You're paying attention, Steve.

Mr Bradley: Where is this?

The Chair: You added the word "and" after "appellant."

Mr Bradley: Okay, I'll try this again.

"Notice of hearing

"(11.9) The municipal board shall give notice of its hearing to the applicant, the appellant, the secretary-general of the committee—"

The Chair: Excuse me, secretary-treasurer.

Mr Bradley: Secretary-treasurer. What did I say?

The Chair: General.

Ms Churley: General.

Mr Bradley: I must have the United Nations—

The Chair: We have enough on our plate, we don't have to worry about world issues.

Mr Murdoch: There's an appointment coming up.

Mr Bradley: I'm thinking of that appointment—"the secretary-general of the committee"—

The Chair: You did it again.

Mr Bradley:—"the secretary-treasurer of the committee and to such other persons or public bodies and in such manner as the board may determine.

"Amended application

"(11.10) On an appeal, the municipal board may make a decision on an application which has been amended from the original application if, before issuing its order, written notice is given to those who received notice of the original application for the minor variance.

"Same

"(11.11) A person or public body who receives notice under subsection (11.10) may notify the board of an intention to appear at the hearing, if any, or the resumption of the hearing, as the case may be. Notice under this section must be given not later than 30 days after the person or public body receives the notice under subsection (11.10).

"Same

"(11.12) Subsections (11.5) to (11.8) apply, with necessary modifications, with respect to an application which has been amended from the original application.

"Notice of decision

"(11.13) The secretary-treasurer of the committee shall file a copy of the order of the municipal board with the clerk of the municipality."

That is the motion. The reason is as follows. The reason will be shorter than the motion and will not refer to the secretary-general, I assure you. This amendment restores the right of appeal on minor variances. Minor variances are small zoning changes, often for residential properties, for such things as adding porches, swimming pools and additions to houses. Under the government bill, there would be no appeal mechanism of a council decision.

Minor variance appeals use only a small portion—it's estimated, I think, 6%—of OMB time and there is no compelling reason for the removal from the process. In fact, the elimination of such appeals may result in more rezoning applications to municipalities and ultimately to the OMB, thereby of course increasing cost. This is similar to, but not identical to, I believe, what the government wishes to accomplish.

I think members who had the opportunity I didn't of sitting in on a number of the hearings heard this issue mentioned, and those who've received communications heard this issue mentioned by a number of people who made representations either in writing or orally to the committee.

Mr Hardeman: The government will not be supporting the resolution. One of the concerns we have with the resolution is that it is an addition to the process set out in Bill 20 that deals with how the appeal process would be initiated originally from the committee of adjustment dealing with members of the committee of adjustment going through council and then going through the Ontario Municipal Board.

The intent of that section was to reduce the number of appeals and processes going to the Ontario Municipal Board. We heard a lot of presentations during our public deliberations that there was concern the application should go to the Ontario Municipal Board. The government has listened to that concern. We have decided to go back to the direct appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board.

We're convinced the process that does that in Bill 163 is fairly straightforward, that the committee of adjustment makes its decision and that decision is appealable by anyone wishing to do so, in the act, can be forwarded to the Ontario Municipal Board. For that reason we do not support this motion, but we'll be putting forward a motion that's subsequent to this to deal with a direct appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Opposed? The amendment failed.

Mr Hardeman: I move that section 26 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"26(1) Section 45 of the act, as amended by the Statutes of Ontario, 1993, chapter 26, section 56 and 1994, chapter 23, section 26, is further amended by adding the following subsection:

"Exception

"(18.1.1) The municipal board is not required to give notice under subsection (18.1) if, in its opinion, the amendment to the original application is minor.

(2) Subsection 45(18.4) of the act, as enacted by the Statutes of Ontario, 1993, chapter 26, section 56, is repealed and the following substituted:

"Hearing

"(18.4) If a notice of intent is received, the board may hold a hearing or resume the hearing on the amended application or it may issue its order without holding a hearing or resuming the hearing."

The two motions are the same powers as those given to the Ontario Municipal Board when dealing with appeals on consent applications under section 53 of the act. They will give the OMB some flexibility in dealing with appeals on minor variance applications which have been amended.

Mr Bisson: Just one question: The difference between what you have in 163 and what you intend on doing with this is that there won't be any need for a public meeting.

Mr Hardeman: No, this is an amendment that deals with an application for a minor variance that was appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board, and in the process of that, adjustments were made to the application that changed it, but the OMB could then still decide on that application without further notice.

Mr Bisson: I was reading this. It says, "The municipal board is not required to give notice under subsection (18.1) if, in its opinion, the amendment to the original application"—okay, got you.

Mr Hardeman: If the request for the minor variance was for a two-foot frontage and the decision was at the one-foot frontage that would be a change, but they would not have to go through the public notice process.

The Chair: Any further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment's passed.

Section 26, as amended. Is it the favour of the committee that section 26, as amended, carry? Contrary? Carried.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 27(1) of the bill be struck out.

This is a consequential amendment since the new minor variance provisions in sections 45 and 45.1 of the Planning Act were voted down and the amendment to subsection 47(2) of the Planning Act is no longer needed.

The Chair: Further discussion?

Mr Bisson: One second here. Okay, thank you.

The Chair: Seeing no further discussion, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Mr Bisson: Subsections 27(2) and (3) of the bill (clauses 47(11)(a) and 47(12.1)(a) of the Planning Act): I move that subsections 27(2) and (3) of the bill be struck out.

Basically, we're back to the same argument in regard to official plan amendments being denied on prematurity. I think we've made all of the arguments we wanted to make on previous motions. Unless the government plans on changing its mind from the previous votes, I think the arguments have been made.

Mr Hardeman: I and the government will not be supporting this motion, for the arguments that the opposition has made on previous—the prematurity test and the ability to have the board hear the application with all the relevant factors remain and that should remain in zoning orders, as it does in the zoning bylaws and the official plan amendments.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? All those opposed? The amendment fails.

Mr Bisson: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: The government just voted against its own amendment. If you'd note, I read the wrong amendment.

The Chair: No, (2) and (3).

Mr Bisson: No, I recognize that. I wanted to read—but I think, if you check Hansard—

The Chair: No, you didn't.

Mr Bisson: I did not? Thank you.

The Chair: No.

All those in favour that section 27, as amended, carries? Contrary? Section 27, as amended, is carried.

Seeing no amendments proposed to section 28, I'll put the question. All those in favour that section 28 carries? All those opposed? Section 28 carries.

Section 29. I think the first one is a Liberal motion.

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, I request we set down section 29 to a later time. I have some amendments to 29. The committee may wish to defer a decision on that so they have the opportunity to go through the amendments rather than vote on them at the present time.

Mr Bisson: Are you saying that we have new amendments?

Mr Bradley: Yes.

The Chair: If you're going to talk about 29, you should talk about 30 as well, because there are amendments to that section.

Mr Hardeman: I would ask that 30 then also be set down.

The Chair: Is there unanimous debate that we postpone debate on sections 29 and 30 until after lunch? Thank you.

Moving on to section 31, any comments, questions or amendments to that section?

Mr Bradley: The government wants us to vote against its own bill. Is that what it's saying?

Interjection: It's not unheard of, of course.

Mr Hardeman: We don't have an amendment to this section. We are only suggesting the government will be voting against the section of the bill. Again, it relates to the change in the appeal of the minor variance process. Going back to the full appeal for minor variances will require not having this section in the bill.

The Chair: That having been said, is there any further discussion on section 31?

Interjections.

The Chair: It's not a motion.

Mr Hardeman: Again, to the comments, I do not suggest amendment to section 31, only that the government will be voting against section 31.

The Chair: Is it the favour of this committee that section 31 carries? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 31 is defeated.

Section 32.

Mr Hardeman: Again, I do not have any amendments to section 32, but I will be suggesting that I, as a member of the government side, will be voting against section 32.

Mr Bradley: I have a prediction.

Mr Hardeman: I'm not going to be alone.

The Chair: Is there any further discussion on section 32?

Ms Churley: Why are you recommending that the members of the government—

Mr Hardeman: The amendment is the same as in section 31. It relates to the minor variance provisions, and they are no longer required because of the change to the appeal process.

The Chair: If there is no further discussion, is it the favour of this committee that section 32 carries? All those in favour? All those opposed? Section 32 is defeated.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 33 and 34, are there any comments, questions or amendments on sections 33 and 34? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the favour of the committee that sections 33 and 34 carry? All those in favour? Contrary? Sections 33 and 34 carry.

Section 35.

Mr Bradley: The Liberal Party has an amendment to propose to section 35.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Bradley. We're dealing with section 35. Yours would be a new section, so we must conclude debate on section 35 before we deal with your motion.

Are there any comments or amendments to section 35 itself?

Mr Bradley: Not now, you're saying?

The Chair: Not now.

Seeing none, is it the favour of this committee that section 35 carries? All those in favour? Opposed? Section 35 carries.

Now, Mr Bradley.

Mr Bradley: Thank you Mr Chairman. I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section:

"35.1 The act is amended by adding the following section:

"Mediation of OMB appeals, etc.

"65.1 (1) The Municipal Board may use mediation to attempt to resolve matters that are referred or appealed to the board, before determining the matter in the manner provided under the act.

"Same

"(2) The municipal board may employ or retain the services of persons to provide mediation services under the act."

The reasoning is as follows: The amendment enables the OMB to use mediation to attempt to resolve disputes appealed to the board. The provincial facilitator's office mediation pilot project successfully mediated approximately 80% of all OMB appeals it dealt with, at a cost of $800 to $1,000 per appeal. It's efficient and effective.

I should note that legislative counsel advises that the motion may be ruled out of order because it is not addressed in the bill. I'm just wondering whether you were going to rule it out of order.

The Chair: No, it is in order.

Mr Bradley: Okay. Because I went on to say that it does, however, appear to be within the scope of the long title of the bill, so there was an argument that it could be ruled in order. I'm glad that you've ruled it in order. I'd be very interested in the government's comments on this motion.

The Chair: Mr Bisson.

Mr Bisson: Government comments, I think.

The Chair: Your hand was up first.

Mr Bisson: I'd be prepared to hear what the parliamentary assistant says, because he might agree with it and I won't have to comment.

Mr Hardeman: I'm glad to hear that everyone is interested in what the government has to say. The government does not support the motion. The current provisions in section 65 of the act already provide the OMB and its agents with the ability to use mediation, conciliation or other disputes resolution techniques to resolve concerns and disputes, and we do not deem it appropriate to give any further direction in this act as to how they shall deal with the applications.

Mr Bisson: Let me ask a question then to the parliamentary assistant: If this particular motion was supported and put into the bill, would it allow for more opportunity for mediation than presently exists or would it not change it at all?

Mr Hardeman: We do not believe that it would change. We think everything that is being proposed in this resolution would be available presently under the OMB system if the OMB so decided to use that discretion.

Mr Bisson: So in your opinion it would not allow more mediation than presently exists under the act?

Mr Hardeman: No. I think the mediation that presently is available is as extensive as what this would allow, or this would provide for.

Mr Bisson: I would just ask for the logic then from the Liberal party, what it is that they intended to do in addition?

Mr Bradley: We think it makes it more specific that the OMB would use mediation. We think it is just more prescriptive than it exists at the present time. It's not a major problem. But I know that in opposition you wouldn't mind supporting it.

Mr Bisson: I just wanted to find out.

Mr Bradley: The member for Middlesex agrees with me; I saw him nodding. Maybe he was nodding off.

Mr Bisson: I asked the question in order to make sure that I'm clear about what I'm voting on, what this motion intends to do. I believe that mediation is a much better way to go, and if this motion allows for more mediation and a clearer way to give direction to the board to go to mediation, I think we should support it. On principle, I will support it.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Opposed? The amendment fails.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 36 through 44, I'll ask if there are any comments, questions or amendments to sections 36 through 44? Seeing none, is it the favour of this committee that section 36 through 44 carry? All those in favour? Opposed? Sections 36 through 44 carried.

Section 45.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 76(2) of the Planning Act, as set out in section 45 of the bill, be amended by striking out the portion that precedes clause (a) and substituting the following:

"(2) Section 1, subsections 16(2), (3) and (4), 31(3.1) and (3.2), 35(1), (3) and (4) and 51(28), (29) and (30) of the act and Ontario regulation 384/94, as they read on November 15, 1995, continue to apply to a detached house, a semi-detached house or a row house if on or before the day on which subsection 21(1) of the Land Use Planning and Protection Act, 1996 comes into force."

This is the changing of the effective date as it relates to the apartments in houses, changing it to date of proclamation as opposed to date of introduction of Bill 20, to deal with the issue of municipalities that may or may not have known of the existence of Bill 20 that have issued permits on houses that were being constructed during that time frame, and also for those people who had started the process. The committee will be aware—we heard presentations, particularly in the city of Ottawa—of a gentleman who had gone to quite extensive work to arrive at a second unit; not that he suggested that he supported the principle, but he felt that if it was legal, he should be allowed to do it. He had expended a lot of money and he did not want to be denied now, after that investment. The government feels that it's appropriate to put the time line on the date of proclamation and everyone existing at that time would be grandfathered under Bill 20.

Ms Churley: Just a suggestion: Some of us say "grandparenting" these days instead of "grandfathering." That was one suggestion. I know it's not in fashion these days to bring these kinds of things up, but some of us keep trying.

I just want to thank the government for listening to this. It was clearly pointed out to us that this would have created some real hardship through nobody's personal fault, and I'm glad that I can support this amendment. It's one of the few recommendations before us today from the government side that actually show a little bit of good common sense.

Mr Bradley: I will indicate our support for this. I would warn Ms Churley that whenever one commends the government, it can appear in a government newsletter.

I recall reading a statement of a complimentary fashion that I made in the House about the member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore, Mr Kells.

Ms Churley: I read that.

Mr Bradley: I read it in his brochure that came out, excerpted appropriately, of course.

Anyway, I do believe it is fair to do it this way. I think there's a lot of sense to what is proposed. We're not leaving some people in limbo. We're making certain that everyone knows the law is passed. I'm sure you'll have some kind of information out when the law is passed that will tell everyone it is passed.

The other thing I would note, though, that is of great interest is that you're going to grandparent this, but when it comes to the development charges for the developers, that provision stays at November 1 for municipalities. If I read the bill further on, the developers are going to get their way because the municipalities will know that, as of November 15, on development charges the rules change. But in here it's the proclamation of the bill. I just note that as a matter of interest.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Let's just finish section 45. Is it the favour of the committee that section 45 carries as amended? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 45 carries.

Seeing as it is noon, we will recess for one hour and return at 1 o'clock.

The committee recessed from 1200 to 1307.

The Chair: Seeing a quorum present, I call the meeting back to order. We left off at section 45. The first order of business will be section 29, which we had suspended debate on to allow an opportunity over the lunch-hour for the other two parties to review the amendments. Whenever you're ready, Mr Hardeman.

Mr Hardeman: It's just a great feeling to have everyone waiting on one.

The Chair: I should be castigating Mr Bradley. The first amendment is one of yours.

Mr Bradley: I found it. Section 29.

I move that subsection 29(3) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(3) Subsection 51(17) of the act, as re-enacted by the Statutes of Ontario, 1994, chapter 23, section 30, is amended by striking out the portion that precedes clause (a) and substituting the following:

"Contents

"(17) The applicant shall provide the approval authority with such information and material as the approval authority considers necessary to determine the application, including as many copies as the approval authority may require of a draft plan of the proposed subdivision drawn to scale and showing."

The reason I am proposing this: The existing act and the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing can determine in part what constitutes a complete application. Currently a complete application as defined does not include enough information for council to make an informed decision on the planning merits of an application. For example, a preliminary stormwater management report is not prescribed information for subdivision applications nor is the soil study if the site was formerly used for industrial purposes. In such instances, how can a municipality make a sound decision that safeguards the interests of the community and the environment?

When presented with an inadequate application, the time limits prescribed in the act will continue to run and a proponent may then appeal to the OMB if a decision has not been made. Municipalities must have the authority to pass a bylaw setting out what information is required for a complete application in addition to the legislated and provincial prescribed information. This will ensure better and appropriately local level implementation of planning decisions. Neither Bill 20 nor Bill 163 achieved the intent of the complete application content: to reduce the number of files contained within the planning system that contain inadequate information and to make it clear to applicants what will be required in the application.

I've given I think a couple of examples of the kind of information that should be made available. What the province prescribes and what a municipality may want are two different things apparently. There's no question that a preliminary stormwater management report is a necessity, but it's not prescribed information for subdivision applications.

Also, having been Minister of the Environment, I can tell you a soil study is very important if it was a former industrial use. I'm sure the member for Mississauga South, Ms Marland, would agree with me on that, because she's had experience with that, and perhaps even the member for Oakville, who has some industrial sites in his riding. No doubt he will want to join in approval of this particular amendment as well.

Mr Hardeman: We will not be supporting the amendment. I think again it deals with the issue of what starts the time frame for the appeal process. We're not suggesting that municipalities could not require further information in dealing with their applications, but I don't think it's appropriate to suggest that the municipality should have a bylaw that outlines all the things that are required. That would be far too onerous to comply with.

To start an application, there may be many cases where further information is required as the application is being processed and evaluated, but we need a set time when the clock starts to tick on the application. We believe that's appropriate. That's a standard the province sets so everyone is aware what must be supplied for an application to be complete, for the review to start. So we will not be supporting this. We believe that prescribed information should be the same for everyone. Beyond that, the municipalities can require further information as they review the application.

Mr Bradley: It would seem sensible, however, that that information be provided at the earliest possible opportunity as opposed to somewhere along the line. These are two obvious examples I've given you. I wish the province would prescribe that if municipalities can't. Because the province is not prescribing that, I'm suggesting that municipalities should have the opportunity to do so. I'm of the view that the earlier this information is available the better off everyone will be. It may be that a plan that's dreamed up in someone's head may disappear completely if, through the soil testing, there's a determination that it would be impossible to build.

Let me give you one example that you Tories will like particularly, and that's Ataratiri down in Toronto. I can well recall cautioning the cabinet of the day that that would never fly. We're not supposed to talk about cabinet deliberations, so I'll say it was outside of cabinet. I said to some of my colleagues that the cost of bringing the soil up to a standard which would be acceptable for residential development would be extremely high. I remember I was chastised by an individual who worked for the city of Toronto at the time saying that I was being alarmist, and of course by some of my cabinet colleagues who thought I was as well.

As it turned out, you see that Ataratiri is not going to fly, and one of the reasons it's not going to fly is because of the soil problems. Had there been some significant work done before this even got off the ground on the soil, I think more people would have been cautioned against proceeding. But it got well down the line and now subsequent people are going to pick up the tab for this particular development.

That's why I'm proposing it. If the province prescribed that, I would say fine, we don't need this. Stormwater management as well is extremely important for subdivision applications, but I must focus on that soil study. There may have been a time when you could build on those old industrial sites without too much of a soil study taking place. There are now standards which have been established for the reclamation of those soils, and in some cases it is not economically feasible to implement a plan because the soils simply are not acceptable for residential purposes. They would be acceptable only for some other industrial purpose.

That's why I'm proposing this. Again, it's a common-sense proposal that I'm making here and I thought it would gather good support, particularly from those who've had some municipal experience either in a staff capacity or an elected capacity.

The Chair: Seeing no further comment, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Opposed? The amendment fails.

Further amendments? Mr Bradley.

Mr Bradley: I have a further amendment. It's to do with subsection 29(4) of the bill and it reads as follows:

I move that subsection 51(2) of the Planning Act, as set out in subsection 29(4) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Meeting

"(20) At least 14 days before a decision is made by an approval authority under subsection (31), the approval authority shall ensure that a public meeting is held, notice of which shall be given in the manner and to the persons and public bodies and containing the information prescribed.

"Same

"(20.1) An approval authority may request that a local municipality or a planning board having jurisdiction over the land that is proposed to be subdivided hold the public meeting."

Again, this involves public input, which we have felt all along is very important. We had representations made by a number of people to the committee when I was in Hamilton, and I understand in other places. What this motion in effect does, and it's a very key motion in this bill, is it re-establishes the requirement for a public meeting on a subdivision. This is about retaining public participation in the planning process.

Municipalities and developers will end up spending more time and money on rearguard actions, trying to meet the demands of shut-out citizens, than would be the case if contributions were taken advantage of at the beginning. The meeting held at the official plan amendment or zoning stage can be no substitution for the subdivision meeting, as there are not enough details generally available at this early stage.

I have noted one of the changes since I left office at the municipal level and came to the provincial level—I think it's a change in there—is that there seem to be more of these public meetings taking place. When I watch my own city council on cable television, I notice that at 8 o'clock the mayor will say, "It's now time for public meetings." It's interesting to see. In some cases, there are no objections registered. There may be some representatives of the developer there to say it's a great development coming forward and that everyone should approve.

But this is rather fundamental, it seems to me. Those of us who have served at the municipal level and have observed the municipal level understand how important this public meeting is for subdivisions. I shouldn't be surprised, but I am surprised, that the government would go so far as to remove this particular requirement. I know you think you're speeding up the process and that some of these people are tedious and bothersome, and there may be occasions when some of the submissions are vexatious, as the lawyers say.

However, I think it's good for the system. I think a lot of the problems are solved at this stage when people have this information brought forward. The developer hears from people and is then able to address some of the problems, maybe address some of the questions at the very time; there may have been a misinterpretation of the proposal by someone who wishes to object. This is a great opportunity for that exchange to take place and for the developer to either make a modification or provide an explanation that eases the concern of the individual or individuals or groups making representations against a proposed development.

I think if we remove this, you're really taking a major step backward in terms of public participation. It reinforces the theory of some people in the province that this is simply a bill designed to cater to developers, who strongly supported the Conservative Party in the last election. That is what they're saying to me. I'd like to think it's not; I'd like to think, "I proposed this amendment, and these people are going to demonstrate it's not entirely for that purpose, that indeed they believe in public participation." That's why I'm looking forward to the support of the government members to ignore the parliamentary assistant and simply vote as their conscience dictates as opposed to how it is recommended by the parliamentary assistant.

Mr Hardeman: The government will be voting against this motion. One of the reasons it was left out of Bill 20 was, as Mr Bradley said, that many times he has watched city council and they have the section with public meetings and a lot of issues are not being spoken to. Under Bill 163, even in those areas where there was no one there to speak to the application, there was another two-week delay in having that application approved because of the requirement that the public meeting be held at least 14 days prior to the decision of council.

The government members too were on the committee that heard the public presentations and the concern expressed about the removal of the requirement to hold a public meeting, so we have introduced a motion that was distributed to the committee members this morning that does exactly what this does, but it includes a further clause that we believe is required in the legislation. So I will not be voting for this resolution, recognizing that our amendment will do things identical to this but with an added-on section.

Ms Churley: Can I get some clarification on that? Are you saying you presented an amendment this morning that's new and we haven't dealt with it yet?

Mr Hardeman: The next amendment, the government amendment, will be to deal with this section of the bill.

Ms Churley: Oh, I see. I haven't looked at that yet. To determine whether I'm going to support this or yours, what is the major difference between them?

Mr Hardeman: The government amendment will have an addition that the holding of that public meeting can be requested by the approving authority, request that the lower tier hold the meeting and notification of that meeting.

Ms Churley: So in other words—

Mr Murdoch: In other words, just trust us, Marilyn.

Mr Hardeman: I've just been informed there's also a requirement in our motion to give notice of the application.

Ms Churley: In other words, as Mr Murdoch said, "Trust us." Just kidding. You didn't mean that, did you?

Mr Murdoch: I believe you can trust me, Marilyn; I trust you.

Ms Churley: And so you should.

The difference is that in your amendment—and I'm sorry I haven't read it, but I might as well get clarification now while we're dealing with this motion. Yours is that they would not be required, that they would have the option to call a public meeting within the 14 days?

Mr Hardeman: In the subsection of our amendment, it will require that notice of the application be given "if required by regulation, in the manner and to the persons..."

Ms Churley: So there has to be a regulation.

Mr Hardeman: There's also the responsibilities at the bottom of our amendment that would not be covered in the Liberal amendment.

Ms Churley: I would support the Liberal motion before me because I believe it's stronger. In my quick reading of this, it appears to me that under the motion that will come before us, there is some opting out possible, that a meeting is not absolutely required within that 14-day time period. Am I right?

Mr Hardeman: I stand to be corrected, but I don't believe that's the case.

Ms Churley: I'll wait until you're clear on that.

Mr Hardeman: The legal staff did not hear the question, Ms Churley, if you could repeat it, please.

Ms Churley: I'm trying to determine the main difference between the Liberal motion before us and the one following, the Conservative government motion. What would you say is the main difference between the two of those?

Mr Bradley: If legal counsel wants to talk directly to us, it's all right.

Ms Churley: Yes. Can we have unanimous consent for legal counsel—

Mr Hardeman: There are three differences. In the notice requirement, as was just read into the record, there is a difference. With the amendment before you now, it would be in the act that the public meeting will be held. The amendment that we will be putting forward is the same as it is in Bill 163, that it can be required to be held by regulations.

If the amendment before you now is approved, it would mandate in the bill that the public meeting be held 14 days prior to. Presently, Bill 163 says that, by regulation, those meetings can be required. Plan of subdivision meetings are presently required by regulation.

Ms Churley: What you're doing, then, is putting back the Bill 163 clause.

Mr Hardeman: Yes.

Ms Churley: Okay.

Mr Murdoch: It must be okay.

Ms Churley: No, not necessarily.

Mr Bradley: Marilyn, excuse me, if I can intervene here, if you'd let me.

Ms Churley: Please.

Mr Bradley: The question is then, if it's done by regulation, you can change the regulation without the approval of the Legislature, but if it's done in the act, you can't change the act. From the opposition point of view, we would probably believe it's better in the act than it is in a regulation that you can change without us knowing or without us having participation.

Ms Churley: Thank you. That's helpful. I'm not sure why in Bill 163 it was determined to go that route, but today I certainly support the Liberal motion because it's stronger. It adds the requirement for public meetings. Particularly in light of the lack of public participation in the process throughout this bill, which has been cut out in so many cases—time frames cut down, in some cases no public participation at all—I would like to err on the side of caution here and strengthen this clause as best as possible so that we know that within the bill, within the law, there has to be a public meeting, that it can't easily be changed by a regulation. I believe it's absolutely fundamental. I have no problem suggesting that we go beyond what was in Bill 163 and enshrine this in the law. 1330

Mr Bradley: Another concern I have about going the regulation route is that the government at this time is looking to eliminate regulations. My good friend the member for Lincoln has been charged with the responsibility, along with Dr Galt, of looking at all the regulations that exist in government and eliminating them. Knowing my good friend Mr Sheehan as I do, I've never known him to be a great fan of regulations of any kind, so this may be one regulation that might disappear. If it's going to disappear, I would prefer to have a debate in the Legislature where the opposition has input, where public hearings maybe take place, as opposed to it being done behind closed doors with the cabinet and then just being announced somewhere. That is why I feel having it in legislation is superior to having it in regulation.

The Chair: Any further comment? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Opposed? The amendment fails.

Further amendments?

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 51(20) of the Planning Act, as set out in subsection 29(4) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Notice

"(20) At least 14 days before a decision is made by an approval authority under subsection (31), the approval authority shall ensure that,

"(a) notice of the application is given, if required by regulation, in the manner and to the persons and public bodies and containing the information prescribed; and

"(b) a public meeting is held, if required by regulation, notice of which shall be given in the manner and to the persons and public bodies and containing the information prescribed.

"Request

"(21) An approval authority may request that a local municipality or a planning board having jurisdiction over the land that is proposed to be subdivided give notice of the application or hold the public meeting referred to in subsection (20) or do both.

"Responsibilities

"(21.1) A local municipality or planning board that is requested to give the notice referred to in clause (20)(a) shall ensure that,

"(a) the notice is given in accordance with the regulation made under clause (20)(a); and

"(b) the prescribed information and material are submitted to the approval authority within 15 days after the notice is given.

"Same

"(21.2) A local municipality or planning board that is requested to hold the public meeting referred to in clause (20)(b) shall ensure that,

"(a) notice of the meeting is given in accordance with the regulation made under clause (20)(b);

"(b) the public meeting is held; and

"(c) the prescribed information and material are submitted to the approval authority within 15 days after the meeting is held."

This is the motion referred to in the previous discussion to deal with the holding of a public meeting as it relates to plans of subdivision. We heard many comments as we went around the province from delegates who spoke to the public meetings for plans of subdivision, and invariably those who spoke to it spoke to the need to retain the system as it presently existed in Bill 163. The purpose of this amendment is to do just that.

Ms Churley: I support this amendment and I'm glad to see that you have inserted that back in the bill.

Mr Bradley: I believe it is always better—not always, but most of the time it's better to have something in legislation than regulation. I still believe this is one area where there has been some movement, and where there has been some movement I think it's worthy of being supportive of that. I think it's some significant movement in this case. I still have that preference, as I say, especially knowing how enamoured many in this government are with government regulations, to see this in legislation. I guess this is saying it's better to get a kick in the shins than a kick in the face.

The Chair: Further conversation? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Further amendments?

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 29(15) of the bill be struck out.

The Chair: Sorry, Mr Hardeman, you've gone out of order.

Ms Churley: I think I'm drowning in paper. We all are by now. The parliamentary assistant is too, I believe. My motion is section 29 of the bill, section 51 of the Planning Act, right?

The Chair: Yes.

Ms Churley: Can I stand that down for a moment while I clarify my own notes here?

The Chair: Well, yours is identical to the Liberal motion that's about to follow, so if we stand that down we'll be debating the same topic.

Ms Churley: All right. I'm happy to stand it down and let the Liberal motion go ahead.

Mr Bradley: I'm looking at subsection 29(6), an amendment. That's what I have in chronological order.

Ms Churley: Yes, that's why I'm lost. I'm confused, too.

The Chair: I don't have one for 29(6); 29(14) is the next one.

Mr Bradley: Let me see if I can find it in here. You may be correct in assuming you don't have it.

Ms Churley: I have now found my piece of paper.

The Chair: Is it before or after 29(6)?

Ms Churley: After.

Mr Bradley: Mine is a motion that's been prepared for the Liberal Party but is not in your package for distribution, so I could also stand it down if you want. I'll tell you what it deals with; tell me whether I'm in order. It dealt with subsection 29(6) of the bill, subsection 51(34) of the Planning Act. It's a motion that would allow appeals of subdivisions directly to the OMB, as Bill 20 does with official plans. The present process of referring a plan of subdivision to the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing or regional government is an unnecessary step. If it's out of order, it's out of order. I'm sorry, because I don't think you have a copy of this.

The Chair: Mr Bradley, with your indulgence, could we ask for unanimous support to stand that down while we make copies for the members?

Mr Bradley: That would be fine, thanks.

The Chair: Ms Churley?

Ms Churley: Should I read the actual motion again? I move that section 29 of the bill, section 51 of the Planning Act, be struck out.

The Chair: Forgive me. Could you read that again?

Ms Churley: Section 29 of the bill, section 51 of the Planning Act. Is that what you have?

The Chair: Do I have a different one, or are you just leaving things out? Is it 29(14)?

Ms Churley: Yes.

The Chair: Perhaps you could read it in its entirety.

Ms Churley: Let me read that once again. Subsection 29(14) of the bill, clause 51(53)(a) of the Planning Act:

I move that subsection 29(14) of the bill be struck out. 1340

This one again deals with the premature OPA application. I won't go into the details all over again as to why I want this struck out, but all the reasons are in the record. I stand by those concerns and would ask the government to support me on this resolution.

Mr Hardeman: The government will be voting against the resolution as explained by the member. The prematurity clause to eliminate the right of an individual to be heard because of the criteria used by the approving authority to deny an application I believe is not consistent with the other directions we're taking in Bill 20, that everyone should have a right to be heard and have their day to have the decision made based on the merits of the case as they relate to all the issues related to the planning application.

Mr Bradley: Ms Churley, that appears to be a reasonable explanation you have on that. They say you're going to be shot down. The government is disagreeing with you.

Ms Churley: Where are we now?

The Chair: Your motion.

Ms Churley: I still support my motion.

Mr Hardeman: We've concluded the debate and we're ready for the vote.

Mr Bradley: I could make a speech, but I won't.

The Chair: If there's no further discussion, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment's defeated.

You will note that the Liberal amendment was exactly the same, so we won't deal with that. Any further amendments?

Mr Bradley: On section 29(6), I'm not going to move an amendment. I had indicated that I had one that hadn't been distributed. I know now why it wasn't distributed. I'm going to withdraw it. I like proposing amendments with which I agree, that's why.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 29(15) of the bill be struck out.

Since the provisions to hold a public meeting for plans of subdivision have been restored, the provision in clause 51(53)(b) of the act also should be restored.

The Chair: Any further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment passes.

Is it the favour of the committee that section 29 carry, as amended? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 29, as amended, carries.

Section 30.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 53(5) of the Planning Act, as set in subsection 30(1) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Notice

"(5) At least 14 days before a decision is made by the council or the minister, the council or the minister shall ensure that,

"(a) notice of the application is given, if required by regulation, in the manner and to the persons and public bodies and containing the information prescribed; and

"(b) a public meeting is held, if required by regulation, notice of which shall be given in the manner and to the persons and public bodies and containing the information prescribed.

"Request by council

"(6) A council may request that a local municipality having jurisdiction over the land that is the subject of the application for consent give notice of the application or hold the public meeting referred to in subsection (5) or do both.

"Request by minister

"(7) The minister may request that a local municipality or planning board having jurisdiction over the land that is the subject of the application for consent give notice of the application or hold the public meeting referred to in subsection (5) or do both.

"Responsibilities

"(7.1) A local municipality or planning board that is requested under subsection (6) or (7) to give notice shall ensure that,

"(a) the notice is given in accordance with the regulation made under clause (5)(a); and

"(b) the prescribed information and material are submitted to the council or the minister, as the case may be, within 15 days after the notice is given.

"Same

"(7.2) A local municipality or planning board that is requested under subsection (6) or (7) to hold a public meeting shall ensure that,

"(a) notice of the meeting is given in accordance with the regulation made under clause (5)(b);

"(b) the public meeting is held; and

"(c) the prescribed information and material are submitted to the council or the minister, as the case may be, within 15 days after the meeting is held."

This amendment does the same in section 30 for consent decisions as it does in section 29 for the plans of subdivision.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Any other amendments?

Ms Churley: I move that subsection 30(12) of the bill be struck out.

I move this because, once again, it deals with the premature OPA application.

The Chair: Further discussion?

Mr Bradley: Once again I will make the plea; I'm sure it will fall upon unsympathetic minds. I was going to use another saying, but I was told you can't use it in 1996 because it's politically incorrect.

Mr Murdoch: You might have to withdraw it.

Mr Bradley: No, I wouldn't have to withdraw, but it's politically incorrect, as they say.

It's not going to evoke any sympathy in the government side, but it goes back to the issue which I think must be reiterated, that is, the prematurity test. I think you're going to see these proposals moving forward too much, too quickly, when there are no services existing and no evidence that services are going to be existing within a period of time. It's the old prematurity test, the power of the OMB to dismiss matters regarding a consent on the basis of prematurity. The arguments have been made, essentially. Obviously, the government and the opposition disagree and we'll be having a vote.

The Chair: Any further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment's defeated.

The identical Liberal motion can be dispensed with. Further amendments?

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 30(13) of the bill be struck out.

This deals with the fact that since the provision for holding a public meeting for consent is restored, the provision in clause 53(31)(b) of the act should also be restored.

Mr Bradley: It makes sense.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Is it the favour of the committee that section 30, as amended, carry? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 30, as amended, carries.

Back to 46. Are there any comments, suggestions or amendments to section 46?

Mr Bradley: Section 31 of the bill, does the government have an amendment to that?

The Chair: We already dealt with everything from 31 to 45.

Mr Bradley: All of those?

Mr Murdoch: We're up to 46.

The Chair: Section 31 lost.

Mr Bradley: Section 32?

The Chair: Section 32 lost, 33 won.

Mr Bisson: These are all the motions that we didn't do this morning that we deferred.

Mr Bradley: All right, fine. That makes sense.

Mr Bisson: Just for a point of clarification, those are all the amendments that we had deferred this morning that you just dealt with as I walked in.

Mr Murdoch: Yes.

The Chair: There are no amendments to section 46? Comments? Is it the favour of the committee that section 46 carry? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 46 carries.

Section 47.

Mr Bradley: I have a Liberal motion. We recommend voting against section 47 of the bill.

The Chair: That's not a motion, Mr Bradley, and if it were, it would be out of order. But thank you for your comments.

Mr Bradley: I'm just doing an impersonation of the parliamentary assistant.

The Chair: You just can't use the word "motion." Any further comments? All those in favour of section 47 carrying? Section 47 carries.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 48(1) of the bill be struck out.

This amendment deletes subsection 48(1) of the bill because it was a complementary amendment resulting from the proposed changes to the minor variance system. This section is no longer needed.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, all those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Is it the favour of the committee that section 48, as amended, carry? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 48, as amended, carries.

Section 49.

Mr Hardeman: I move that clause 4(4)(d) of the Development Charges Act, as set out in subsection 49(1) of the bill, be amended by striking out "subsection (3)" in the fourth line and substituting "subsections (3) and (3.1)."

This motion is to ensure that an affidavit or declaration by the clerk of a municipality, as set out in clause 4(4)(d) of Bill 20, in the record to the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing includes reference to the requirements for the timing of notice of a bylaw passed by the municipality contained in subsection 4(3.1) of the act.

This requirement does not add additional administrative costs to the municipalities. Where a municipality passes a bylaw after November 16, it must forward a record to the minister. This amendment provides assurances to the minister that the notice provisions to permit persons and organizations to submit their concerns about the bylaw have been complied with.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Further amendments?

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, I move that section 4 of the Development Charges Act, as amended by subsection 49(1) of the bill, be further amended by adding the following subsection after subsection 4(4.1):

"Refund

"(4.2) If the minister refuses to approve all or part of a bylaw, the municipality shall refund the development charges paid under the bylaw or the part that is not approved, and must do so within 30 days after the municipality receives notice of the minister's decision."

Mr Bradley: Again, if you look at some of the key parts of the bill that we focused on, this is a key part of the bill. This is a part of the bill that if one were suspicious, one would suspect it were written by the developers—

Mr Baird: But you're not suspicious.

Mr Bradley: —because it is clearly going to work against municipalities and against the existing people in municipalities and in favour of the developers. When we were in Hamilton, I asked the developers, the one group that came in, "Were you enthusiastic about this bill?" and they seemed to be very enthusiastic about the bill. One of the reasons they were enthusiastic was the provision which now allows the minister to rule on further development charges.

The purpose of development charges, we will recall, is so that new developments shall pay their fair share of the new facilities which are going to be required within a municipality. We always think of the roads, we always think of the sewer and water. We get into street lights, we get into schools, we get into parks, libraries, fire services and so on when we extend it. So development charges were put in place so that when development took place, it would not be the entire municipality, many of whose citizens had already paid for their own services and other services. Those people would not be required to pay for the new services.

These new powers to the minister under Bill 20, in my view, are not good powers for the minister to have and will work to the detriment of municipalities. Keep in mind that the province is cutting back its funding to municipalities and at the same time it says, "But of course, if you want to reflect your new costs in terms of development charges, this minister is going to keep a careful eye on you and prohibit you in some cases from doing so." That forces the municipality either to not provide some kind of service or, on the other hand, to raise municipal taxes. Of course, it's then the municipality that gets the flak, rather than the provincial government.

I think members of the committee should know that not only do we have the minister now interfering on behalf of developers, but this amendment would further penalize municipalities by forcing them to pay back lot levy funds which the minister feels were collected improperly. They would have collected the funds, probably spent the funds, and then the minister, probably at the behest of the developers—because the developers will make representations to the minister—will say, "That was an improperly imposed lot levy and you have to pay it back." So this is a further detriment to municipalities.

I wish municipal councillors across the province knew what was in this bill. I know some of them rub their hands at the fact they think they're getting some additional powers, but what they don't see are the other provisions in here. When they find that out, I think some of them may change their minds, at least those who aren't always acquiescing to every wish of developers.

Ms Churley: I support the comment from my Liberal colleague. I recognize and I think it's fair to say that when we were the government we realized that there were some problems with the Development Charges Act and that it's not necessarily a bad thing to take a look at it. I have no opposition to taking a look at the bill. What I'm strongly opposed to is the direction which this government is going, for the reasons that my colleague stated, particularly with the cuts to transfer payments to municipalities. Municipalities are going to be very hard pressed.

I don't quite understand why you would in this case arbitrarily reach in and tell municipalities how and when they should charge development fees. You seem to trust municipalities, for instance, in doing the right thing when it comes to environmental protection. Why not trust municipalities to determine what makes sense in their own locality for the development of their region? It just doesn't make sense except that, as my colleague said, you have listened very closely to the developers here. Of course the developers would like this change. Absolutely. Why wouldn't they? But I think it was wrong for the government to cave in to that.

The definition of "hard services" is very narrow. It relates to sewers and that kind of thing. Who's going to build the schools, the libraries, the community centres, the other aspects of development that are so very important to the people living there? Ultimately, somebody has to pay for that.

Now, you could argue, and I know that developers have argued, that it brings the cost of the new development up too much for homeowners. I agree that there have been some problems, and it has to be looked at, but obviously it's a mistake to think that municipalities are going to be able to afford to pick up those costs. At the end of the day, what we're going to have here is something that this government said is very undesirable, and that is higher municipal taxes, which is something that municipalities are having to struggle with right now because of the massive cuts in transfer payments. They will really have no choice but to raise taxes and ask for the general population to pick up the costs of these charges. I think it's a big mistake and not very well thought out.

Mr Bisson: I have a couple of questions before I actually make my comment, just to make sure I understand this properly. Does the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing now, outside of Bill 20, have the right to disapprove of a bylaw of a municipality? I think the answer is no, isn't it?

Mr Hardeman: The answer is no, yes.

Mr Bisson: Okay. So that means to say that if I was the municipality of the city of Timmins and I passed a bylaw that said I'm going to charge development charges on soft services in my community, I could legally do that as a community, and the minister can't rule otherwise.

Mr Hardeman: Yes.

Mr Bisson: Okay. Now, if I understand what you're doing here, it's that under this particular subsection you're saying the Minister of Municipal Affairs will now have the power to say a municipal bylaw is null and void.

Mr Hardeman: The municipal development charges bylaws were prepared when the Development Charges Act was implemented, prepared at great time and expense for municipalities, to justify the amount of the development charges for the municipal services required by that new development. A lot of those bylaws are running out at this time. The minister has come to the conclusion that a fundamental review of the Development Charges Act is required. It was felt to be inappropriate to have municipalities going to great expense to prepare a new development charge bylaw which in fact may or may not fit the criteria in a year's time.

It was also recognized that there was going to be a need for some municipalities, through extenuating circumstances, to increase their development charges in that interim period of time. This is to allow the minister to approve those types of increases while letting the municipal sector know that the Development Charges Act is being reviewed and they should not change their bylaws until that is complete. So they can implement a bylaw that would serve the needs of the Development Charges Act.

Mr Bisson: Let me try this again. If you were not to make this motion and (4.1) was to stand as is, the Minister of Municipal Affairs would have the right to approve or disapprove of a bylaw no matter what the issue was.

Mr Hardeman: No.

Mr Bisson: If I was to read—bear with me—section 4.1 prior to the amendment, you're saying, "The Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing may approve or refuse to approve a bylaw in whole or in part, in his or her absolute discretion, and his or her decision is final." That means to say that it would be outside of even development charges bylaws.

Mr Hardeman: In clarification to the amendment, the amendment is on the timing of the development charges, not on the minister's right to approve or not to approve. Section 48 dealt with that.

Mr Bisson: Let me try to word it another way. Can the minister refuse a bylaw of a municipality other than a bylaw that deals with development charges with this clause? That's issue number one. Are you giving this power only strictly on bylaws that deal with development charges?

Mr Hardeman: With this clause?

Mr Bisson: Yes.

Mr Hardeman: With this clause, this relates only to the timing of the minister's power, not the power itself. The power itself was dealt with in the previous section.

Mr Bisson: But that's the point I'm trying to make here. I asked the question at the very beginning of this. Prior to Bill 20, did the Minister of Municipal Affairs have the right to say that a bylaw was null and void dealing with development charges?

Mr Hardeman: No.

Mr Bisson: Okay. He will now have that power?

Mr Hardeman: Yes.

Mr Bisson: Okay. Thank you. Now I get to the next part. There are two parts to this. Let's deal with the easier one first.

If, let's say, the city of Timmins passed a bylaw in 1992 dealing with development charges as they apply to soft services, could the minister under this clause repeal the bylaw of 1992?

Mr Hardeman: No.

Mr Bisson: What's the time frame—from the enactment of this act?

Mr Hardeman: The minister has the power to approve bylaws in those bylaws where the municipality is proposing to raise the development charges. The other parts of the act authorize the extension of the existing development charges bylaws or the lowering of the development charges within their bylaws without minister's approval. The only minister's approval required is those cases where there are extenuating circumstances and the municipality deems it appropriate to have to raise the development charges. That would require the minister's approval.

Mr Bisson: But those bylaws that have already been passed, if I have a bylaw in my municipality dated 1992 that says we're going to charge development charges on soft services, will this clause give the minister the power to make that null and void?

Mr Hardeman: No.

Mr Bisson: So the question I ask is: This will then become the law, this will only apply on enactment of the law. So if the city of Timmins, after this law is enacted, wants to pass a bylaw on development charges they will have to get approval from the minister?

Mr Hardeman: If that bylaw on development charges raises the level of their present bylaw, it would require the approval of the minister. If they presently do not have a development charges bylaw, they could not implement one now without the minister's approval.

Mr Bisson: You realize that this really could lead to quite a political interference by the minister. This is really leaving the minister open to pressures by developers to—

Mr Bradley: Donate.

Mr Bisson: —donate to the minister. I guess I've got no other way of putting it. This is really a political clause. If I'm a developer and I've got an in with the Minister of Municipal Affairs, I can have the minister do all kinds of wonderful things for me through this. This is really developer-driven, isn't it?

Mr Hardeman: My answer would be no.

Mr Bisson: It better be or else you won't be the parliamentary assistant.

Mr Hardeman: That's not the way I would interpret this section.

Mr Bisson: Would you agree there is a danger that the minister could be put in a position, if he or she chose to be put in that position, to be friendly to a developer and to rule a particular bylaw of a municipality out of order? Not out of order, but make it null and void? Could it happen?

Mr Hardeman: This section does not give the minister the authority to deal with the existing bylaws that are in place or any municipality that, for their own reasons, decides to lower it.

Mr Bisson: That's not what I'm saying. What I'm saying is that if the city of Timmins was to pass a bylaw after this act is put into law that deals with development charges—in other words, increases development charges on soft services—the developer can go to the minister and have that whole thing overturned. It seems to me that the minister is being put in a position that he could be seen as the developers' minister. I think this is very political. I think this is dangerous.

Mr Bradley: Let me describe how it's a difficulty—

Mr Bisson: I'm trying to be polite here. That's the problem.

Mr Bradley: In the same vein, let me describe how it's a difficulty for the minister. It's almost a no-win situation for a minister. First of all, I think, for the municipalities, they're the losers in this, and the people who reside in the municipality who are already there, as opposed to the new people coming in.

It's very dangerous for a minister, because under our system, ministers may receive political donations. So that could influence a minister one way or another, and I'm not saying it in a detrimental way.

Mr Murdoch: Oh, now.

Mr Bradley: No, I'm saying in the opposite way. You have to listen carefully.

Mr Murdoch: I am listening carefully.

Mr Bradley: That may even in the opposite way influence a minister. In other words, a developer may ask, and may in the mind of the minister have a legitimate case in asking, that a charge be denied. However, that developer has either given a donation to the minister or to a member of the governing party or to the governing party, and the Globe and Mail searches the election finances commission and says, "Aha, this is the reason"; they draw this conclusion. So the minister, to be safe, if he has received or the government has received a substantial donation from the developer, might well turn down the request of the developer so it doesn't appear as though the minister is showing favouritism to that person. So it can happen. You see the position you place the minister in with this, because of our method of financial donations, and they are public, and developers are known to make donations.

So the problem the minister is faced with is—I can certainly understand the minister faced with this situation—does the minister want to read on the front page of the Globe and Mail that he prevented a municipality from raising—let's say, Owen Sound, because of the member across. He says to Owen Sound, "We're going to agree with you, Owen Sound, and not with the developer," because the minister is thinking in his mind, "If I take the developer's side and they see that the developer's donated to me," or in this case, the Conservative Party, if they're in power, that's going to influence the minister's decision, perhaps. You'd be surprised how that would. I would certainly, if I were the minister, think very carefully about showing any favouritism, even if I thought the person were right, if there was a perception out there that the reason was money donated.

When you give the minister this kind of power, that's what happens out there. That's where the minister's on the hook. That's where the minister faces maybe unfair criticism, maybe fair criticism.

Again, for the municipality, I think the municipalities are the losers. I wish AMO would tell the municipalities, since they're busy applauding parts of this bill—the officials of AMO, whose hands may be bruised from applause, should be telling the municipalities about this aspect of the bill.

Mr Murdoch: I don't think that'll happen, Jim.

Mr Sean G. Conway (Renfrew North): Let me hear from the parliamentary assistant again, because I think if I were a Boy Scout or a Girl Guide I'd be disposed to believe in this Pollyanna world of how development pressures operate. But you know, if you've had any experience in the real world—God, if you search the annals of the Ontario legislative history, when you go the library there's a stack of judicial inquiries and royal commissions into development politics, shall I say. So I think Mr Bradley does raise a concern for anybody who has a concern about what might happen here. But I also am struck by the fact that one of the fundamental principles in this policy, and the bill that springs from it, is more power to the people, and in a good, Jeffersonian way, more power to the city of Woodstock or the county of Oxford.

How is it that in this respect, the people of Oxford, whether they're a local school board or a local council, can't be trusted to make a reasonable judgement? And even where they make a less-than-perfect judgement, why shouldn't they be exposed to public pressure, at the local level, from developers and perspective homeowners or whomever that will have to pay the charges? I think we're all sensitive, on the basis of the testimony, to the problem here: that some people can't resist the temptation to pass along additional costs. But I just want to know, given what you've said about this policy: How again is it that the Oxford County Board of Education or the city of Woodstock just shouldn't be trusted here without the school-marmish oversight of the imperial authority at Queen's Park?

Mr Hardeman: I think throughout the bill and throughout the policies that we have put forward so far, the direction is for local autonomy because I and the government believe that we can trust the local municipalities. We have come to the conclusion during the review of the Development Charges Act that we should not have municipalities, under false pretences, be preparing new development charges bylaws that they implement and then find they would have to redo them when the Development Charges Act review was completed. We also recognize that there will be times, there will be circumstances in some municipalities where development charges will need to go up to accommodate the services that are needed for the development. Under those circumstances, the minister would grant an exemption to those municipalities to allow them to increase the development charges.

As you have stated, there are times when someone may take advantage of the situation. We are quite confident this section will not have to be used, but if someone was to implement development charges beyond the appropriate level, it will take a certain length of time for that development charge bylaw to come to the minister for review and approval. In that time, if they were erroneously collecting development charges, I think it's fair that those should be returned. And that's what this amendment does, is it provides the onus on a municipality that, under false pretences or under a drastic miscalculation, decided to charge fees that they were not entitled to charge. The bylaw would not be a legal bylaw of the municipality until it was approved by the minister. So if any municipality collected development charges under that bylaw, we think it's appropriate that they refund that development charge.

Mr Conway: Are you then saying—and I may have missed something earlier or that's carried elsewhere in the bill—but do I take it then from that response that this is entirely a transitional matter, that you and your minister on behalf of our provincial government have made it very clear to everyone that once the development charges review is completed and perhaps amendments are brought forward and the act is adjusted consistent with whatever that review produces, are you then telling everyone and would you tell the committee now that it would be the intention of the government to, at that point, surrender the kind of oversight provisions that are vested with the minister in this section?

Mr Hardeman: Yes. I think on every opportunity that the minister has had to speak to those that are affected by this policy it has been made abundantly clear. I'm not sure I can assure the committee that he has searched out every opportunity to speak on the subject, but on every opportunity where he did speak on the subject he made it quite clear to those involved that this was a transitional process to deal with the development charges while the Development Charges Act was being reviewed.

Mr Conway: So when the act is reviewed, it's the policy of the government that you will then surrender this oversight provision that this particular section of this act now gives you?

Mr Hardeman: Yes.

Mr Bisson: Did I understand you correctly? Let me take it the other way. Why not do this in the Development Charges Act when the Development Charges Act is amended? Could you not do it there?

Mr Hardeman: Again, we have to recognize that the Development Charges Act is not in the Legislature at the present time. It's being reviewed. It was the government's position that—Mr Bisson: We understand the argument.

Mr Hardeman:—this transition needed to be put in place for that review.

Mr Bisson: I understand what you're saying, this is transitional, but the specific question I'm asking is, could you not do this in the Development Charges Act if you chose to?

Mr Hardeman: In fact, it's just pointed out that it is an amendment to the Development Charges Act. We have opened the act to include this in it to put the transition—

Mr Bisson: That's right, yes. So it is in the Development Charges Act. The point I'm getting at is that it would be best dealt with when we deal with the Development Charges Act, because it seems to me what you're doing here is that you're giving the minister very broad powers to be able to interfere in the due process of a community when it comes to how it deals with development charges. If you have a philosophy that you want to adhere to in legislation, that should be part of the debate around DCA and not around this particular bill. I believe you're really opening up a can of worms here, that your minister can be quite frankly put in a hell of a lot of hot water over this issue. I don't understand the logic. You're saying the transition. When do you plan on bringing in the DCA?

Mr Hardeman: When the review is completed.

Mr Bisson: No, but next fall?

Mr Hardeman: Hopefully, yes.

Mr Bisson: Probably in the fall. Things aren't going to come to an end between now and next fall. Why the rush? Why do you have to do this now?

Mr Hardeman: As I mentioned earlier in my explanation, I think it's a great process and an expensive process for municipalities to develop a new development charge bylaw. We do not believe it's appropriate that they should be forced to do that if the development charges and the framework under which they're going to have to live with development charges changes dramatically in the review of the act. If we did not find a way to deal with the exceptional circumstances in the act to allow some bylaws to be increased without following the procedure of the present Development Charges Act, we would have no way of funding that infrastructure in a high-growth area.

Mr Bisson: I take it the government wants this to happen, but I'd only say this before we vote on it: Number one, I believe we should deal with this under the Development Charges Act. It's not an issue where you're going to have a raft of communities trying to pass bylaws dealing with this issue. They're probably very much in the minority, the cases that you have.

But I'd only say again that in the interim, until we get the changes made in the Development Charges Act, I can tell you we'll be watching very closely what happens here, because what you end up with, no matter what the minister decides when it comes to an application before him, depending on how the minister reacts with that, he can be in a conflict situation. The municipality passes a bylaw opposed to what you want in here, the minister says, "Well, I'm on the side with the developer," boy, oh boy, I don't think I need to draw any pictures for you. You can really end up in a heck of a lot of hot water over this. I would warn the government that this is not a good idea and you should hold this off until you do the Development Charges Act.

Mr Murdoch: Put it under advisement.

The Chair: Further discussion?

Mr Bisson: Well, Bill's got it under advisement.

The Chair: Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Ms Churley: I voted against.

The Chair: Yes. Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 49, as amended, carry? All those in favour? Opposed? Section 49, as amended, carries.

Section 50.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 5(1) of the Development Charges Act, as set out in section 50 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Effective date

"(1) A development charge bylaw approved by the minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing takes effect as of the later of,

"(a) the date on which the bylaw was passed; and

"(b) such other date as may be specified in the bylaw."

This motion is necessary to ensure that municipalities are not prohibited from collecting development charges between the time they pass the bylaw and the date upon which the minister approves the bylaw.

The Chair: Any discussion?

Mr Bisson: I'm not going to belittle the other point, but I'd only say on this, on the one hand you're saying as a government you want to put the power in the hands of the municipalities that do planning and leave them to do their jobs, but one of the ways they can do that, quite frankly, is how they levy fees on development charges and you're taking that away from them. So you're doing quite the opposite of what you're trying to accomplish generally in the bill.

Mr Bradley: Again, by limiting their ability, unfettered, to collect development charges or increase development charges, you're going to have more ill-advised developments.

I want to use an example that I share with people, and it annoys people locally perhaps from time to time, but I look in the middle of Beamsville and they've got subdivisions in the middle of Beamsville, if you can believe it. Beamsville is a small town, rural area, and the people moving in, I would bet, by and large, have nothing to do with Beamsville. There's not a new factory that went into Beamsville. There's not a new institutional development in Beamsville. They're building the houses for people who work in Toronto, or perhaps Hamilton, but more likely Toronto and the greater Toronto area.

So the Lincoln County Board of Education has pressure from people in the subdivision adjacent to increase the size of the school. They wouldn't have that pressure to increase the size of Senator Gibson school if it weren't for the fact that Beamsville is building houses for people who work in Toronto. There is no benefit to the community, outside of the short-term benefit, of the building that takes place, and that is a benefit, but beyond that there's not a benefit to the municipality, and they can't even recover it in future developments through development charges if the minister interferes and says, "You can't have these development charges," or "You're charging too much," or "There's something wrong with the way you did it."

So the municipality, in this case the taxpayers of Lincoln county, which exists for the purpose of education only, Lincoln county has to pick up the tab or there's just no increase in the size of the building and it certainly does, based on the number of people around, justify an increase in the size. When the last government was in power, they were pressuring the local MPP, and then they called me out because I was an opposition person then, and I have to tour the school and look at it and say, "Yes, indeed, this is so and I will speak to the government as well." So what happens is there's no real benefit.

Now, Mr Conway made reference to a document I made reference to by Dr Joseph Kushner—I don't know if he has it at hand—who is an economist at Brock University, a professor of economics. Far from a raving Liberal is Dr Kushner, certainly a small-c conservative, and when I dare to mention his name in the record of the Ontario Legislature as a person from whom I would take economics advice, he would deny me thrice, because he's that conservative and would feel I might be more inclined to spend slightly more money than he thinks government should.

But his paper, which is a technical type of economics paper, clearly demonstrates the cost of residential development to a community, and all these local politicians—not all of them, of course—who say, "We have to grow and expand and bring in new assessment and my city isn't great unless it's getting bigger every year," you find out that they are not benefiting from it, that in fact in this case, the people who work in Toronto may benefit from it. Those people may benefit, but the existing people in that community do not benefit from being a bedroom community.

Now, how does this relate back to the matter at hand, you say? The parliamentary assistant was wondering how I'd relate it back. It gets back to the prohibition, or the potential prohibition, on the part of the minister of a development charge to be imposed by a municipality, and that is why I think this aspect of this bill is wrongheaded and caters to the development industry.

Mr Conway: I just want to follow up on that example that Mr Bradley used about Beamsville.

Mr Murdoch: Don't use it, use another one.

Mr Conway: I don't want to be repetitive here.

Mr Murdoch: I know. That's what you are.

Laughter.

Mr Conway: Well, you laugh. You laugh, but, you know, any one of you could be a minister some day soon, and what I want to know—you see, I want some assurance from our pal Ernie that he's not exposing—

Interjection.

Mr Conway: Oh, I'm deadly serious. I'm deadly serious, because Bradley's example's a good example.

Listen, I want to be very fair to developers—very fair. I'm not here to be anti-development. But this is all about who pays. Now, we all represent shareholders who have said: "We are up to here. We're not paying any more. We're paying a lot less." That's I think a consensus to which most of us now subscribe. Now, it's one thing to say it. We just have to be able to act on it.

You have a colleague. He's the Minister of Education. He ought to be here for this, because if I were that minister, I'd want to make bloody sure that you're not doing something here that's going to put me in the Beamsville squeeze, or in the Cumberland squeeze, southeastern Ottawa, because Bradley's absolutely right. Once you allow these developments, and if your basic policy is that we want a pay-as-you-go development, meaning you are going to strip out provincial subsidies to a substantial extent, I just want to have some confidence that you, as part of the collective provincial government—for the moment I'm going to forget about the local government. As I said to you before, I haven't served on a local government, but I'd be awfully tempted, if I thought that you had, in this new environment, set me up for some costs, I think I'd be inclined to do one of two things: Say, "Here, Ernie, either you run this or I am opting out of some mandatory sanction of provincial policy X, Y or Z, because I'm not paying. I'm simply not going to go back to my taxpayers and say, 'Well, you've got a big bill here.' It's a bill that is consequent upon some decisions taken a few months ago or a couple of years ago." As the local reeve or the local alderman, as the local mayor, I'd be really inclined in the new world order to say, "I'm not paying and I'm not paying."

Back to my main point. I don't know how well you know, for example, some of the other capital grants plans of your own government. Now, they may be changing, and that might be a useful thing. Just as you're going to change the Development Charges Act, you might very well—it would be interesting, for example, since schools are often a flashpoint, and the example mentioned here in Beamsville speaks to that, it may very well be that you want to get up and announce on behalf of your government, "We have no capital dollars to commit to anything for five years," and just tell everybody that, including developers. "Just don't petition Frank Sheehan or Froese or any of these people, because, in all fairness, they have no money. There isn't any money in that account and won't be for a period of five to 10 years." We ought not to mislead people.

I'd just like some comment from you as to what kind of comfort you would be willing to provide your own colleagues in the provincial government that you're not setting them up, inadvertently or otherwise, for some bills of a significant kind that will be triggered by some of these initiatives that this bill contains, including the one that we're speaking to in this amendment.

Mr Hardeman: First of all, I want to say to Mr Conway that the education development charges are not affected by this legislation. They are in place as they were prior to Bill 20. It only affects the municipal part of the development charges.

I also want to point out that the amendment that we're presently speaking to is in fact the amendment to allow a development charge bylaw that's passed by a municipality to become effective the day it passes it. If at a subsequent date it is approved by the minister under the present Development Charges Act, the bylaw comes into effect the day of its passing. The municipality can then start charging development charges.

Under Bill 20, those development charge bylaws that require the development charges to be increased require ministerial approval, so they would not, unless approved in Bill 20, come into effect until the day of the approval of that bylaw by the minister. In effect, it would deprive a municipality of collecting development charges between the time that it passed the bylaw and the time that the minister approved it. This amendment is to deal with that time frame, that development charges will not be prohibited during the time that the bylaw is in transition between the municipality and the minister's office.

Mr Conway: I understand that. My point is that when you take this amendment, together with some of the others—I'm speaking to the basic policy question here, and I have to take what you tell me as government policy. I just raise the concern, because I think we can pretty well anticipate the results of the development charges review. I don't think one would have to be Einstein to anticipate what's coming there. All I'm saying is that, as a member of the provincial Legislature, I do not want to be voting for appropriations that were part of developments that you're now asking me to subsidize, and particularly subsidize after the fact, either as a citizen or as a local municipality.

Mr Hardeman: I would just like to add that I would not presume to know the results of review of the Development Charges Act before it is completed. I'm not sure that I could guess that today. I would hope that the review will come out with a compromise that everyone would like.

The Chair: Any further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question.

All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? Amendment carries.

Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 50, as amended, carries? All in favour? Contrary? Section 50, as amended, carries.

Section 51: Any comments, suggestions or amendments?

Mr Bradley: I recommend that the members of the committee vote against section 51 of the bill.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Bradley. If there's no further discussion, I'll put the question. Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 51 carries? All in favour?

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): What is the question?

The Chair: Section 51, are you in favour of it carrying?

Interjection.

The Chair: Well, she asked what the question was.

All those in favour that section 51 carries? Contrary?

Mr Bisson: I don't think Dr Galt voted.

Mr Doug Galt (Northumberland): No, I did earlier, at the first request.

The Chair: Section 51 carries. Section 52.

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 52(1) of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection to section 7 of the Development Charges Act:

"Effective date

"(1.3) An amendment approved by the minister takes effect as of the later of,

"(a) the date on which the amendment was passed; and

"(b) such other date as may be specified in the amendment."

The Chair: Seeing no discussion, all those in favour of the amendment? Mr Smith, all those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? Amendment carries.

Any further discussion on section 52?

Mr Bradley: Again, I recommend we vote against it.

The Chair: Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 52, as amended, carries? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 52, as amended, carries.

Section 53: Any further discussion? All those in favour of section 53 carrying? Contrary? Section 53 carries.

Section 54: Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 54 carries? All in favour? Contrary? Section 54 carries.

Section 55: Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 55 carries? All in favour? Contrary? Section 55 carries.

Mr Bradley: I think the Chair is prompting Conservative members to vote.

The Chair: No, I am informed by the clerk that there is not the option of not voting in committee.

Mr Bradley: I think I heard about that once, yes; not voting, that option.

The Chair: Section 56.

Ms Churley: Same vote.

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, not to go around and presume how people are going to vote, I don't know about the other members of the committee, but this government member is going to vote against this section.

Mr Bisson: You're actually going to vote against 56?

Mr Hardeman: Section 56. Mr Chairman, if I might, the amendment in fact removes a section that should be removed because of the changes in the minor variance process. We apologize. The government did not catch that one as they were going through the bill in the change for the minor variance. We commend the Liberal Party for bringing that to our attention and we will support your amendment to strike that section.

Mr Bisson: Just for the record, it's not an amendment. We were only recommending that you vote against.

Mr Hardeman: And we will take that recommendation.

The Chair: Any further discussion? Is it the favour of the committee that section 56 carries? All in favour?

Interjections.

The Chair: If we're free of distractions, all those in favour of this section? Contrary? The section is defeated. Section 57.

Mr Hardeman: I move that section 57 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Transition

"57. If a person or organization appeals a development charge bylaw passed on or before November 15, 1995, or an amendment passed on or before that date to such a bylaw, the appeal shall be determined in accordance with the law and the procedures of the municipal board as they existed on November 15, 1995. Subsections 4(3) to (12) and section 5 of the Development Charges Act, as they existed on November 15, 1995, continue to apply with respect to the matter being appealed and the decision of the municipal board."

Mr Chairman, it is appropriate for all the appeal rights regarding development charges passed prior to November 16 to come under the authority of the Development Charges Act legislation and not the authority of Bill 20. I believe they were passed at that time and appeals should proceed under the law of the day.

Mr Bradley: If I were, again—and I'm not—as suspicious perhaps as the member for Etobicoke West of matters that governments are involved in from time to time, I would wonder why—even though there's been an explanation, I would find it at least passing interesting—is that how you say that?—of passing interest that in fact in the case of the illegal apartments, as they were called, apartments in houses, the effective date is when the bill is proclaimed; however, when it comes to the development charges and the developers who are involved in them, it's then November 15, 1995. So it's a different set of rules for those people than it was for the other people.

I would have thought that, to be consistent in the bill, though I've heard the parliamentary assistant make his recommendation and allow his explanation, you would have retained the same thing. In other words, you would not have treated it differently. However, I understand what you've said. I appreciate the explanation that you have given. You've moved the grandparenting—I'm told I'm supposed to say "grandparenting"—

Ms Churley: Yes, thank you.

Mr Bradley: —provisions for basement apartments from November 15, but you've retained November 15 for lot levy charges. I would have thought consistency, at least, if there's any virtue in consistency, would have seen the dates similar for both; that is, the date of the proclamation of the bill.

There are going to be people out there, certainly not I, who would say that this was dictated by the development industry. I wouldn't want to believe that. I would want to believe the parliamentary assistant and his explanation, but I know there will be many people phoning my office tomorrow morning to ask me about this.

The Chair: Any further discussion?

Mr Bisson: Just on the same issue, it seems to me that if a municipality is passing a bylaw having to do with development charges, it does it as per the current law at the time that it's passing the bylaw. To ask that this be treated differently from anything else in this act I think is highly unfair to the municipalities, especially when you say the whole intent of this legislation is to streamline planning and to give power to the municipalities to let them deal with the questions of planning. You're not only taking a grab for power at this point on development charges, to the minister's benefit, but you're also saying it ain't going to be at the time of enactment; it's going to be way back when to November 15, 1995.

The last thing I would say is, my good friend from Etobicoke is here—

Mr Chris Stockwell (Etobicoke West): Like Bill 4, rent control.

Mr Bisson: No. That's exactly what I was going to get at. I remember when our government back in 1991 passed the rent control legislation and we grandfathered—it wouldn't even be grandfathered. We retroactively put in place the limit on rents back, I think, six to eight months. The Conservative Party of the day argued, I remember, on that committee—

Ms Churley: —went wild.

Mr Bisson: Went wild, and Chris Stockwell was a member. I remember at the time, and I think they made the point—

Mr Stockwell: Did you change your mind?

Mr Bisson: I'm just saying maybe we should have. The point I'm trying to get at—

Mr Stockwell: Oh, maybe, yes. Like my aunt; if she had different parts to her, she'd be my uncle.

Mr Bisson: I love you, Chris. The point that I'm trying to make is simply this: The Conservative Party of 1991 was opposed to the whole notion of doing anything in a retroactive manner. I sat on committee and I listened to the member for Etobicoke West, I listened to the now Finance minister and others in the House. I remember the Leader of the Opposition, the now Premier, standing up in the House and saying, "We are opposed to retroactivity and if we were the government we would not do that." Here you are, you're retroactively giving the power to the minister back to November 15, 1995. For the record, that is certainly in stark contrast to what you said in opposition. But that was then, this is now. Right?

Mr Hardeman: To make sure we all understand the amendment that we're speaking to, this applies to a development charge bylaw that was passed prior to this certain date. This amendment will provide the opportunity for those people who objected to that bylaw to be judged, based on the law that prevailed at the time the development charge bylaw was implemented and that was the law in force on that day. It will not be judged based on the amendments we make in Bill 20. This is to provide the—what shall we say?—grandparenting clause for the objectors to the development charge bylaw that was passed prior to November 15.

The Chair: Is there any further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Ms Churley: Point of order, Mr Chairman: We have a visitor. Does he have to vote? Is he not considered—

The Chair: No. He's not allowed to vote.

Ms Churley: Can he speak?

Mr Bradley: As Rod Lewis would say, there's a stranger in the house.

The Chair: Any member can speak when in committee, he just can't vote.

Mr Carr: He just came off the picket line.

Mr Stockwell: My arm's tired.

The Chair: Are there any further comments or amendments to section 57? Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 57, as amended, carry? All in favour? Contrary? Section 57, as amended, carried.

Section 58: Comments, suggestions or amendments?

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, if I might, since the opposition parties have both gone through this, I would at this point recommend the government members vote against this section.

Mr Bisson: You almost missed it, you know that. I wasn't saying a word.

The Chair: Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 58 carry? All those in favour? All those opposed? Section 58 fails.

Any comments, discussion or amendments on sections 59 through 70? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the pleasure of the committee that sections 59 through 70 carry? All in favour? Contrary? Sections 59 through 70 carry.

Section 71.

Mr Hardeman: Again I would recommend that the government would vote against this section. Recognizing that the government voted against sections 25 and 26 for the new minor variance provisions, this section is no longer required in the bill.

The Chair: Further discussion?

Mr Bisson: I would only say it seems to me this government is starting to take the form of an opposition party.

Ms Churley: Oh, I wish, I wish.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, is it the pleasure of the committee that section 71 carry? All in favour? Contrary? Section 71 is defeated.

Section 72. Comments?

Mr Hardeman: This section also applies to the same criteria as section 71 as it related to sections 25 and 26, and I would recommend that the government vote against this section.

The Chair: Further discussion? Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 72 carry? All in favour? Contrary? Section 72 is defeated.

Mr Hardeman: I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section:

"Regional Municipality of Waterloo Act

"72.1 Section 2 of the Regional Municipality of Waterloo Act is amended by adding the following subsections:

"Exception

"(2) The boundary between the city of Cambridge and the township of North Dumfries between,

"(a) the point on the centre line of the road allowance between concessions 9 and 10 (unopened) which is described on reference plan 67R-3098 registered in the land registry office for the registry division of Waterloo South as the southeasterly corner of part 4; and

"(b) the point that is the northeasterly limit of the King's Highway No. 8 as that highway is shown on deposited plan 807 deposited in the land registry office for the registry division of Waterloo South,

"is the line that begins at the centre line of the road allowance between concessions 9 and 10 (unopened) and ends at the northeasterly limit of the King's Highway No 8 as that highway is shown on deposited plan 807 deposited in the land registry office for the registry division of Waterloo South, as shown on plan 67G-984 and plan 67G-983, which plans are registered in the land registry office for the registry division of Waterloo South, and the continuation of the curve on plan 67G-983 across the King's Highway No 8, the curve having a radius of 1002.106 metres.

"Commencement

"(3) Subsection (2) shall be deemed to have come into force on January 1, 1973."

The Chair: Mr Hardeman, that motion is out of order.

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, I would ask for unanimous consent to introduce the motion.

Mr Bradley: Be like the Lieutenant Governor. Just nod.

The Chair: Any further discussion?

Mr Bradley: Yes, the discussion is this. First of all, I want to point out for the government members who are here that this is an example of the opposition being cooperative with the government. I know you think we're always obstinate.

Mr Murdoch: Never obstinate.

Mr Stockwell: Just most of the time.

Mr Bradley: For instance, had this request been made the day after members of the procedural affairs committee had made a certain motion to further harass members of the opposition, it would have been difficult to agree with this, but the parliamentary assistant has been so very cooperative today. Outside of one clash we've had here today, there's been a relatively quiet day, and we are delighted to be able to accommodate what is a reasonable request.

Speaking on the motion itself, however, one of the things I asked was, does this affect farm land, because I am one who believes that we should be retaining as much of the excellent farm land that we have in Ontario for two reasons: one, soil quality, and two, climatic conditions. I have voted over the years to retain as much farm land in Etobicoke West as possible.

But I should point out for members of the committee that the reason I would acquiesce to this is the following: The farm land has already been zoned for subdivisions. That may or may not be something I agree with, but it has been zoned for that purpose and I am not about to go back, having zoned it for that purpose, to say now that it should not be. Second, by ensuring that these lands are part of Cambridge and not of the township, it is likely that there would be more opportunity to confine development to the city and not have that development creeping out into the township. So I think there is some virtue to that happening. This amendment, as I understand it and as you have explained it, clarifies the southern boundary of Cambridge to ensure that a proposed road and the approved subdivisions are part of Cambridge.

I should also note another reason I think it's reasonable to agree with this motion is that Waterloo region, as independent observers have indicated, has a pretty good record for the protection of prime agricultural land. I think with that in mind, with the planning department there with that reputation and the council, we are prepared to agree to this particular motion and are quite willing to cooperate by having it included as part of this bill.

Ms Churley: I would like to thank Uncle Jim for doing such good homework for us all on this amendment, because it was just presented to us today and we didn't really have much of an opportunity to delve into the background. I'm going to take it on good faith and trust that Jim's staff did good research here.

Mr Stockwell: She might trust your staff.

Ms Churley: Yes, I'm going to trust the staff really; that they did good research here and that there's not something that we don't know lacking from this research and we end up voting for something that we will regret. Could I ask the parliamentary assistant, there are no tricks here, are there? I mean, Mr Bradley is correct, is he?

Mr Stockwell: Talk about a penetrating question.

Ms Churley: Might as well get it on the table.

Mr Stockwell: No tricks here.

Mr Hardeman: I find it somewhat disturbing that I would have to answer such a question so often in one day. No, there is absolutely nothing in this amendment put forward that changes anything as it's on the ground today. As Mr Bradley mentioned, the land that is being referred to is in fact already zoned for the subdivision. A major portion of it is already built on. The problem arose that there was a border that was inadvertently put in the wrong place in 1973 and the—

Ms Churley: In 1973? Who was in government then?

Mr Hardeman: In 1973, when the Regional Municipality of Waterloo Act was put through, it was inadvertently put in the wrong place. That's why it requires retroactivity, because of the fact that the houses are already there and the development has already taken place. We want to thank the opposition parties for unanimous consent to allow us to put this in the bill and clear up this long-standing problem in the region of Waterloo.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the favour of this committee that this amendment pass? All in favour? Contrary? The amendment carries.

Section 73.

Mr Hardeman: I would recommend again that the government vote against section 73. Again it comes for the same reason, because of the changes we made this morning in sections 25 and 26.

The Chair: Further discussion? Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 73 carries? All those in favour? Contrary? Section 73 fails.

Section 74.

Mr Bradley: Do I have an amendment? I do have.

I move that subsection 74(1) of the bill be amended by striking out "on a day to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor" and substituting "on the day all new policy statements under section 3 are signed by the Lieutenant Governor."

Let me explain why I move this motion. This is an extremely important motion that has really arisen out of many of the submissions which were made to the committee and also a personal view that it is dangerous to pass a bill of this kind until such time as we have seen the policy statements of the government. In fact there are many people who would, perhaps with some justification, contend that the policy statements may even be more important than the bill itself.

Certainly the earlier argument that took place between the opposition and government members over "have regard to" or "be consistent with," those two general wordings, to a certain extent was based on its own merits, but also, if you have in the bill "have regard to," it would be nice to have very specific policy statements. From many of the people I asked about this, whether in committee or otherwise, "Would you prefer to see all of the policy statements completed in their final form before this legislation comes before the House?" the answer would be yes.

I recognize it's unlikely the government is going to do that, so I am suggesting, as the amendment suggests, "on a day to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor" was what it was going to be, and substituting, "on the day all new policy statements under section 3 are signed by the Lieutenant Governor." In other words, the Lieutenant Governor is involved in it, but it's when he signs the policy statements, not necessarily when the bill passes.

I think the policy statements are going to have significant ramifications for Ontario. The early indications of the contents of those statements tell me that the government wishes to weaken the environmental regulations. When I read various pieces of literature—I read a headline the other day from a newspaper, I think in Wellandport, where one of the government members said that the Niagara Escarpment Commission was as good as gone, or something like that. I wish I had it in front of me—

Ms Churley: Who said that?

Mr Bradley: —but one of the government members said that, a colleague of the member for Grey-Owen Sound, who has never been a fan of the escarpment commission and expressed some similar—

Mr Murdoch: I didn't say that.

Mr Bradley: No, he did not say that. He was reported in the Owen Sound Sun Times rather as saying that the minister told him he would like what she was going to do with the Niagara Escarpment Commission.

Mr Murdoch: That's right.

Mr Bradley: But another member who is in charge of deregulating Ontario made a statement that the Niagara Escarpment Commission was as good as gone or would disappear, some words of that nature.

Mr Murdoch: Music to my ears.

Mr Bradley: Not Dr Galt; I will say it's not Dr Galt. I really believe that you can test the government's commitment to environmental protection based upon the contents of those statements, and as I've indicated, the early indications are that there is nothing but a weakening of those statements as a choice. I like to see those. I've called for those for many years. Many people of all political stripes have lamented in my own area the loss of prime agricultural land in an area which has both good soils and very favourable climatic conditions. The combination is what is most important there.

Mr Murdoch: You have to be able to make money, though.

Mr Bradley: I agree with the member. The member interjects appropriately that farmers have to be able to make money on it, and I think we all have an obligation to assist them with whatever policies we can to make money in the business of farming. I have always been supportive of that in any way I could be. I don't believe in our area of the province, for instance—I won't get into an argument over other areas—that economic severances provide a long-term answer to the farmers, and really represent death by a thousand cuts for farm land in Niagara region.

When I first came to Toronto as a member of the Legislature eighteen and a half years ago, the amount of farm land in existence then was far greater than now, and now we see Stoney Creek and Grimsby subdivisions—once again not for people working in Grimsby but for people working in Toronto so they become bedroom communities—and all these less than attractive warehouses along the Queen Elizabeth highway where beautiful farm land and farms used to exist.

I think this is a very important motion and I would have hoped the government members would support this motion. They will have their marching orders from the whip, as all government members do in all governments.

Mr Murdoch: Not from the whip. From somebody else.

Mr Bradley: Well, from whomever. From the Premier's office, ultimately; the Premier's office makes this decision. You'll be told how to vote on this and you'll be told to vote against it, which is most unfortunate, because I think some members of the committee, in their heart of hearts, as the former Premier used to say, would probably believe this is a reasonable motion.

I think the only way, in the long term, to meet our environmental challenges is to have strong policy statements. I for one, before I vote finally on this bill, would have liked to see those policy statements in their final form, because I can't believe the government would be unwise enough to approve them in their draft form, as weak as they are at this time.

It is a very fair motion, I think, that I'm putting forward. I hope to see the nod of acquiescence from the parliamentary assistant, though I think the only nod I would see is if he were nodding off at this time, I'm afraid. But where there is life, there is hope, and I now leave it in the hands of the governing authorities of this province.

Mr Bisson: I'm coming at it from a bit of a different perspective. Anybody who presented to this committee on the issue of going to "have regard to" from "be consistent with," whether they were in favour or opposed, all said the same thing: You have to have clear policy. The people who came in and said they supported the government on moving towards "have regard to" said it is important that the government have clear policy so we know what we need to do to be in compliance with those policies.

I would argue that the Liberal motion would put pressure on the government to make sure they finish the work on the provincial policies. It would give them an incentive to make sure they finish the consultation so that the draft policies we have now are finished, and when the act comes into play you actually have an act as Bill 20 that is in compliance with the new draft policies.

The problem you're going to be into right now is that you will be working with an act that is having regard to policies enacted under Bill 163 that the government says are too onerous. What am I to think as a developer? Am I going to be working with the old policy? Will I be working with your draft policy? Do I work towards what I think might be your policy? You're really leaving the whole question of what policy to work with quite ambiguous. I think it would make a lot of sense for the government to support this motion, because it would keep you consistent with what you're trying to do.

The other argument I would put forward is that in the title of the bill, the government is very clear. They say the act is to promote economic growth and to protect the environment. Well, if you're serious about protecting the environment, why is it that you didn't entrench that in a purpose clause? You didn't, so the New Democratic Party brought forward an amendment that said we wanted a section in the bill that entrenched the title of the bill so that when you're making decisions, you have to take the environment and economic matters as being equal. You rejected that, so we're led to believe you're not very serious about environmental issues as they take precedence over economic issues. In the very least, if you support this motion, you will be sending some message to people out in the environmental community and to people who care about that issue that you're prepared to do a very minimum when it comes to clarifying what should and what shouldn't happen in terms of planning when it comes to environmental issues.

It brings us back to this whole notion of having a Planning Act that really has policies with no teeth. I'm not going to go into that debate again. I think it's sufficient to say that we oppose that. We would rather you stay consistent. I ask the members to reconsider. This motion is not opposite to what you're trying to do in the bill; in fact, I think it would strengthen your bill and would make it look at least as if you're making a serious attempt to clarify things for developers and planners in this province.

Ms Churley: I come at this from a slightly different direction too from both my Liberal and my NDP colleague. I support the resolution, but I don't think it's as significant as either of my colleagues say. What I would have preferred to have seen, as I've stated before, is that if you didn't like the policy statement under Bill 163—leaving aside the guidelines, which I know people mix up with the policy statement. We haven't had a chance to find out how those policy statements would be applied and whether they would work, and we figured there would have to be some changes, but if you didn't like them, the sensible thing would have been to work on the policy statement, try to reach a broad consensus, do proper consultation with people on all sides of the issue and then determine that it would make sense to support the "be consistent with" policy as opposed to have regard for." My view is this bill does not have any teeth when it comes to the environment anyway, because I feel very strongly that no matter what the policy statement says—it can have fabulous environmental protection policy within it—if nobody has to pay attention to that, that you just have to "have regard to" it and then throw it aside and say, "We looked at it," then it doesn't really have teeth.

I know Mr Bradley, my Liberal colleague, doesn't agree with that. We've had a disagreement.

Mr Bradley: Oh, I agree with that.

Ms Churley: You do agree with that? Oh, it was Mr Conway, that's right. Let me clarify that, because this is on the record. Mr Bradley did support that.

Mr Bradley: I voted for "be consistent with."

Ms Churley: Yes. I believe, however, that Mr Bradley has a little more faith in this government, that if they come up with a strong policy statement it will actually make a difference in the determination of development and sound environmental policies. I don't believe that's going to happen. I'll vote for this, but (a) it's not going to pass and (b), even if it does, I really don't think it's going to solve our problem.

I want to come back to a letter written on January 31, 1996, by Kathleen Cooper from the Canadian Environmental Law Association. If you recall, Mr Chair, you weren't here at that time but the Vice-Chair was in the chair. We got into a bit of a shemozzle over what consultations were done, with whom and when; I know some clarifications were made after. Since then, she wrote a letter, copied to Ms Elliott. She sent it to us, and I want to read something she said. She declines the invitation to be involved with the—let me see, what is it you call the committee that's been put together by Dr Galt to consult on the policy framework? That's what this is in response to.

She says: "As you are aware, CELA has participated in the process of redesigning an improved land use process over the past four years. We have produced many written proposals, worked with hundreds of people and spent thousands of hours in consultations across the province. During this process, many tradeoffs and compromises were made...on both sides. However, having participated in good faith through that long process in an attempt to defend the public interest in environmental protection, we are dismayed at your government's virtual gutting of the Planning Act reforms."

"The draft policy statement similarly represents sweeping roll-backs, preventing a modern approach to planning. Given the evident direction of your government and the extensive materials already provided to the government of Ontario regarding CELA's views on this subject, we do not believe further verbal consultations will be fruitful at this time."

The second page is missing here, but she goes on to say that CELA will participate in written form.

I think that sums it up. What clearly is a problem here is that it's after the fact. You are now consulting with people who were barely consulted, whose views are not represented in this bill. No amendments were accepted today that encompass the environmental concerns. I don't blame Ms Cooper and others for feeling that this policy statement is really not going to be that significant, although I would like to see it improved. I agree that the draft policy statement is not sufficient and is a significant roll-back in environmental protection, and I hope you will look at CELA's written material and take into consideration the views of the environmentalists and make sure it is reflected in the policy statement.

But as I said, I have great fears that no matter how wonderful it looks, it will be so easily disregarded, that if you do come out with an improved environmental protection policy statement that you might be able to hold up and say, "We believe in the environment; look at how good our policy statement is," you'll then proceed to ignore it. I fear that's what is going to happen with this, but I'll support the motion anyway.

Mr Hardeman: I, as a member of the government side, will not be supporting this motion. We think it inappropriate to tie the proclamation day to a different day than the signing, recognizing that all sorts of unforeseen things can happen to processes and policy statements, recognizing that we do have the policy statements in circulation now for public consultation and we have every confidence that will be concluded at the time the bill would receive proclamation.

Having said that, if that should not happen, the present policy statements would be in effect and would govern the planning process as it relates to Bill 20. The policy statements would be the provincial policy statements until they're changed by regulation, so we do not see the need for that change at this time. We think the motion is somewhat ill-conceived.

Mr Bisson: "Ill-conceived" is a bit strong. That you don't agree with it I think would be better.

Mr Hardeman: Yes, I don't agree with the motion.

Mr Bisson: That's better.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? I deem the amendment to fail.

Further amendments?

Mr Hardeman: I move that subsection 74(3) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Royal assent

"(3) Sections 47, 53 to 56 and 60 to 70 come into force on the day this act receives royal assent."

This is an amendment to deal with the Development Charges Act, to make sure they all come into force on the same day.

The Chair: Any further discussion? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment carries.

I will now put the question on section 74, as amended. Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 74, as amended, carry? All in favour? All those opposed? Section 74, as amended, carries.

Section 75, Ms Churley.

Ms Churley: Is this the last motion of the day?

The Chair: It is the last motion.

Ms Churley: I move that section 75 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Short title

"75 The short title of this act is the Promotion of Urban Sprawl Act."

You may think this is a bit mischievous, but one could even add to it: the Promotion of Urban Sprawl and Environmental Destruction Act. If somebody wants to make a friendly amendment, I would be happy to accept that.

I'm going to start by talking about the lack of consultation throughout the development of this draft bill, which we know will soon be passed. It became very clear during the process of the public hearings that the people who were listened to and the people who got the changes and practically everything they desired were developers and I guess you could say pro-development municipalities, and everybody else got left out. We heard that time and time again. In fact, I asked specific questions, and it's in the record, to some select developers: "Were you consulted? Are you satisfied with the bill? Were your concerns and desires expressed in the bill?" and everybody I asked on that side said yes. When I asked other people, environmentalists and community groups, both in the environmental areas and the housing areas, they all said no.

This is not a balanced bill. It's very unfair in terms of the consultation. We spent four years in various forums consulting with all the people all over Ontario. Nobody was totally happy on either side. There were compromises made on both sides. Sure, some people weren't happy. That became very clear. A lot of developers weren't happy—not all; there were some in support. The environmentalists made some concessions as well. They were bitterly opposed to some of the changes we made to try to strike a balance, but at the end of the day felt they could live with them and felt that at least they had been consulted with and listened to. I'm very disappointed that you weren't able to incorporate at least some of the issues brought forward by environmentalists. People who have great expertise and have been working in this area for a long time were left out.

During our public hearings, Mr Murdoch said when the Ontario naturalists were here—and he may recall that they gave an excellent brief. They discussed their disappointment at the destruction of the environment part of the bill and made some recommendations. I can't remember the context, but I said something and Mr Murdoch said that during clause-by-clause their brief would be well-used and considered. Remember saying that?

I have this document in front of me, and if we go through it, we see that only one of their concerns—and I didn't hear Mr Murdoch refer to this document in the whole two days of clause-by-clause. In fact, I didn't hear Mr Murdoch say much of anything, to my surprise. All I can conclude is that he's very happy with the bill, and that in itself makes me very nervous.

I have here in front of me today—I wanted to be reminded a little of Mr Murdoch's past and his involvement with severances in Grey county.

Mr Murdoch: You're going to get it all on the record.

Ms Churley: I have a little bit of history in my hands dating back to when Mr Bradley was the Liberal Environment minister.

Mr Bradley: So popular in Grey county, as I recall.

Ms Churley: You were so popular in Grey county. As I was reminded today, he had asked for the Ontario Environmental Assessment Advisory Committee—is that what it's called?

Mr Bradley: Yes. A wonderful group, now disbanded by this government.

Ms Churley: Exactly, now disbanded by this government, and I wonder if Mr Murdoch had a say in that. He had asked that they look into the situation in Grey county and in particular to look at what was happening in the Sydenham Mills investment group, which we know very well was a disaster. The taxpayers ended up spending tons of money, probably millions of dollars, reacting to very bad planning which Mr Murdoch had a big hand in, although I understand he had to declare a conflict and remove himself from that situation.

Mr Murdoch: I did not.

Ms Churley: If he didn't declare a conflict, I know he must have withdrawn from his financial interest, because one way or another he had to step aside from that. It's all documented here. It's very clear, from going through the records, that Mr Murdoch in Grey county was very involved in severances and breaking up farm land to create more and more development. I fear that Mr Murdoch's dreams have practically come true in this bill, which makes me extremely leery of the bill.

When we formed the government in 1990, shortly after that Minister Grier, Minister of the Environment at the time, and Minister Cooke, Minister of Municipal Affairs, were forced—I believe they took a plane into the Grey county area to take a look. They were receiving so many complaints from the community about what was going on that they had to go in there and take a look and declared a provincial interest and forced that municipality for the first time to actually come up with an official plan.

Mr Murdoch: You're not right, Marilyn. You're putting it on the record and you're not right.

Ms Churley: Do they not have an official plan yet?

Mr Murdoch: They had one before that.

Ms Churley: Well, they were forced to redo that official plan. Now, I fear, with this bill we are going to go back to the same kind of devastatingly bad planning that happened in that area before, especially since they just have to "have regard to" provincial policy which we haven't even seen yet.

Now I want to come to the role of the Ministry of the Environment in this whole debate. My colleagues and I asked, for several days during the public hearings, if we could have the Minister of Environment and Energy and the Minister of Natural Resources in here to answer questions and respond to some of the issues we were raising. We were repeatedly voted down by the government members. Dr Galt, who is still here, said that he could and would be representing—I believe that's how he put it—the Minister of Environment, so she did not need to be here. I haven't heard a word from Dr Galt all day, or yesterday.

Our side, both the Liberals and the NDP, have repeatedly brought up problems with the environmental contents or lack thereof in this bill. We haven't heard a peep out of the parliamentary assistant to try to justify or explain; or sometimes, I would expect, given his role and his position, he would have to vote with the opposition in some of these cases. How can he sit there and vote with the government time and time again on amendments and on a bill that is actually going to be very destructive for the environment?

I will end by saying that I think this whole bill should be thrown out. You should start all over again. I know you're not going to do that, because you've listened to your developer friends. They've gotten practically everything they asked for. They're very happy with this bill. Some asked for a little more.

But I can assure you that there is going to be more urban sprawl. Thus my proposed title. Let's call it what it really is here. Let's not pretend, as you have in the title, that this has anything to do with environmental protection. That's such a sham, and people are soon going to realize that. I think we should at least be upfront with the title. You wouldn't accept our amendment earlier on to strengthen the environmental aspects of the bill. There are all kinds of clauses in here that will very definitely contribute to urban sprawl, which we well know will cost more to the taxpayer and is bad for the environment. It might make some quick bucks for a few developers, but down the road our children and our grandchildren and beyond that are going to be paying for the terrible mistakes we make today, all for the sake of some people making—

Interjection.

Ms Churley: I see Dr Galt is now muttering something over there. I hope he was contributing something positive to the debate over here. I believe he said something about fixing the mistakes the last government made. I hope I'm wrong, because I would expect that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of the Environment would at least have some concerns about—

Mr Bradley: Is there still a Ministry of the Environment?

Ms Churley: There's still a little bit of the ministry over there, although nobody can find the minister herself these days; nobody knows where she is.

This bill guts all the environmental protection. I know the members don't take it seriously, and that upsets me.

Mrs Fisher: You don't know that. You think you know that.

Ms Churley: Well, I'm sitting here watching people laugh as I make these statements. Some of those members are in denial, including Ms Fisher, absolute denial about the realities of the environmental degradation that's going to happen as a result of this bill. Time and time again during the hearings she would say, oh so innocently: "This bill has all kinds of environmental protections in it. We haven't taken a thing out." If you look at the bill, that's not correct, and if she hasn't figured that out by now, there's something wrong.

Mr Chair, I'm really disappointed that we've been reduced to this state in the province of Ontario, this, coupled with a lot of the other environmental protection deregulation that's going on, for instance, the deep cuts to the conservation authorities and the fact that they can now sell off land; the firing of staff at both the Ministry of Environment and Energy and Natural Resources. The many, many aspects of deregulation that's happening throughout the government are going to cause tremendous harm to the environment.

I will conclude by saying, and mark my words on this, the public cares about environmental protection. Poll after poll shows that. Right now, you don't see it high on the list of things that people are most concerned about. There's this general assumption now that the government is protecting their environment and their health. Even with the Conservatives before you and then with the Liberals and with our government, there was progressively, in some cases slower than others, new and better environmental protection, and that came from the ground up, the environmentalists and the community pushing government, pushing government hard to create better environmental laws.

The over 20, 30 years of environmental protection that's been built up in this province is being wiped out right under our noses. Most of the public aren't aware of what's happening here, but I can guarantee you that when they do find out, there's going to be a price to be paid and you will pay it. You will see that over the term of your government people, as they find out what's happening to environmental protection, will respond swiftly and loudly.

I know that I'm not going to change anybody's mind here today, but I want to say how very disappointed I am that you went ahead and completely gutted environmental protection in this bill.

I see my colleague Mr Bradley looking at the clock here to hopefully time his remarks.

Mr Bradley: Thank you very much for the opportunity to offer some observations, at the conclusion of this bill, on the motion moved by Ms Churley that the short title of this act be referred to as the Promotion of Urban Sprawl Act. There's no question that the bill could have many different names. The last name I would call it would be the name which has been given to the bill, which is "An Act to promote economic growth and protect the environment by streamlining the land use planning and development system through amendments related to planning, development, municipal and heritage matters." I would agree that it is designed to promote economic growth, at least in the short term, so that part of the title I would agree with. I think the better title selection would be the one the member for Riverdale has suggested. They will, no doubt, be tipping the champagne glasses back in the Albany Club, when this bill finally passes, where the developers gather to cheer on those who have done their bidding in the government.

It's most unfortunate that within the government caucus, where I know there must be some dissenting views, those views have not been loud enough or powerful enough to see this bill amended in some ways that I think would be beneficial to the province. I note, not in a personal way but in a lamenting way, the fact that the member for Middlesex, who knows much better than I about planning matters—is a professional planner, is appropriately educated for that and has the detailed experience—has not had an opportunity to participate in this debate, though I would have benefited immensely from his interventions, particularly in those matters which are technical, perhaps not always the matters that are philosophical, but in many of the practical matters. I lament the fact that through this process, the government has chosen only on a few occasions to make changes to the bill which I believe would be of benefit.

The consultation process is always a controversial one. There are going to be those who say it took too long and those who say it took too short a time. I would say that quite obviously, regardless of who was consulted, the development industry is the clear winner. When they appeared before the committee and we asked them, they were enthusiastic in their support, and I don't blame them for being enthusiastic in their support of this bill; though not entirely supportive, they were enthusiastic in their support.

Those who are in the other aspects of our society were disappointed in certain aspects of the bill, some disappointed in all aspects of the bill. I do not believe that there was a meaningful consultation because what ultimately emerged was a bill that clearly favoured one side in the development debate.

This bill, in my view, provides further opportunities for some of the good old boys to favour their friends and supporters with development and planning decisions at the local level. While the overwhelming majority will not be doing this, it does open the door to those who would see fit to do so. So I can understand the enthusiasm of those who see their own power to favour their friends increased rather significantly.

I think there are several significant points. The heart of the bill revolves around the controversial issue of whether "be consistent with" or "have regard to" shall be included in the bill. Those who are on one side, the pro-development people, are going to agree with "have regard to." I also respect the fact that there are others who aren't necessarily pro-development, as the parliamentary assistant and others have suggested, who believe that "have regard to" allows more flexibility to deal with planning and development matters in areas of the province where there are differences from, say, the major metropolitan centres.

I respect that view, I don't necessarily agree with it. I don't look at it as sinister, but given the preference, I would certainly prefer "be consistent with." I believe that sets out a much clearer policy and I believe in the long run that causes fewer disputes than when you have a clause "have regard to" which is more subject to various interpretations.

I am not satisfied that this bill provides protection for agricultural and environmentally sensitive land. I think there's a major issue in this province about retaining good agricultural land. There isn't much left. They're not making more agricultural land, the last I heard. So what we have is what we have.

There's a combination in southern Ontario that we have both relatively good soils in most places and favourable climatic conditions. You look at Canada and people say, "Canada is a great country; it's a huge country." Two thirds of Canada is not suitable for growing crops. Two thirds of Canada is not really suitable for agricultural purposes—rural land, perhaps, but not for agricultural purposes, and I'm probably erring on the generous side. It's probably more like a quarter to an eighth of the land in this country that's really suitable for agricultural purposes.

That's why it's important to protect what we have, not only for this generation but for future generations, and to provide competition for those who are outside of our province and trying to sell to our province. It helps in our pricing.

I don't think that this bill promotes the protection of agricultural and environmentally sensitive land as it should. I include in that wetlands, which are so nice to have within various parts of our province.

I am concerned about the aspect of the bill that prohibits the Ministry of Environment and Energy, the Ministry of Natural Resources and the Ministry of Agriculture, Food and Rural Affairs from appealing directly to the OMB; they have to appeal instead to the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing.

Take my word for it, the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing is not primarily concerned with protecting the environment or environmentally sensitive areas or agricultural land. It is to deal with municipalities and it is to produce housing developments. That is what it's there for.

I respect that it has a role to play in government; I respect the people in that ministry. I simply say that it would have been preferable to permit various ministries to look carefully at the plan, consult one another, and if there's not a resolution of the differences between the ministries, have them have an opportunity to make representations by means of an appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board.

It doesn't deal adequately with severances, and this gets into the motion the member has before us, in terms of urban sprawl. I don't believe that you can give out severances like candies in this province and have good planning. I don't think there's a tough enough policy on severances contained in this bill.

I believe that it will be detrimental for the downtown areas of many of our communities. I speak of my own city and I wish our downtown area were much more vibrant than it is now. As long as we have developments on the periphery of the city—commercial and residential and business developments—we're going to see continued deterioration of downtown areas across this province. This bill, instead of protecting against that, instead of trying to reverse that trend, will in fact accentuate that trend.

I do not believe that the cutting of times you have mentioned is reasonable in light of the fact that you are cutting staff. The provincial government, for reasons it deems appropriate—I do not agree with them because I believe that the policies are ill conceived—is making significant, substantial cuts in funding to municipalities, and in its own ministries, to be fair. It seems to me that is going to be reflected in that there are fewer members of staff to deal with the development proposals that come forward, and yet this bill shortens the length of time these people have to deal with those proposals. That, in my view, means what we're going to have are proposals that don't receive the appropriate amount of scrutiny and analysis by various levels of government, by the planning departments and engineering departments, both municipally and provincially. The staff goes as well for conservation authorities and other agencies, boards and commissions which are involved in commenting.

Lastly, I believe that the development charges change is not a positive change. It reflects the concerns of the development industry, it seems to me, at the very time that you are cutting funding to the municipalities, you are largely doing it to the degree you are and with the speed you are to fulfil a promise to cut taxes, provincial income taxes, which will of course involve the borrowing of over $20 billion and an additional over $20 billion added on to the provincial debt load as a result of borrowing that money to give the money back to me and to you. That is what the agenda is all about, and the development charges are only a way that municipalities can have to recover some of the funding they are losing as a result of the drastic cuts in provincial funding.

Though it's not part of the bill—it was an amendment I moved near the end—I believe that it is not useful to have this bill pass in the Legislature before we see the final versions of those policy statements which, by the way, I believe are being weakened rather than strengthened through a less than satisfactory consultation process being undertaken by this government.

I do support this motion because I think the suggested title of this bill is better reflected in the motion of the member for Riverdale than it is in the title that we find on the outside of this bill.

Mr Bisson: This is the last opportunity we're going to have to speak on the contents of this bill, in committee of the whole, anyways; we'll get one more shot at third reading.

For the record in regard to this particular section, I just want to say that it comes back to the argument that the government proposed a bill in this House last fall that has a title that says basically that they want to promote economic growth and they want to protect the environment by streamlining the land use planning system. If your intent is to do that, it seems to me it should be not only in the bill but actually in the title as well.

You're moving forward with the short title of the bill where you're not really putting any kind of emphasis on a balance between protecting the environment and streamlining the planning process for the good of the people. I would say to you simply that the very least you're able to do is to look at your title in order to try to find some way to send a message out there that this government really does believe in protecting the environment and is really not as pro-development as it's made out to be. If you don't do that, I'm led to believe the opposite.

Our motion I think is trying to point out the obvious. This bill, very simply, is a pro-development bill. That's your right. You're the government, you have more seats in the House than we do, but I don't think that makes it right for the development industry and I don't think that makes it right for the people of this province.

What are you doing in this bill? You're going to have policies that you're changing that you're going to weaken when it comes to the standards about how provincial policies are applied in this province. Not only how they are applied, but the content of those policies are going to be weakened. Are we well served by that? I think not.

I would agree with the government that maybe the prior policies under 163 needed to be worked on. They were large; there was 700-some-odd pages of policy that could have been—

Ms Churley: No, no, no. That was the guidelines. That was not the policy statement.

Mr Bisson: Let me finish.

Mr Bradley: There's a squabble going on here.

Mr Bisson: There's a squabble going on between our two colleagues here. But the point I'm getting at is that I'm prepared, as a member of our party, to work with you in order to strengthen the policies so that developers and planners have a clear understanding of what those policies are, so that we really have rules that make some sense to the people out in the development industry but, at the same time, protect our environment. I think we need to keep that in mind.

I would say what both of my colleagues said before: To have policies and not having to be consistent with those policies I think is a wrong way to go. "Having regard to" is really going to mean exactly that; it's going to be raised to the lowest standard of those policies with municipalities across the province of Ontario. It really takes away the balance that you need. I think if anything happened under the previous government in regard to planning, most would agree it was the most extensive consultation process in the history of planning in this province, both under the Sewell commission and the work that was done under Bill 163. And what was that all about?

I just want to go back and read what the order in council basically said when we put forward the Sewell commission:

"The government of Ontario believes that the planning and development process should recognize and support environmental, agricultural and other public interests.

"The government of Ontario believes that an inquiry will provide policy recommendations which will assist the government in making the planning and development process more fair, open and accountable."

I think one thing that you're doing in this is that in some ways you're flying in the face of that. It really smacks this bill that it's going to be a pro-development bill, not one that's going to be fair as to how it treats the environment.

"...to examine the relationship between the public and private interests in land use and development,

"to inquire into, report upon and make recommendations on legislative changes or other actions or both, needed to restore confidence in the integrity of the land use planning system..."

I don't think that you could have integrity when you've got a bill that smacks so strongly of being a pro-development bill. If you want to encourage economic activity, I think there are all kinds of opportunities to do that, both within the development industry but also within others. I don't see the government on others. Quite frankly, you're cancelling all the economic development programs that we have throughout the province.

I would just say one thing, just a little bit on the side. I remember in the last provincial election, Conservatives in northern Ontario running as candidates. One of the platforms that they ran on was of allowing severances to happen basically at will. I saw that in my riding. I know my colleague from Sudbury East, Shelley Martel, saw that, where they were very well organized in making sure that people got the message that the NDP was against severances of all kinds and the Conservatives would fix this problem by scrapping Bill 163, and they would just allow those severances to happen.

I would say the government didn't do that, thank God, in this bill, because I think allowing that to happen would have been a step in the wrong direction. But I would say that there are people in my riding who are now feeling as if they've been misled. When I was back in the riding last weekend, one of the people that wanted to have a severance done when we were in government was really looking forward to this bill fixing his problem. It did not do that, and he wanted me to bring back to the Legislature his disapproval of what the government's actions are. I don't agree with him. I think that we were right, under the old policies, not to allow that severance. But I would say you can't run an election the way that happened last time, knowing full well that you couldn't keep that campaign promise. There was just no way that you can go to that kind of policy.

The last point I would want to make to members is simply this: We as politicians are viewed by the public in a very negative way. I think over the number of years, people look in at the Legislature and its committees and they say: "Jeez, look at the legislators. Are they really representing our interests or are they representing the interests specifically only of their party? And isn't this really all about partisan politics?" I think what we've seen in this committee over the last couple of days is an unwillingness on the part of the government to allow its members to really contribute to strengthening this bill.

I know there are people on the other side, on the government side, who really do care about this issue. I know Mr Galt and even Mr Murdoch, although we disagree on content, have a keen interest in this issue and want to make sure that their views are seen. I know Mr Carr, Mr Baird and Mrs Fisher probably feel the same way. But I really have to ask the question: What's the use of going through a committee process if even the government members aren't prepared—or aren't allowed, I should say; I think they're prepared—I would say aren't allowed to be able to comment and bring forward their points of view?

The point is simply this: If we're going to have the confidence of the people when it comes to being their representatives, I think it means to say that we have to be seen on all sides of the House as trying to bring forward those issues that we say are important to us and our constituents. I remember sitting on committee through the province of Ontario on this bill where government members said, "I thank you very much for your presentation and I'm going to make sure that this issue is brought back to the Legislature when we deal with it in committee of the whole and that we take that into account." Not one of those presentations were talked about by the government members, and I just warn you, I don't think that's a good practice to get into.

Our government tried to do that to us as backbenchers in the first year that we were elected as a government and I can tell you, we had one heck of a revolt in our caucus because we said, "We ain't going to come here and be seen as being bumps on a log, because we have a responsibility to represent our constituents." We went through an entire process in our caucus that really opened up the legislative process, both in caucus but I would also say within the House and committee, to allow members to have a bigger role, to be able to espouse the views of their community or themselves in order to be able to have a real say in committee.

The other thing I would say is that, also in my experience on committee of the whole before, this is the first time I have come to a committee-of-the-whole meeting since I've been elected in this House where opposition amendments have not been, quite frankly, taken seriously. On all other committees that I've sat on, there has been an attempt by government members to look at what the opposition was bringing forward and as long as it wasn't something that we disagreed with philosophically—because I accept, "have regard to" is something that you believe in and you're not going to take that from us. I understand that. But when we brought forward ideas in regard to some of the problems we see with your bill when it comes to practical matters, there wasn't an attempt to deal with that and I would just warn members, that's not a good practice.

I recognize that some of you are new to this place and I don't say that in disrespect. We all learn as we go along and I haven't been here all that long either. Six years in this place ain't a long time. But in the six years that I've been here I've understood that you need to take seriously the comments of both people in opposition and government to make sure that we make the legislative process count for something and that we strengthen legislation through the process of both the committee and the Legislature. I would just ask you to go back to your caucus to speak in caucus about what your roles are in committee because I think it is very important.

Mr Hodgson has sat on committee with me before. Mr Stockwell who sat on committee, Mr Jackson who sat on committee on a number of different issues and bills that we dealt with as government, brought forward suggestions to our government where we, on issues of ideology—no, we didn't move—but when they were able to point out problems with our legislation in regard to its practicality, we accepted the amendments of the opposition and were able to deal with that so that we were able to strengthen our bills. I didn't see that as a weakness on the part of our government; I saw that as a strength, of being able to accept that legislative counsel doesn't always get it right. Let's get this straight: It was not Ernie and it was not Al who sat down and drafted this bill. The government gave direction; it's legislative counsel that put it together. Even legislative counsel at times, or the lawyers from the ministry, do make mistakes when it comes to practicalities. So I would say, go back and speak to your caucus about how your roles are on committee because I really don't think that we've been well served through this whole process.

I would just say, in regard to the title of the bill, I will be supporting the motion that my colleague from Riverdale put forward on the basis that I really do believe this is a pro-development bill and has nothing to do with environmental protection but has everything to do with urban sprawl.

Ms Churley: I want to close on saying something in defence of developers, actually. Developers are a special-interest group and they have a right to represent their constituency and their interests, and that's fine. I made that clear to some of the developers who came and supported this bill and had a lot of input in the bill. So my beef isn't with the developers. My beef is with the government, in that it is the government's responsibility to listen to and balance the interests of all so-called special interests in our society.

The problem is that this government has chosen, and it's very clear in this bill, to listen to just, on the whole, one special-interest group. Therefore, there is a lack of balance in the bill. I think that it would do us all well in the future, as we look at legislation, to agree that if we're going to call a few groups whom you don't agree with "special interests"—like environmentalists, and they were referred to on several occasions by some, certainly not all sectors, as "special interests" and therefore to be dismissed, not taken seriously.

I know lots of developers and certain other interests don't like to—bankers, whatever—be referred to as special interests. Somehow there seems to be this idea that: "Gee, golly, no, they're not special interests. They have the whole of society at heart. What's good for them is good for all of us." Unfortunately, a bit of that comes through from the so-called developer community. But it's up to the government to say: "No. You are a special-interest group, and we're going to balance your rights and your needs with the rights and needs of society as a whole."

I believe that that's what went wrong. Fundamentally what went wrong with this bill—and fundamentally that the Minister of Environment and Energy, the Minister of Natural Resources and the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Affairs were left out of this process. They're not here. They're not speaking. They're not in this bill. And this bill has much more to do with environmental protection in many ways than development. It's very sad. I hope that this government sees it as a lesson in the future to listen to everybody and balance everybody's rights.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. Our timing today will be 20 minutes per deputation, but before that, we're going to be hearing from the three parties. We'll have opening comments from the government and then 10-minute responses from the official opposition and the third party.

Even before that, the clerk reminds me, the first order of business will be to approve the subcommittee report. You all have copies on your desks. Any comments arising from the subcommittee report? Seeing none, I look for a motion to adopt. Mr Carroll so moves.

All in favour of the adoption of the subcommittee report? Contrary? It's carried.

Moving right along, I'll ask for opening comments from the government.

MINISTRY OF TRANSPORTATION

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Before we get started today, I want to say a few words about this government's commitment to deregulating the intercity bus industry. We believe the travelling public will be better served by an industry free from economic regulations. It will create a more competitive market in which entrepreneurs can meet passenger needs in new and innovative ways.

However, it became clear after second reading of this bill that there are several issues surrounding intercity bus deregulation that need to be clarified. I want to do that today.

First of all, this legislation does not in itself deregulate the intercity bus industry. Bill 39 creates an interim system to help us move towards deregulation. It also gives the industry time to adjust to the transition.

Another important issue I'd like to address is public safety. I assure you that the safety of the travelling public is this government's priority and we will take all steps necessary to ensure the industry is safe.

The increased competition that comes with freer access to the marketplace will not compromise public safety. Deregulation will only affect the economic aspects of the industry. Current safety regulations will continue to apply. However, later this month we plan to introduce legislation that will impose harsher penalties on companies that don't meet safety standards. It will include dramatic increases in the maximum fines for safety offences.

Another part of this legislation will clear the way for a demerit point system for commercial drivers who violate industry-related safety laws. This system will allow us to monitor the safety practices of professional drivers.

On top of these measures, the Ministry of Transportation will launch its new safety rating system for truck and bus operators by next year. The system rates a truck or bus company's safety performance on the road and its overall corporate safety practices and policies.

Another issue that came up in the House had to do with service in small, rural and remote communities. The current regulated system does not guarantee service to small-town Ontario. In fact, in the past 15 years, more than 400 communities across Ontario lost their bus service. By removing restrictions on the industry, we can only improve the chances for these communities to get the services they need. When the demand is there, market forces will encourage the private sector to create more local bus services.

In fact, I think people who live in small towns across Ontario will find that their local bus service is an important link in the chain of intercity travel. After all, passengers from smaller towns often transfer to larger bus services to get to a central location. Without these so-called feeder services, the larger bus companies would probably not have enough passengers.

However, if some bus companies choose to withdraw their services from communities during the next two years, this government will require that they give us and the community fair warning. They will have to give 90 days' notice instead of the current 10 days. Those planning to cut a bus service by more than 25% must give 30 days' notice. That's three times the current required length.

A carrier company's rating — either satisfactory, conditional or unsatisfactory — will be available to the public, including banks, insurance companies and customers who do business with the industry. We believe this system will encourage bus and truck operators to follow good safety practices.

During the interim stage, new bus operators will have to demonstrate that they know their responsibilities for highway safety. They will also have to indicate how they will ensure their vehicles operate safely on the highway. They can expect MTO enforcement officers to audit their business within six months of starting up their service.

On top of this, we are increasing insurance requirements for bus operators to bring them in line with today's operating environment. This will discourage fly-by-nighters, those companies hoping to make some quick cash without giving the appropriate attention to safety. Finally, this government supports a national review of bus safety to determine if special bus safety measures should be in place right across Canada.

Plus, we will require bus companies to continue to provide service until a replacement is found or until the notice period expires, whichever comes first. During that time, and in cases of serious hardship, the company must work with the local community and other interested groups in a reasonable effort to find a replacement.

I am confident that Ontario's towns and villages will actively encourage local entrepreneurs to provide the transportation services needed by their fellow residents. In this respect, deregulation should give smaller companies an opportunity to get started.

During the debate in the House, several members accused the government of abandoning northern Ontario. This government is committed to ensuring a safe, efficient and healthy bus industry right across the province, including the north. There are entrepreneurs in northern Ontario that are ready, willing and able to take on the challenge of a bus industry without regulations. There are also existing operators that are interested in expanding their service in the north, that are not allowed to under the current system.

I understand that many of you are concerned about the potential for unfair competition from neighbouring provinces. During the next 20 months leading up to deregulation in Ontario, we will pressure the federal government to follow through with nationwide deregulation. The federal government is in the best position to pursue this since it has jurisdiction over the majority of bus companies in Canada. The current interprovincial and international trade agreements tend to support deregulation. It is only a matter of time before it extends to the entire North American intercity bus industry.

Both the United States and the UK removed economic restrictions on their intercity bus industry more than 10 years ago. A Canadian study found that the number of US bus companies almost tripled seven years after deregulation in the US. Although some studies show that US deregulation has had some negative results, it is very likely that those same scenarios would have occurred even if regulations had remained in place.

In the UK, the intercity bus industry has been deregulated since 1980. Deregulation in the UK has reduced fares and improved the quality and quantity of service. Following deregulation, ridership also increased by some 14% after a decade of decline. As with the US experience, various negative results in the UK can be attributed to a general decline in the industry that existed in the years prior to removing economic regulations. However, the UK experience is difficult to sort out since they deregulated the intercity bus industry and local transit at the same time and also introduced a major bus privatization initiative.

Several studies on this subject also recommended relaxing the regulations on the bus industry. The most noted, the 1992 Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation, reinforces this government's view that deregulation will not necessarily lead to operators abandoning feeder routes. The study found that if some operators did so, they could undermine their competitive position in the market as a whole. The royal commission also found that deregulation would result in a somewhat smaller but equally regional network, with a dominant carrier running a network of local feeder routes. It suggested that specialized bus services would emerge, some in the form of commuter services, others providing intraregional bus services.

I'd like to make one final point. Intercity bus operators can appeal decisions made by the Ontario Highway Transport Board. If an operator feels a board decision is unfair or beyond its jurisdiction, he or she can request a review through the courts.

Ladies and gentlemen, I assure you that a deregulated intercity bus industry will meet the needs of the travelling public. It will encourage innovation and attract entrepreneurs. It will also be safe, efficient and profitable.

This legislation will ease the transition to deregulation. It will provide some stability for the industry and it will help operators prepare for a more competitive marketplace.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Ouellette. First off for responses, the official opposition.

Mr Mike Colle (Oakwood): The final comment really puzzles me. It's typical of this whole act. I know in the explanatory notes in Bill 39 it says: "The decisions of the board are final. Appeals to Divisional Court, petitions to cabinet and stated cases to Divisional Court are no longer available." This is the thing that perplexes me about the approach the government takes to this act. Is this therefore a mistake? Is it a misprint? It just contradicts exactly what you said about a minute ago. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant could refer to that later on, whether we should disregard this in the preamble.

In terms of the process in this bill, there's a constant reference to what will happen, what they're confident will happen with this act. The real flaw is that there's been no business case analysis on what the impacts would be. The government has failed to do that. I guess that's the most surprising thing. If you're going to affect thousands of people who are passengers, hundreds of companies and thousands of workers in an industry that affects so many communities in Ontario, why wouldn't the government undertake to do a business case analysis on the impact the legislation would have on the providers, on the people in the business, the communities and the riders? That should have been done so that we could get at least an independent perspective on what would happen to this industry, what would happen to the passengers and what would happen to the communities.

To go ahead and do this without that impact analysis in the first place is really shortsighted. I think it leads to a lot of confusion, and that is what has happened with this bill. People don't really know.

For instance, they refer to the fact that 400 communities in Ontario over the last 15 years or so have lost bus routes. The government has not brought forward an analysis of that. In other words, why did these 400 communities lose service? I'm sure in some cases it's got a direct relationship with the present state of affairs of bus regulation in Ontario, but there are also all kinds of other variables and mitigating circumstances which caused those communities to lose those bus routes that had nothing to do with government and bus regulation or deregulation. All we keep hearing from the government on this issue is, "Oh, 400 lost it," with no analysis of why they lost it.

The same thing in the United States. On the opposite end of the spectrum, when deregulation took place in the United States under Ronald Reagan, we know that 5,000 communities in the United States lost bus routes. I guess it would be easy for the opposition to say, "They lost it because of deregulation." Again, I think that would be shortsighted. What would be interesting to see is an analysis of what happened in the United States as a result of deregulation.

We talked about the UK example. Again, the UK example is quite complex, because there are a lot of factors that caused different changes as a result of deregulation in the United Kingdom. But again, it would be very valuable, I think, to have an analysis of that and relate it to the Ontario experience.

That is not before us. All we have are anecdotal references by the government. In fact, during the discussions in the House, they never even referred to the UK or the American examples. Now, because we've asked that question, they've finally referred to and acknowledged the fact that deregulation has had a negative effect to a certain extent in the UK and it's had a negative effect to a certain extent in the United States.

Again, it's not to say that all the good and bad in terms of bus services and the infrastructure have to do with deregulation or regulation, but I think it behooves the government to put before us a business plan, a business analysis on why deregulation is good, and give us the breakdown on what effect it would have on the industry. That has not been done. There have been discussions, I'm sure, with the industry. There has been very little comprehensive analysis, though, and that is why I think the critical thing we're saying from our side is that's the missing ingredient in this whole process.

Before you proceed, there should be a breakdown on the impact these changes will have. It's not good enough to say, "We're going to put in this measure, this Bill 39, and then we'll look at it over the next 20 months." I think this process should have started seven or eight months ago, where there was time enough for an independent expert, someone the government would have faith in, to do a comprehensive analysis. What we're really looking at is an infrastructure, we're looking at an industry, we're looking at a vital link that many small towns and communities have, and we're looking at a very changing marketplace.

In terms of the reference to competition, I would say the most troublesome thing of all is what's going to happen with the Quebec competition. It's fine to say, "We're going to urge the federal government to do something about deregulation in the rest of Canada," but the truth of the matter is, we've had very little success in effecting change in Quebec. Go across to Ottawa, sit on Booth Street in Ottawa, and you'll see every morning thousands of Quebec workers coming across to work in Ottawa. Our Ontario Ottawa workers can't go across to the other side. No matter how much we've asked them to amend the situation, the Quebec government is not being very cooperative. I don't think it's good enough to say, "We are going to hope and pray and we are going to ask the federal government to do something about it," when that is a very real threat to the viability of the industry — never mind what it does in terms of ridership across the province.

The government has really no answer on how it's going to mitigate that threat of Quebec or Manitoba perhaps poaching or infringing upon an industry which right now, as a result of this and as a result of total deregulation, might be on an unequal footing with its competition in Quebec. There are no protections in place, and I say that is very worrisome in terms of what it might do to an industry that is a very tenuous industry when you consider the competition it has in this province and the geography that poses a challenge in this province. Those are realities that face us in this province.

There's no denying that this is a very perplexing challenge. It's not an easy thing to sort out. But I think if you want to do it in a comprehensive way, you do it in a way that looks at what the history has been in the UK, in the US, and you bring in all the players, all the stakeholders, including the riders, including the small-town mayors and reeves, and ask them what they think the impact of deregulation would be on their communities, and ask certainly the people who have put their capital investment into these businesses, these industries, what they think the impact would be. I think that has not been done in a comprehensive, systematic way and I think it's good business to do it that way. That hasn't been done. We're putting the cart before the horse here and I don't think it really helps create a climate of confidence as you go ahead into this deregulation.

The Chair: Moving to the third party.

Mr Gilles Pouliot (Lake Nipigon): We find ourselves in the midst of what is for the government of the day, the régime du jour, an ideological bend, if you wish. They, on Bill 39, spoke with candour, certainly not a departure from the present style, form, ideology of today's government. We of the New Democratic Party, a year ago we were the government. We served the full four years and nine months. We came close to the sunset, the limitation, of the Constitution, of course. The reason I say this is that we too had ample time and opportunity to look at what is in front of us and, make no mistake about it, interim is a de facto to what is about to happen.

Our position has been one of consultation, of equilibrium and, we feel, of balance. We ask ourselves first and foremost who would benefit; who would lose; does the legislation need change? We conclude on the latter that if it's not broke, if the present system serves well, why fix it? Why change for the sake of changing? We find, to say the least, ironic a position voiced by the government, echoed by the government, that on the matter of safety "We will do better." It is veiled with the usual attributes to have the roads and highways in the province of Ontario the safest in North America. "We value safety. Safety, for our government, is a priority," all befitting the day after Mother's Day.

The reality is that on the one hand you honour those commitments and on the other hand you cut the budget significantly so those women and those men who are enforcing the statutes will be there but they will be there in fewer numbers. It's difficult, to say the least, to reconcile the two positions. One is a commitment, but it loses its significance or raises doubt once you don't have the money and the staff therefore to adhere to it.

Mr Colle, the critic for the official opposition, has mentioned the position of the province of Quebec vis-à-vis what is being proposed there. I want to read into the record the position of both Manitoba and Quebec — their recent communiqués. The one from Manitoba, the province immediately to the west of Ontario, is one from November 23, 1995, and I quote:

"The purpose of our submission is to set out Manitoba's position on the future deregulation of the intercity bus industry. Our submission is brief as all significant problems experienced by this industry in Manitoba have been resolved within the current regulatory regime.... This positive record is the basis for our position that the existing system of economic regulation in Manitoba largely achieves its objectives, and is capable of managing the adjustments required by the industry to preserve its economic viability. There is simply no major problem that would be addressed by bus deregulation, and no significant constituency advocating it on other than theoretical or ideological grounds"

Three days before, November 20, 1995, the position of the province of Quebec, a larger jurisdiction than that of Manitoba, the province immediately to the east of Ontario, and I quote:

"In this context," says the Quebec government, "the most likely consequences of total intercity bus transport deregulation would be:"

Number 1, "the bus transport system would be limited to those services which are profitable." They are saying the bottom line. They point out to it, the right and the expectation that a profit will be generated.

Number 2, "a portion of the population which currently enjoys services would have to provide those services itself, or the government would have to intervene financially."

Mr Colle has mentioned that at present there is no mood for the federal government to dictate or to ask, especially the province of Quebec, to endorse a system which the province of Quebec does not wish to adhere to. In the real world, Monsieur Chrétien will not talk to either Mr Johnson or Monsieur Bouchard about intercity bus deregulation. It's not very high on the agenda, I can assure you. It's no time to go and tease the bears. Their position is recent; their position is clear. That of Manitoba is recent; that position is clear as well. Who will benefit? In the charter business, our Ontario operators will be left trying to compete. The playing field will not be levelled.

I've given the true story in the House of having a flight from Europe, of course landing at Pearson; Prevost buses with bells and whistles bringing people to Niagara Falls and after two hours back on the bus, going for eight days to Quebec City. You can't compete with that because theirs is a regulated industry and yours is not.

The position of the various players is almost unanimous. I don't want to impute motive and charge anyone with motive. The big players are opposed. They see regulation for the purpose where you tap the most lucrative route, and given the history and the nature of our vast and magnificent land, you're asked to pay back and you subsidize with what you make on the lucrative route those who are less lucrative, those where the disabled, those where the seniors, those where the students — those where there is really, truly no alternative. People use what has become the most democratic system of transportation because it suits the need of the democratic class. The government doesn't wish to throw the poor, the disabled, people in small and remote communities, the seniors, in the ditch. No one wishes to have this.

When bus deregulation took place south of the border with our neighbours, within one year 4,000 — count them — lines were removed. That should suffice. Let me quote in the last minute that I have Freedom To Move. They've been around for some time. They're saying people in eastern Ontario — Elgin, Lambton, Essex, Haldimand, Oxford, Perth, Huron and Wellington counties — followed by northern Ontario — Cochrane and Nipigon — will be the ones most impacted.

Some of the presidents, members of the boards of the majors, are saying — Canadian Intercity Bus Task Force, OMCA, in 1995 in its brief predicted that once deregulation came to Ontario, American companies would begin a battle for the lucrative southern Ontario bus market. "An open market would result in a significant shakeout, with scheduled and charter markets dominated by US-based carriers. Ontario operators would be limited to less attractive markets, or to subcontract or subordinate alliance relationships with outside carriers."

I thank you for your time. I have chosen to let the experts in the field work their craft. I've tried, with my limited ability, to voice their concern in the limited allocation that we have for us. I thank the members of the committee.

TRENTWAY-WAGAR INC

The Chair: First up making representations before the committee today will be Trentway-Wagar Inc. Good afternoon and welcome to the committee. Thank you for your indulgence while we had the opening comments. That clock actually is a bit wrong. We're remaining on schedule, I see. We'll have 20 minutes for your presentation. You can divide that as you see fit between an actual presentation and question and answer period.

Mr Jim Devlin: Thank you. My name is Jim Devlin. I'm president of Trentway-Wagar and one of the owners. I've been involved in the regulated bus industry for many years; as a matter of fact, 38 in total. I've been involved in the discussion of the regulation of the bus industry now in government committees, both at the federal and provincial levels, for in excess of 20 years. I guess you could say after all those years that I'm starting to become weary of talking about regulation of the bus industry.

Having said that, just a little background about our company first. Our roots are in Peterborough. The company was founded 40 years ago and has steadily grown through, by and large, acquisition. We now have operations in Kingston, Port Hope, Whitby, Toronto, Hamilton and Niagara Falls. Our company is split between line run charter and school bus, with charter being the largest part or component, although with the purchase of the Canada Coach Lines in 1993 from the Hamilton Street Railway, or the city of Hamilton, we got into the line run industry in a much larger format. We're now operating in excess of 300 buses, of which 119 are over-the-road highway coaches.

I'm here to speak in support of Bill 39, clear and simple. Bill 39 is not deregulation. Bill 39 is a bill that is, in my mind, 10 or 12 years overdue. Bill 39 brings to the regulated industry a way to deal with a lot of the things that are wrong, and have been wrong for many years, with the current rules and regulations. The system is very much broken and has been broken for some time.

When I look at the industry and the areas I've been involved in, both in line run and charter, I can tell you that there's overcapacity in the charter industry. Applications to the transport board for charter authorities are merely, in all cases, rubber-stamped, so much so that very seldom is there opposition to charter applications today.

The issue of Quebec in dealing with the charter industry: I think the whole province of Quebec is licensed to operate legally at Pearson airport, authorities that have been granted by the government through the board over the last five to six years. The fastest-growing market in Canada is the market through Pearson airport that the Quebec industry has now.

We have looked at the Asian market, we have looked at other markets to support our companies. That market is gone and I don't think there are very many carriers in Ontario looking at the market coming from Europe and France as lucrative any more. We just don't share in it. In my mind, in these discussions Quebec is a non-issue as far as charters are concerned; line run, they could be.

The line run industry, by and large, is a monopoly. It's a major monopoly and it has been a monopoly for many, many years. I personally don't think the public is well served with a monopoly. In fact, I know they're not. Once again, I can only speak from my personal experience.

Since the purchase of Canada Coach — first of all, Canada Coach was a major money loser for the Hamilton region, big-time loser, and that's why they sold it off. We bought it. We thought, look at it, maybe there are some things we can do, make some changes, address the efficiency issue. But, by and large, we bought it with the idea that it had to be expanded on. It was nothing more than a feeder from the Kitchener to Niagara corridor to the major monopolies in Ontario.

With the purchase, we made our applications to serve the Niagara region from Toronto in competition with the monopoly; a hearing that probably cost us, in just out-of-pocket expenses, in excess of $200,000; an application where we proposed, for the carriage of the disabled, fully accessible coaches — the fully accessible coaches had a market value of about $475,000 to buy, which we did end up buying, by the way — and the board ruled against it. We had about 60 witnesses in support.

In their reasoning, they said the test of public need and convenience was not met. It was not met because we brought forward members of the disabled community to support the application, and there were not enough able-bodied people to support it. Therefore, we failed to meet the test of public need and convenience.

That's a system that's broken. I don't blame the board, because I don't think the board is getting enough direction. We have dual jurisdiction; we've got the ministry and we have the board, and they quite often go off in their own directions. As an industry, we're spinning out there like a spinning wheel because we don't know how to deal with it.

Bill 39 reduces a lot of that. It brings it down to the board. It takes enforcement away from the ministry, an area that, because of the lack of effective enforcement — and this is not a knock of the ministry and their staff, because I feel that with what they have to work, they do a very good job, but it's not very effective. I know of an unlicensed operation that started — 10 years of messing around in the courts, the licence review board, I think it's called. Ten years to try to stop this operator. Meanwhile, it grew from about one bus to over 30 in that 10-year period.

Bill 39 provides a mechanism that allows the industry, a licensed carrier, to put a matter to the board. User-pay, very effective, timely, all of which we don't have today. If I file a complaint with the ministry on an illegal operation, first of all, I never hear anything back; I don't know what's happening. That's why there are no complaints being filed now, because they're not allowed to discuss the investigation with us, and rightly so. With Bill 39, a licensed carrier would become a party to it. Therefore, we would be involved in the process. Illegal activities wouldn't be allowed to continue for 10 years.

I like Bill 39. By and large, what is in Bill 39 is the type of thing that, in all my years of working on committees to try to get, is there. Very effective. In fact, we used to have it many, many years ago. Unfortunately, the chairman of the board at that time didn't have the authority to do what we think Bill 39 will do. When the late Mr Shoniker was the chairman of the board, he ruled with an iron hand and people stayed in line.

If I could just for a minute discuss the issues of deregulation, there are many people in the bus industry who would say, "Devlin is a deregulationist; Devlin is trying to destroy the industry." Well, I'm neither. After 38 years, I think I'm going to retire out of this industry, and to destroy it now would affect my pensions. I'm here to make sure we have a healthy, financially viable industry.

We all share the issues of deregulation. Harmonization is a must. Ontario cannot proceed with deregulation without Quebec. But to hold up Bill 39 to deal with an issue that's not a part of Bill 39 is going to do tremendous harm to our industry. We need it now. Like I said before, it's long overdue.

I will publicly commit today to be involved in any committee that all parties of government would like to set to deal with the issues of deregulation. I would be the first one at the table to sit down and work on it, because harmonization is very important.

Safety: There are a lot of issues associated with safety, many of them, and there are no better people to discuss the issues of safety than those in the industry themselves. There are a lot of issues we would like to bring to the table. We're not bringing them now, we're not bringing harmonization now, because Bill 39 does not address either one of them.

I strongly urge you to please support Bill 39. We need it now. We need those changes now so we can get on with business so we can bring some sanity to our industry. With the support of Bill 39 I'm going to ask you to send a message that competition is not bad. Mr Pouliot mentioned the Prevost coaches with all the bells and whistles. They're in the charter market. If you look at all the nice buses running around Toronto, I assure you that 99% of those buses are in the charter business, because it's very competitive and if you don't have the best, you're not in the business.

I'm not so sure the line run that you're concerned about, the people who require the services, are getting a fair deal. I don't think they're getting the best of service and they may not be getting the best rate that the service could be operated for. Competition is necessary.

In closing, the cabinet issued a — I forget the official word for it — anyway, it was a direction to the board in 1978 telling them to take four things into consideration in the test of public need and convenience. It was interesting that this was issued as a result of an application by a major carrier to operate over another carrier's route. It was Greyhound and Gray Coach, Greyhound to operate over Gray Coach's route from Sudbury to Toronto. A petition was filed at cabinet and cabinet upheld that there should be competition within the mode.

One of the items that was sent to the board: "The need for competition to ensure the best service at the lowest cost to the public, while maintaining the economic viability of licensed carriers." There have been no duplicate licences issued since 1978 that were challenged by the main line monopoly carriers.

Thank you. If you have any questions —

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Devlin. We'll start our questioning with the official opposition. We have nine minutes, obviously three minutes per party.

Mr Colle: Thank you, Mr Devlin. I appreciate your input. In terms of your position, you would like to see that this bill be used as a stepping stone to open deregulation; in other words, get rid of regulation and end up with an open marketplace in two years.

Mr Devlin: Obviously, Mr Colle, at this time I can't say that definitely. This bill is needed. If there were no deregulation for the next 10 years, this bill is needed today. Deregulation is an issue that we don't know enough about. I know the government has set a deadline of January 1, 1998, but when you throw in the issue of harmonization, I think they do have some problems because I don't believe Quebec will be ready to deregulate on January 1, 1998. Without harmonization in Canada, I don't think any one province should move on its own and leave the neighbours open to come to our markets, but we can't go to their markets.

Mr Colle: What I'm trying to express to you is the concern we have that the preamble of this bill and this government's ideological bent is that they're saying they believe in deregulation and therefore this bill is going to set the stage for that. In essence, because of their belief — they don't believe regulation is needed in this industry — they have to take this first step to reach deregulation.

We're saying, like you, before you take that step, you should do an analysis to see the impact of it, and maybe there need to be some adjustments, as you said. There are obviously some problems in the industry; I concur with you there. At what point do you do this analysis to find out the impact of essentially this free-for-all that the government is bent on?

They have stated categorically in the House, they are going to get rid of all the regulations by January 1, 1998. The question is, what can we do in the interim to have them look at the impact that this is going to have on the industry and on communities?

Mr Devlin: Bill 39 itself does not address deregulation. Bill 39 is very important. Bill 39 will deal with the issues, the problems that we have today. I know the government has dealt with it as a transition period. From the industry point of view, we have looked for a lot of what is in Bill 39 for years.

I believe discussions should be had on the virtues of deregulation and they should be held between now and January 1, 1998. At the end of those discussions, it may be the ideal way to go. From a personal point of view, I'm not afraid of competition within Ontario. I have no problem competing with anyone in an open market within Ontario. I have some concerns with some of our friends south of the border. They do have advantages that we don't have. They've been known as a very mobile industry where they cherrypick: They're on the west coast one season, they're in Florida the next season. In fact, sometimes I wonder if they live in their buses, they're so mobile. But they would be difficult to deal with and there are some issues to address.

Quebec: I don't know how they do it. Maybe they should come up here and give us some lessons in running a company, but they seem to be able to operate a lot cheaper than we do. I hear taxes are greater in Quebec than Ontario, but there's something about the Quebec operations that they're allowed to operate cheaper. I don't know whether money is available to them cheaper or the cost of the Quebec-made bus is cheaper, but there are some advantages there.

We do have to sit down and address those issues. But to stall Bill 39 is not the way to do it. I think we have to start those discussions now because we don't want to wait till the fall of 1997. Those discussions should be entered into at this time, but I strongly urge, don't hold up Bill 39.

Mr Pouliot: Thank you very much, Mr Devlin; always a renewed pleasure. I know of your contribution to the sector over many, many years. I have a supplementary question and I only have three minutes. It has been decreed that we share the time and rightly so.

Your opinion is that, with respect, you are in favour of Bill 39 because it simplifies the matter. You're hesitant about — in fact, I have a quote from you, Jim, which says, "I'm not in favour of deregulation." Then you go on to say, to support that, you would like to know more, more consultation, 10 years' harmonization. But you like enough in Bill 39 that you want to see it move forward. Is that your position?

Mr Devlin: As you know, when you were minister we had many discussions about the bad actors in the industry. Bill 39 provides a mechanism that will deal with those bad actors in a timely fashion, and that is very attractive to me.

Mr Pouliot: I agree with you on this part; it streamlines. But you see, I have here, and this comes from the ministry and I have to assume that the ministry and the minister are in tune here: "Statement to the Provincial Legislature by Transportation Minister Al Palladini," introducing interim measures to prepare for deregulation in the intercity bus industry. Then the minister says, right in the Leg, "The legislation I'm introducing today will allow a transition to full economic deregulation of the industry on January 1, 1998, a move that this government is committed to bringing about in an orderly manner." Then on page 2 he goes further: "Economic deregulation of Ontario's intercity bus industry will lead to an efficient system that provides appropriate levels of service based on market demand and the needs of the travelling public."

When I look at the heading there, and I did some representation in the same office — I should have brought the chair with me; it's one of those nice, comfortable chairs — this is the interim measure right in bold lettering here, what this bill is all about, what the catalyst is, what the heart of the bill is: deregulation, January 1, 1998. That's what they're selling. I mean, it's the Jays playing the Sox. The Indians come next week, Jim, but this is the ticket that you're buying when you endorse Bill 39. This is what makes the bill breathe.

Mr Devlin: Unless there's a section in Bill 39 that I haven't read, there's nothing in there that says this will cause deregulation. I know that's their goal. That's their goal and there are some problems with deregulation, and I think we all want to address those problems. That's their ultimate goal and I don't argue with their ultimate goal. Let's face it, we're the only transportation sector in Canada left that's regulated. But the bottom line is, Bill 39 does not itself deregulate the industry.

Mr Pouliot: But this is the only thing on the menu. I mean, here on the menu it says rice pudding and you believe they're going to serve me a steak.

Mr Devlin: But the bill itself, the legislation itself, will be the guideline to the board to regulate the industry. It won't be his statement, because I have learned a long time ago that once it becomes law, you forget about all the statements in the House because it's only what's written in the bill.

Mr Jack Carroll (Chatham-Kent): Mr Devlin, being a native of Peterborough, my questions will not be quite as flowery as Mr Pouliot's, but nevertheless, did I understand you to say that there's an illegal carrier that the government has been fighting with for 10 years that has gone from one to 30 buses in that 10-year period?

Mr Devlin: He has been regulated now because finally after all those years the government was just ready to shut the door on him and someone sold him a licence. But it took 10 years. I believe it was 10 years, and my friends over here could support me on that. In fact, it may even be more than 10 years.

Mr Carroll: Obviously proof that the current system doesn't work. Is the extraprovincial regulation of the motorcoach industry a federal jurisdiction?

Mr Devlin: It is. By the way, I heard the discussion in the House and there were some statements made that were in error on the regulatory issues. I am a federal carrier. So if Ontario was to continue regulation and the federal government deregulated, I could do whatever I want, because I'm a federal carrier and a federal undertaking is out of the province, into a province, point to point within a province. So there are a lot of issues at the federal level that have a major impact on what's going on in Ontario, and I sit on a federal committee dealing with those issues.

Mr Carroll: So you see the deregulation part from a federal standpoint being a totally separate issue from Bill 39?

Mr Devlin: If the federal government was to deregulate this afternoon, Bill 39 would be a non-issue to me: I'm deregulated.

Mr Carroll: So you are in favour of us working with the federal government to have deregulation take place, but your fear is that if we don't, we can't do it unilaterally. Is that what you're saying?

Mr Devlin: The Ontario government must work with the federal government as well as the other provinces to achieve harmonization in the rules on buses.

Mr Carroll: The Prevost buses you talked about and their access to Pearson airport, how has that happened in a regulated industry?

Mr Devlin: We all opposed, and somewhere along the way the train jumped the track and they all got licensed. By and large, there are very few carriers that you see at Pearson airport that are illegal from Quebec, because I think the whole province is licensed now. There are about 10 Ontario carriers and about 60 Quebec carriers licensed to operate from Pearson. That's been over the last, my guess is, four or five years.

Mr Carroll: How would deregulation change that?

Mr Devlin: It wouldn't.

Mr Carroll: So basically we're deregulated now is what you're saying?

Mr Devlin: In the charter industry there are a lot of players and it's very competitive. There are those in the charter industry who say by and large it's deregulated because everybody just does what they want to do anyway. But it's the line run industry that is the other side of it which is by and large a monopoly.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Devlin. We appreciate your taking the time to come and make representation before us here today.

SILVER FOX TOURS

The Chair: Our next group up is Silver Fox Tours, Avo Kingu, general manager. Good afternoon, sir. Again, we have 20 minutes to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and question and answer time.

Mr Avo Kingu: Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. A little bit about my company. We're a small tour operator based in London. We do approximately, I'd say, 6,000 to 10,000 people a year. We own no coaches, but we use coaches daily and we have to deal with approximately, 15 coach companies in southwestern Ontario and negotiate individually with everybody, which is a terrible burden. I get pricing from $550 a day currently to $950 a day. The cities are approximately half an hour apart and the equipment is no different.

It's a burden to me and to the public, and the equipment is never guaranteed. We get equipment from MC-8s that are still operating to brand-new, bells-and-whistles Prevosts. If I ask for a Prevost, they say, yes, a Prevost will show up, but I get an MC-8. Who do I complain to? The man has a monopoly. I can't complain to anybody. I can say, "Hey, why did you send it to me?" but I have no option. I cannot say to him, "Oh, I'll get John's bus." I can't do that because the man has a monopoly. I have to live with it, the public has to live with it, and it's bad for business. It's bad for business because I have to deal with so many layers, layer upon layer, and different every time. If I want to sell a brochure or a product throughout Ontario, it's a burden that's very hard to live with.

That is the one big point that I wanted this committee to understand, as a small businessman. I'm not a big operator, but a small entrepreneur.

We have thought of buying coaches. There is a big, crying need in London for a small coach: 15, 20 seats. The last time I inquired about getting a licence, they told me, "Your hearing's going to cost you $20,000, and that doesn't guarantee you a licence." So what am I to do? I just throw my hands up and walk away from it. I could put a couple of those coaches into charters immediately and move people, not cancel trips, service my customers, but I can't because there are a bunch of people holding licences who won't dispense with them, who protect themselves, and there are people who hold these licences, have no coaches and won't release the licences.

I guess it was about six years ago. There's a chap in Strathroy, Ontario, who holds a London licence. He sold all his coaches and he's sat on those licences ever since. I offered to buy those licences from him; he wouldn't sell them. So why keep them? Well, it's like money in a pocket. The next guy comes, maybe he'll offer you more. And that's not right. That's not in the public interest; it's not in the interest of the small businessman and everybody involved in this industry.

That $20,000 that we had talked about, I could have put that down on that coach. The coach only costs $40,000 or $50,000 for those small ones, and I would put some Ontario people to work, because it could be used. But I'm not going to spend $20,000 to find out that, "Hey, you can't have the licence," because somebody has to be protected.

That's the nitty-gritty of small business. I cannot expand. I cannot get the product. I can't get the quality, and neither can the public, because I sell to the public. If I advertise a deluxe motorcoach and an MC-8 shows up, or a 9 that's been used for umpteen years, who's going to get the complaints? Me? Yes, me. Who's going to suffer? Me. The coach company? No. That is bad for my business. I cannot grow.

Those are the basic reasons for my wanting deregulation. I'm not afraid of competition. I'm not afraid of anybody, nobody in this business, because I know what I do and I try to do it with quality. If we're running the same kind of equipment and our pricing is really close to the mark, I don't have a problem, because I do it with quality, or I try to. So the sooner this deregulation happens, the better it is for the industry. We can have 10 tour operators side by side and we'll all prosper if we know what we're doing. It's the same as running McDonald's and Wendy's. They're all together and they all do more business because they're together. The myriad doesn't affect the business; it's the availability of the licences to everybody.

I'll leave it at that. If you have any questions, I'll gladly answer them.

Mr Pouliot: I have only appreciation for anyone who is not a major, by your own admittance, and who's trying to, first, survive, make ends meet, prosper, and feels very confident that if not on the overall, certainly in a niche market, if you know your product, you know the clientele, you do your own real-life marketing, if you wish, that no matter what, you will do quite well.

You don't have a licence that is worth $20,000 or in some cases over $100,000, right? You don't use your privileges in that context, if you wish, or your right to operate as collateral. It doesn't apply here, right?

Mr Kingu: Yes.

Mr Pouliot: It does apply for other people where licences have, we know, changed hands.

You see, I don't think that certainly our party is opposed to the essence of the free marketplace, providing that if you can regulate competition, then it takes its place.

The thing is, we have 882 municipalities in the province of Ontario. If it were only that simple, and we saw what happens by way of regulations. I want to put this to you in terms of a question. Aren't you concerned that — it could be anyone — that ABC company is so big — and if we wish to talk about cartel and monopoly, we'll put them under that definition — that they'll take a beating along your route, hypothetically of course, and they'll take a beating for six months, take a beating for a year, and then wave you goodbye?

Mr Kingu: As a quick answer to you, as an illustration talking about big players, the big player is Greyhound. Can we take them as an illustration? I used to use Greyhound very frequently and it was one of my major suppliers. Greyhound pulled out of the market. They decided when they purchased the Peterborough runs they were going to use their equipment there and they upped their prices, and I said, "No, I'm not going to use you any more, not at those prices." I guess it was about three, four months ago, guess who's knocking at my door? Greyhound. What happened to the prices? They dropped.

But the thing is that it doesn't matter if you're big or small. In the end, quality, service and price tied together will win the day. You can have 100 buses out there and if you're not efficient, you're going to be out the door, the same as with me. I'm very cost-conscious. I operate my business with only about four, five full-time people, and we are profitable, have been for the last eight years, and we've grown every year.

I really, truly believe that something has to be done to cut these chains so that I can go to you and sell you something or I can go to Harry and sell him something without being told, "No, you can't do it because you've got to have this piece of paper." If you sold this piece of paper to everybody — make your rules and regulations about the piece of paper: "You've got to operate safely" — I agree with that — "you've got to operate this, and this," but make it available to everybody. That's the key, not to cost me $20,000 and I don't know at the end whether I'm going to have it or not. That's not right.

Mr Frank Klees (York-Mackenzie): I gather from your comments that you're not objecting to standards of operation.

Mr Kingu: No.

Mr Klees: What I think I hear you saying is that your experience has been that because of the monopoly situations that exist now, really there are two people who are disadvantaged. One is you because you don't have the choice that as an independent businessperson you feel you need to have in order to make good business decisions —

Mr Kingu: That's about right, yes.

Mr Klees: — and the other is the customer, the user of the service, who, because you don't have choice as to the kind of vehicle that you can either lease or use for a particular route — in the end, your customers don't have a choice because you don't have the ability to then pass on whatever efficiencies and savings you'd be able to generate if you had the ability to operate as you would do.

So I'd like to just have you comment as to what you feel the effect on the user of transportation services would be from a price component standpoint.

The second part of my question is, do you feel now, because of the monopoly circumstances that exist, that some of the large players who have that monopoly are actually cross-subsidizing from another area of their business to unfairly pass on some of those costs to the end user of the service?

Mr Kingu: First of all, I'll reply to the last part that you mention. I don't know about the internal book-keeping, so I can't comment on that end of it. But I do know the big disparity in price. Now, how Greyhound can come one day and charge me this amount of dollars and then the next day or a year later come back and charge me differently, I don't know.

But as an illustration to the end user, which is the general public — and I'll go back to that initial one that I was talking about: $550 a day or $950 a day. That $950 is the true price that I paid for somebody operating out of a small town called Parkhill. There's only one operator out of there and there's a horticultural association that we deal with and we do day trips for them and we do other things for them. So you can imagine, I have to pay $950 for a day trip instead of $550. So who pays for it? I don't pay for it. The public ends up paying for it.

In that instance, I've had cases where I've been guaranteed nice equipment, and, like I say, an old MC-8 shows up — which is 15 years old, it's muddy, it hasn't been cleaned — and I have no recourse. People get mad at me, "Why are you doing this?" and I say, "Well, I can't, blah, blah, blah." It's always an explanation. So the end user, the public, is not happy with this. And the price: I upped my price by 20%, 30% because of that, because somebody has to pay that difference.

I do some trips down to Atlantic City. Out of London, it costs me to go down to Atlantic City $2,600 for a coach. Out of St Catharines, which is closer, they charge me $5,400. That's what they want. So what do I do? I shuffle people, because I do want to work within the regulations. But that's wrong, and that's the nitty-gritty of it.

Mr Colle: Just quickly, in terms of Bill 39, how is that going to get rid of the monopolies that you feel right now are impeding your business?

Mr Kingu: Bill 39? I'd like to see deregulation tomorrow. It's just a stopgap. I'm waiting until the industry's deregulated on January 1, 1988, to go out and buy myself a coach and get some people working.

Mr Colle: So you'd like to see total deregulation.

Mr Kingu: Yes.

Mr Colle: But in the interim there's nothing in Bill 39 that gets rid of monopolies.

Mr Kingu: No. It's just a stopgap.

Mr Colle: I'll just pass it on to my colleague here from the Ottawa Valley.

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Prescott and Russell): I can see you're a broker. You're not an operator, I would call it.

Mr Kingu: I would like to be but I can't.

Mr Lalonde: But you said that they had the monopoly and still you see on a daily basis the cost varies between $550 and $950.

I've had the experience before with Voyageur, which started in my home town. They had the whole monopoly. We couldn't get hold of anybody else because they were the only one that had the licence for charters east of Ottawa. I could see why you're in favour of this Bill 39, which would deregulate at the present time.

But my concern is, in eastern Ontario — especially in the Hawkesbury area, which at the present time the Quebec buses are picking up on the Ontario side — there's nothing we can do. If this bill goes through without amendment, it would mean the elimination of two bus companies or two small operators in my own area. In your case, you would benefit, because you will have more people to go to to get an estimate or a price for a trip; because you just mentioned, from St Catharines it costs $5,000 and from London it costs $2,600.

I just can't see at the present time — in your case it's all right probably, because you're not on the border, on the southern border, US border or the Quebec border. But how do you think you are going to benefit from it at the present time, because you do have the choice between $550 and $950 a day?

Mr Kingu: I won't benefit right now from it.

Mr Lalonde: You don't have enough operators?

Mr Kingu: That's another thing you can come into. I don't think there are enough operators. I don't think there's enough equipment. You take certain periods of this year, and certain peak months in the spring and in the fall, which is the main travel period for seniors and students and so on, and the equipment shortages are very major. I can't go out and get another coach. I can't go out and promise to get another coach. Why shouldn't I be able to? If the local supply doesn't have it, why shouldn't I be able to go and get somebody from somewhere?

Mr Lalonde: My concern is the full deregulation would open up the — it's a door for a large operator which will kill the small one.

Mr Kingu: I don't think so, because I'll tell you, I can operate it as cheaply as anybody in Ontario right now, and I don't think the Quebec suppliers — I had a chat, as a matter of fact, last week with a chap who's in Quebec, and we were comparing coach prices. We can still do business.

Mr Lalonde: Just my last question, Mr Chairman. Do you think that if we were to deregulate within Ontario only it would be better?

Mr Kingu: Hopefully, it's the first step.

Mr Lalonde: Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Kingu, for taking the time to come before us and make your comments here today. We appreciate it.

AMALGAMATED TRANSIT UNION, CANADIAN COUNCIL

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from the Amalgamated Transit Union, Canadian Council, Mr Tom Parkin. Oh, I see we may have a different name here. Good afternoon. Are you Mr Parkin or Mr Foster?

Mr Tom Parkin: I'm Tom Parkin. But on behalf of Ken Foster, who is the Canadian director of the Amalgamated Transit Union, I want to thank the committee and the House leaders for making this opportunity possible to comment on Bill 39, changes to the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act and the Public Vehicles Act.

A little preface is that we are the largest representative of transit employees in the intercity bus business. Generally speaking, especially listening to some of the comments and concerns by the previous operator, there's a lot of things that we can agree on with him and with others seeing as we tend to look at ourselves as being partners in the industry, and therefore anything that helps streamline and make the regulatory system more efficient, puts more buses on the road, brings more people on to buses and gets through the regulatory system faster is something that we will support. Within this bill, there are things that we do support and we would like to be able to say that with some amendments, which I want to speak about, we might be able to support the bill as a whole.

The board, like other boards that are quasi-judicial, in our opinion, especially when moving to a sole arbitrator who will be part-time and potentially limiting the number of rehearings or ability to rehear, it may be advisable, and we would suggest, moving towards something like a purpose clause, just because it's been a trend now that, generally speaking, no appeals to cabinet are allowed. There has to be that aspect of what is the crown's interest and a statement of that. Losing the appeal to cabinet, which surely had to go at some point, should be fulfilled by some sort of purpose clause. We have drafted something. It would state the purpose of the board to be that the board "exists to protect the transportation interests of smaller communities and ensure the greatest level of service possible for the commercial use of the public's highways." It leaves a fairly broad opening.

In the same way that the CRTC, for example, is the custodian of the public's airways, we look for the transport board as the custodian of the public's highways. It's announced that it is owned by the public and therefore the public has a voice in that, and there needs to be a representative purpose to that. I hope you will consider that, and maybe we can have something approaching that in terms of an amendment.

With respect to rehearing, the old section 16 allowed for rehearing, and it was non-specific. If the board wanted to rehear from time to time, it could rehear. It didn't really have to ask anybody. Bill 39 is taking out rehearing totally. I think that's a mistake and I want to tell you why.

Sometimes — I'm sure you'll all be surprised — people will make deputations, even to boards, that are not completely accurate, sometimes exaggerated by puffed-up prose in lengthy oratories in a hearing or obfuscating terminology in a report. The board doesn't always get a clear idea of what's going on. Then should we not be able to have the ability to rehear? It's possible that fraudulent or misleading evidence which led to a board decision couldn't be reconsidered. That's a very serious problem. In a sense, it's a natural justice thing. Secondly, there are cases where boards simply make errors and there needs to be a process for re-evaluating what seems to be an error.

What we've been thinking is whether there's a way of trying to get rid of a lot of the frivolous rehearings but still maintain the essential natural justice of what I think the hearings were intended to do, and that's make sure that decisions were consistent, that people could depend on what the outcomes were going to be. I would hope that if an amendment of that sort came forward, you could support it.

On the issue of appeal to the courts, this is something I have to say up front: Despite what it says in the presentation, I'm of two minds about exactly what's in the act. I've heard from some lawyers who say that the new section 28, which says all decisions are binding, will mean that you won't be able to appeal to a court even under the Statutory Powers Procedure Act. Others have said no, you can never outlaw the justiciability of a law. None the less, I'm concerned enough — and I think it's obvious that that should be justiciable — that obviously you can't allow a judicial board to break a law and then not have some recourse to that. Either a really good clarification for me or just being specific in the act would deal with that issue well.

On the issue of oral hearings, which I guess were in sections 22 and 23, something like that, 21, 22, 23: I think the intention of this was to move more quickly. I think there are some times when being wedded to a written process can slow you down. It is cases where you get into 40 pages of lawyers' text that is really designed to obscure the purpose where sometimes it would be a heck of a lot faster to be able to bring somebody in and give them a good cross-examination and really, in essence, whip them down and see what it is they're driving at.

As well, the oral hearings may be a strength for us right now as an Ontario-based industry with respect to Quebec interests possibly trying to come in and take the Ontario-domiciled industry's work in the so-called runup period, which I'll discuss in a minute.

The other issue is that of who is a party in front of this board, and it's not completely sure who someone with an economic interest would be. In part II, one of the new definitions there is what an economic interest is. Is a mayor whose town loses service, a couple of people move out, and therefore the storekeeper doesn't do as well, so he's receiving less revenue — does that make him somebody with an economic interest? Therefore, could that person appear at the board? That's not really clear.

There are some issues about that. I think we should just be more clear about allowing parties to be people, in effect, as the act was before, but at the same time I respect what the ministry has tried to do to move issues ahead more quickly and to deal with some of the really guerilla warfare tactics that have happened at the board that have nothing to do with board licences and everything to do with obscure commercial interests. Perhaps while bringing back a person as a party, if we also increase the punishment for people who got involved in vexatious, frivolous matters in hearings in front of the board, we might be able to offset that and still allow the community representation, which I think is the purpose of the act, as I believe it is, to regulate it in the public's interest. Therefore, I see that the public should be allowed to be someone to be present at a board hearing and make application.

There is another issue with regard to access to justice. As I think all the members of the committee will know, the elimination of funding from the Ministry of Transportation will mean a large increase in the fees that will have to be paid. There is a bit of an issue in my mind about whether, for example, a smaller operator really has the ability, regardless of whether this person has been proven right or believed that he was going to be proven right — you can think that you are the rightest person in the world and you go in and you are the wrongest person in the world, and then you get hit with a big fee at the end of the game. For someone who is a small operator, that's got to be a detriment. This is a legal body and in these situations there is no legal aid or place a smaller organization could go to ask for some sort of reduced payment. To me, it's an access-to-justice issue and there should be some commitment to allowing for smaller business or individuals to not be unjustly penalized by exercising their right to participate.

On transitional issues: It's very clear that the ministry has taken the position that anything that is up to a hearing, not in the hearing yet, will have to go under the new rules. It seems to me that once you've made your application and you go in, you should be treated under the same rules throughout unless there's a huge overriding reason. I don't see a huge overriding reason why somebody should have to reapply and go through a lot of the red tape that's being suggested here.

Finally, notice period: The notice period in the previous act, in the legislation, was marked at 10 days. The ministerial statement indicated that we'd be moving to 90 days for complete abandonment and 30 days for service reduction. When I looked in the legislation, it wasn't there, and I found out later that the intention was to bring it forward in regulation. If it was in the legislation before, my opinion would be that we should carry that. If there's a true commitment to those 90- and 30-day periods, we should put it up front and let it be discussed.

Those are the changes in the act that we feel the government caucus could suggest or accept that would make us feel much better about the bill.

Leaving Bill 39 aside for a second, we have a very firm position with respect to deregulation, and that is that we oppose it. I'll put it this way: The way we view it is that Minister Palladini is really testing out a trial balloon here. He's talked about it. Nothing's been done on it yet, obviously, although we've seen some reforms here but nothing that is necessarily leading to that conclusion. I think that is an opportunity for people to be here and see how they feel. You can make your mind up and see whether you want to let that trial balloon float away or not. I don't think people should feel too wedded to it.

The reasons for our opposition are fairly clear. We got together with a few other groups last fall when we heard about the possibility of this policy — the Canadian Federation of Students and the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens' Organizations and the United Transportation Union, which represents employees of Ontario Northland — and we did a research paper. I would be more than happy to give it to anyone who wished a copy of it; I think it's been liberally sprinkled around. It deals with some of the issues that have been put up as part of the trial balloon for why we should be going in this direction.

For example, one of the reasons often stated is that since 1981, I think is the reference, 400 communities have lost service. That's down from 1,500 to 1,100 today. That's a 25% community loss, which is pretty terrible, admittedly. But when we look at what happened in the United States from 1982 just to 1991, we've seen a 52% loss under deregulation. So the argument that we lost 400 stops under regulation isn't really an argument for deregulation when you look at the deregulation statistics. In terms of preserving service to the smaller communities, it's fairly clear which system has done that when you do a little comparative with the American experience.

We're also very concerned about the emergence of unregulated route monopolies. This does not serve the bus industry as a whole or the consumer well. In American and British deregulation, what tended to happen was actually less, not more competition. In England, it was a case of buyouts, a lot of buyouts. There was actually a monopoly corporation publicly owned in England — in Britain, I should say — and it was broken up, privatized. But then the new private companies ended up buying each other, so it was kind of the same in the end anyway.

In the United States, it was a little bit different, reflective of the business attitude there. It was an "eliminate the competition" kind of thing, try to get your regional area under control and then try to get rid of the competition as you can, including running at a loss and whatever tactic you can use to drive competitors out.

If we look at what happened in the airline industry since 1988 deregulation, that's fairly significant. We had Wardair, Nordair and Vacationair — many, many smaller airlines which were competing in a regulated market, which all disappeared. Now we're really down to — unless Greyhound gets in the game, which may or may not happen — two airlines, one of which is basically an American-controlled airline.

We've had less competition, not more competition, and what happened, of course, with less competition was that the air fares in the airline industry went up by 31% in the first four years, which outstripped inflation quite a bit, despite the fact that we saw the seat sales, or maybe I should say because we saw all the seat sales; because of running at a loss and trying to conquer routes, somebody had to make it up, and that's really what happened.

In our opinion as an organization, regulation is essential to maintaining healthy competition, and going the other way would be a very big mistake.

Another issue that's been raised is that of smaller buses: Why are we running 47-passenger coaches from Owen Sound down to Guelph? Why don't we run buses? Under the Highway Traffic Act, which is the reference for what a bus is under the Public Vehicles Act, a bus is any vehicle that carries 10 people or more and is, under the Public Vehicles Act, registered as a public vehicle. It's just not an issue. They could be running buses if they want, but as others might mention to you, the cost of the bus in and of itself is not the major — it is a major, but not the major — contributing overhead cost; it's mostly the fuel and wages and insurance and that sort of thing. I don't think we should get sidetracked on that.

I want to mention the possibility of a real strong impact on GO Transit. When we are running buses from Guelph or Stouffville or Oshawa or Hamilton, they are now subsidized, they run a very good service — I think we'd all say that — they are the safest service in North America and they arrive 99% on time. With deregulation, the competition could run against them, but the problem is that it would likely run against them only during peak time, because obviously there are times, as there are with subsidized service, when it doesn't make money. A private company is not going to come and try to compete against that time of day, obviously. It's going to be peak rush-hour service only. If GO Transit starts losing the money it makes during those small segments of the day where it actually earns money, then that means even more cuts to the service to your communities. I think it's just very important that you be aware of the damage that cherry-picking could do to the service your constituent rely upon.

Finally, Quebec interests: I think it just goes without saying that it would be foolish to push ahead with deregulation in Ontario when Quebec-based companies can come in and do Ontario work and Ontario-based companies can't go and do Quebec work. There needs to be a national plan on this. There is a national process on this and I think that's what we should hang our hats on.

Today we're just talking about the regulatory system, trying to get that in order, do a little efficiency work. I've talked a little bit about the trial balloon that you've put up. I want to mention that the work we've been doing isn't completely legislative committees, as I'm sure you'll know. If the Chair doesn't mind my using some props, I'd like to just show you a few of the responses I've been receiving over the last little while from riders of the service. We have petitions and postcards, a fairly large amount of each — I would say a rough count is about 11,000 as of this morning — from people writing us and saying, "We don't want to lose our community service." So these are from your constituencies, and this is the trial balloon. I've got to say that I don't think the response is really what you want. It goes on here a bit.

It will give you the idea that we've been active. We've been out there talking to people. We've been out trying to listen to people about the issue. What we want to suggest to you is a trial balloon. I want to ask that the members consider going out and doing a little listening of their own, perhaps doing a little listening to whoever is the regional company in your area, checking in with them. Mr Murdoch isn't here, but in Owen Sound, for example, the city of Owen Sound owns the bus terminal. If there are no buses in the bus terminal, the city of Owen Sound is going to lose money. Maybe the transportation manager should be checked with, in the case of Mr Murdoch, or other people like businesses that are auto parts suppliers or computer parts suppliers who depend on that BPX. There's some listening that I think you should go and do. I think you'll find that people are pretty concerned about what the impact could be on their community.

I want to just mention a few of the quotes that we've pulled together.

PMCL — I don't know if Mr Debeau is appearing in front of the committee, but I read him in a newspaper saying, "Rural Ontario is going to suffer if intercity bus service is deregulated."

Reg DeNure who is down from Chatham, Chatham Coach Lines, said, "If it isn't broken, why fix it?" That's the shorter part of a rather longer ramble.

Mr Devlin, whom we've met with before, has stated to us his opposition to deregulation.

The Chair: We have to ask you to wrap up fairly quickly, Mr Parkin. We're over 20 minutes.

Mr Parkin: I'm right at the end.

The OMCA itself has stated that it has a lot of concerns about the impact on safety and the viability of the industry.

Thanks for your invitation to have me here. I appreciate it. I hope you will listen to some of the people back in your constituencies.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Parkin. As I said, that does use our 20 minutes, so there won't be an opportunity for questions, but we appreciate your taking the time to come down before us to make some comments here today.

P.M. BUNTING AND ASSOCIATES

The Chair: The next group up is P.M. Bunting and Associates, Dr Mark Bunting. Good afternoon, Dr Bunting. Again, we have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation and question and answer period.

Dr Mark Bunting: I am a transportation economist and policy analyst, and over the last couple of years I've had the benefit of doing some work for the Ontario and Alberta governments and also for the Ontario Motor Coach Association on bus policy and deregulation issues.

Clearly, we're here to talk about Bill 39, but having read it through, and I'll admit somewhat superficially, I don't think I really see major problems with this piece of legislation. It streamlines the process and I think that's a benefit and it's worthwhile. I do have a few questions in my mind which I will leave to those of a legal cast of mind. I certainly think the issue of who is an interested party is an interesting question because it raises the question as to whether the revised regulatory process will serve a broader public mandate or indeed whether the government will deal with the broader public issues in some other way.

My intention is to deal with concerns which I understood were before this committee and the government about what happens after the Bill 39 process is set up, and I would add also what happens during the runup to 1998.

What I'd like to do is not speak for or against deregulation, but rather to give you an interpretation of what happened in Britain when they deregulated the intercity market and what I think might be the implication for us here.

Before doing that, I want to make some general remarks about the British case because there are obviously some important differences. First of all, as a brief summary, the intercity deregulation was, in my opinion, a modest success. Certainly from a financial point of view it worked well and there wasn't a great deal of adverse comment about losses of services; there was some and I'll talk about that later.

The main reason for that was that they had a very particular industry structure which we don't have here and also the availability of services provided by local governments, and I shall be turning to that later. But that's an important difference.

The second thing to keep in mind is, as in Ontario, the intercity market is a small part of a larger bus market. In the UK, the bus industry is worth about $7 billion a year, of which only 4%, about $300 million, is due to the intercity scheduled market and I might add that about 80% of that I believe now is taken by one carrier, one dominant carrier in that country — certainly not the same as here. It's also important to keep in mind that when you hear comment about the British experience, typically much of the adverse comment concerns urban services where there are some interesting issues and not intercity. There's been very little debate on that score.

Finally, I want to point out that in Britain what you saw was the result of both deregulation and privatization, whereas what we're looking at is just deregulation, so we shouldn't expect the same scale of activity here.

With that little preface, I'll go into my little story. There are copies of my presentation circulating, so you don't need to take notes.

Prior to deregulation, the National Bus Co, which of course was the public sector, operated both local and intercity operations throughout Britain. They set up the National Express division to organize and market intercity services which were provided by many other companies. When the government deregulated services in 1980 National Express, still a public company, had spent several years analysing its market and they were ready to compete — and that's an important issue. We don't have the same sort of situation here with a dominant carrier that is an obvious market leader.

Immediately after deregulation, they were challenged by a consortium of bus operators — and it's important that National Express saw them off really quickly, and they did that within about six months. It took about two years for the consortium to fold, but they had done the job on them in six months.

I doubt that we're going to see that kind of stabilization here and the reason is that we have several very capable carriers and the possibility of entry from the US. We might eventually be facing service by one, I hope strong, carrier, but not before a period of uncertainty and the question is what damage that may do to the public transport market in the interim.

During the 1980s, National Express operated within the public sector. In 1988, it was privatized; it was sold to its management. Because they were a marketing and planning unit and not a bus operator, they continued to contract for services. This is a rather unusual model from our perspective. It's rather like the old GO Transit model, but not what we have now.

In 1991, the company was sold on to its investors and it's now listed on the London Stock Exchange and anyone who bought stock at the time did very well. It's a profitable company. They are able to acquire capital for expansion, they now own the fourth-largest regional airport in the UK, a large European tour operator, and they've also developed a parallel airport coach system, so these are no slouches.

Back to what happened under deregulation: One of the immediate effects was a sharp drop in fares on the main routes — about 50% — and the services improved significantly. During this period the traffic went up. There were large gains in traffic, and some of it came from British Rail, but not all of it. However, since then, fares have crept up gradually. They're now back to where they were before deregulation, pretty much. You can still get a good deal on the trunk routes coming into and out of London, but that, combined with British Rail's response, because we're talking about quite a capable rail operator as opposed to what we have in this country, has basically eliminated most of those gains. So National Express is back to the traffic it had before deregulation.

The other interesting feature is that National Express, and I think you'll see this here, has moved off standardized, distance-based fare structures. What they do is differentiate by market, and what that means is that on the less-travelled routes you get higher fares. That's inevitable. That suggests increased competition in Ontario might result in some fare cuts, but they're not going to last long. Where you're going to see the competition that's significant and beneficial, in my opinion, is in service quality. You'll see perhaps more use of tour quality coaches on the main runs and possibly increased frequency on the main routes.

Of course, the other side of this, and it's been mentioned already, is that as the company focused on profitable routes it cut back on services to smaller communities. There's not a lot of information on this. There were some studies done by the DOT and other organizations. There was one study in the east Midlands area which suggested that for cities that were larger in size than 100,000 they got more service; if you were below that, you got less. In a town I used to live in, Loughborough, which is about 100 miles north of London, a population about 50,000, the services dropped from about 96 departures a week to about 30 over a period of four years.

This isn't particularly surprising. You shouldn't expect operators in a competitive environment to support money-losing services. What is a little less clear in the British case is whether it mattered, whether this was a particularly important loss, because in many areas local bus services are provided by the counties, and that provides people the opportunity to connect to the urban centres and thence to get intercity services. So rural services may be not consistently good throughout Britain — there are some bad areas to be — but essentially there is an alternative. Here we don't have the comparable alternative: local services running through rural areas, subsidized by some form of local government.

The other point I want to make about local services is that a lot of communities do not now have a great deal of service and I think it may sound a little crude, but there may not be a lot to be lost. I think an important issue is, what in fact are we talking about?

In concluding my remarks, I want to draw attention to two particular features, and this is going to particularly focus on what I think should be happening during the regime that is being set up by Bill 39, because the issue is in fact what is the larger context within which this bill operates and what are the things you need to do to make deregulation a success if and when it occurs?

First of all, National Express owns very few buses. I've already said that they contract for services throughout Britain, and I think this is an important reason for their success. The company's focus is on market research and planning, service design, quality control and financial management. This results in a strategic business that is less concerned with operational details and more focused on a workable passenger system. I think it is an important point that the focus on the passenger system, which you'll see in competent airlines and you see in National Express, is what partly explains their success. What you're doing is adding value for the customer.

There is no equivalent to National Express here. There isn't one phone number that I can call to get information on services throughout Ontario or to book a seat. Although there are some good carriers in Ontario, I don't really have the same assurance of timely, convenient and consistently high-quality service throughout the province, because we have a fragmented system. Unless government plays a direct role, and this obviously seems pretty unlikely, we are going to only get an effective system if one carrier dominates. That may seem a little hard. It may sound as if I'm against competition, but I think we have to raise some questions about what it is we want at the end. The alternative is fragmentation and the uncertainty, the unevenness of quality of service that goes with that.

So the issue for me is not whether deregulation is good or bad policy, but what should be done while Bill 39's streamlined regulation is in force. In the runup to 1998, should the regulator limit change, in effect freezing a fragmented industry, or actively encourage industry consolidation and repositioning? Putting it another way, in providing policy direction to a new regulator, should the province say what bus system it wants following this interim period?

The other concern that I've alluded to is the impact of deregulation on smaller communities. Obviously, there may be low-cost operators, and that's certainly an argument that my colleagues in Alberta and Ontario have alluded to from time to time, that they may take up the slack. But some communities are bound to lose out. I think we have to be realistic about this. Some of the new services that we get may not be that well-connected with the services on the main routes. In Alberta there's been some direct attempt to negotiate with Greyhound to make sure there are those connections, but we shouldn't assume that we're going to get them here.

For many years we relied on the regulatory bargain which protected intercity runs in exchange for service to smaller communities. This bargain doesn't operate any more. We can't rely on regulation to assure service to small communities. That can't be an argument for maintaining regulation. If these services are truly essential, they will have to be provided some other way.

That brings me to the other feature of Britain's bus market which I mentioned, and that is the role of local government in providing bus service, not only in urban areas but also to outlying communities. In Britain, planning and funding of these services is a local responsibility. There's a little bit of indirect funding from central government, but it's essentially a local matter.

This suggests that we should ask not how to prevent service cuts through regulation, but ask who is responsible for services of a local or regional nature. If the interest is local, why not also the responsibility to decide what kind of service should be provided? The province can play a role by facilitating cooperative planning among communities, but decisions on services and funding should rest at the local level. Communities may choose not to support these services and may lose them, but this would simply reflect local priorities. I see this as a proper exercise of political responsibility. That concludes my remarks and I would be pleased to try and answer your questions.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Simcoe Centre): Thank you for your presentation. I'm just interested in your comments with respect to England, and what resulted with what was a major carrier, and with respect to smaller communities. As you noted in your paper, you said there's not much service provided at this time, but when you make the statement — I believe it's at page 2, number 3, under deregulation — you finish off saying, "Ontario may eventually be served by one strong carrier, but not before a period of uncertainty, which may impair the market for public transport." I just ask you why it would impair and why you think there's a need for one dominant carrier in this province.

Dr Bunting: To give you an example of the kinds of problems that have occurred in the urban bus market in Britain, where there has been a period of considerable competition, instability, uncertainty, the market for public transport has continued to decline. In other words, the hope for improvement in the public market by essentially entertaining privatization and deregulation hasn't come to pass, and part of the concern is that the public may be confused by the variety of operators, the variations in service levels, changes in carriers, because of course some carriers are going to go broke and other ones will come in — that's part of what a market's all about — and the concern is that that's going to impair the market from that point of view.

The bus industry has particularly worked hard to counter a very negative image. They've tried to improve the quality of bus stations, tried to improve the quality of the equipment, but you can lose that quite quickly. Certainly the rail system got a very bad reputation many years ago and it certainly didn't do it any good. So I think that the issue is not necessarily whether or not one should deregulate, but what can one do to encourage some degree of consistency among the industry to encourage the industry to maintain high standards not only on the safety side but in terms of public service.

Mr Tascona: But wouldn't competition in the industry encourage there to be service in the smaller centres, which doesn't exist at this time for this province?

Dr Bunting: In some centres you will get lower-cost operators. In many cases that will be the appropriate answer and in fact you may get better quality because some of those may run more frequently than would somebody operating a 47-seat bus, so you're right on that score. There are going to be some communities for which the traffic is just not sufficient to justify that kind of service.

Of course the other issue is one of connections, because if you're a small business running, say, a minivan service connecting to a community, you don't have a guarantee that you're going to get cooperation on things like through-ticketing, appropriate parking etc to make the right kinds of connections with the main carrier. Those are solvable problems, but they are problems none the less, and I think they need to be addressed.

Mr Colle: Thank you very much. You've presented a very objective analysis, and I think it's the type of analysis that is required in this discussion and certainly in this time of transition. I appreciate your input and I hope that you continue to have a role to perhaps guide the decision-makers in government in terms of what the impacts are.

The question I have is that the real challenge we have here in Ontario is that we have a fragmented industry, and given the fact that the industry is fragmented, the only way you're going to have a level of service in our smaller outlying communities and fares that are reasonable is that you have to have a certain degree of government intervention, because you don't have that one carrier, National Express, that you have in England, so how do you achieve that coordination if you've got full deregulation?

Dr Bunting: I think there are different types of government intervention. I once saw a list of about 20 different styles, running from encouraging people to getting in and doing it oneself. I think the role that government can play is to facilitate relationships between the smaller carriers and the majors, perhaps to fund the kinds of research the industry needs to do in order to define the kinds of infrastructure that it needs in order to provide the kinds of system functions that National Express provides as a dominant carrier. For example, smaller operators can't get into the business of supplying terminals, they can't get into the business of supplying, say, a province-wide reservation and information system, and governments may have an important role to play in that, but I'm very hesitant to say that government should be directly involved in coordinating relationships between suppliers of services in the marketplace.

I think that the regulatory model certainly helped a bit, because in fact there was a period during which carriers cooperated with one another, so that, for example, if I went into my bus station in Kingston, I could get information not only about Voyageur's services but also about Greyhound's or any of the other carriers in the province. Now, to some extent, that's beginning to break down, and that may be an indication of where we're going, but I don't think there is a basis for the kind of regulation that we've had in the past, and certainly what's happened with the market is not encouraging. In other words, we've had regulation; the market has declined quite precipitously.

Mr Colle: But is that equated to the industry or other factors? There's been a decline in bus ridership all over North America and it's not necessarily because of the regulatory structures. There's certainly car usage, demographic changes. Those are maybe more important factors than whether there's government regulation or not.

Dr Bunting: I think that's a fair comment except that the challenge of reviving your public transport system is not going to reside in protecting the regulatory system. It requires adaptation, creativity and change, and yes, I do think there is a government role. I'm not confident that we're necessarily going to get the right kind of government role out of this at the end of the day, but I don't think regulation is going to solve the problem.

Mr Colle: No, but the thing is to try and achieve some way of cooperative, innovative partnership with government and the industry to try and achieve some kind of progression towards providing better service at lower cost and maybe maintaining profit levels at reasonable levels.

The Chair: Good statement. Thank you, Mr Colle.

Mr Pouliot: Dr Bunting, we're certainly most appreciative, my colleague and I, of your remarks. We are both from northern Ontario, and I know you attempt to be so terribly consistent, and we like the analogy, the parallel with Great Britain, with England in this case. If we were to speak of government interference and be equally consistent, we would remind ourselves that GO Transit recoups as an objective close to 70 cents on the fare box. The government pays 100% of rolling stock. TTC, right here in Toronto, recoups 68 cents. That's during very, very good years. Then the citizens, the taxpayers of Toronto and the taxpayers of the province join forces and they split the remaining 32-cent shortfall, and the government, the people pay 75% of rolling stock. You can take these figures quite close to the bank, I know of, which I'm comfortable with these, which I'm talking about.

I need your help. The population of England is 56 million, 57 million or 58 million. Is it in that neighbourhood? Could be one of the three? The population of Ontario is closer to 11 million at present. I see with some comfort that the 160 kilometres — and that's where in my humble opinion the analogy starts. I'll put it to you this way. In my riding, there are 33,000 people and we are the size of Germany. We try to find the situation that fits us, and there's an acquiescence, yes, when you are a small community and it's not your role, I don't appreciate, it wouldn't be fair to say it, but you chose to live there, but nothing can be lost if you don't have it. I guess you don't miss what you don't have. So even if I tried to say, "Well, how many?" to make it relevant, if we were to go 100,000, for us it's a lot of people. There are over 800 communities and we know the size of Toronto, Ottawa, London and then you start Windsor, Sudbury, maybe, shortly Thunder Bay, then you start really searching, once you pass the first dozen, that 90% of the communities have less than 10,000.

But my question is as follows: What did you factor in? We know that because of the changes there, the intercity bus has been, if not in disfavour, the numbers have been decreasing. Why the comfort and the latitude, with the highest of respect, Dr Bunting, that in the final analysis, we will have one giant operator, that by whatever ways we'll have eliminated, when we hear and will hear of people who say: "Thank you very much. I'm very comfortable where I am. Just tell me what the rules of the game are, keep the playing field level and I will do it." What would you answer to those presenters, people that are doing that for a living? They're the experts in the field.

Dr Bunting: Let me deal with the question of the single operator, because that came up before in the earlier comments. Obviously there are monopoly concerns when that sort of thing occurs. I think there's reason to be concerned, particularly if there isn't a good alternative. In Britain there is in the case of British Rail. My reason for thinking that we will end up with a single operator, at least in southern Ontario, is that as soon as somebody figures out how to provide the system in the way National Express did, they will find themselves attracting the customers, and they will have the advantage.

Whether you get the same story in northern Ontario is a different matter because clearly when an operator is looking for their profitable markets, they're obviously going to pick the main routes, Sudbury through west and so on. They're not going to go into the smaller communities.

Certainly in Britain, there is the other 20%. There are a number of smaller operators who deal in primarily local or commuter-type services, servicing London. There's a very interesting case between Oxford and London where there are two operators that are not National Express running head to head, and there is of course rural service, but of course the rural service is subsidized.

The issue I was trying to bring to the fore is the question of who is responsible, and it may well be in the north's interest, as it may well be in my own community's interest, to take a direct involvement to make sure that there are certain services that are of social significance or indeed economic significance provided.

The question for the government is always, should the province be involved in it, directly or indirectly or how? That really is a question that hasn't been answered.

I don't know how it's going to work out, but it seems unlikely that we're going to end up with half a dozen scheduled carriers surviving in a deregulated market. I really don't see it. I would even be surprised if we had two or three by the time we get, say, five or six years down the road.

The Chair: Thank you, Dr Bunting. I appreciate your taking the time to come and appear before us today.

ONTARIO MOTOR COACH ASSOCIATION

The Chair: With that, our next presentation will be the Ontario Motor Coach Association, Brian Crow. Again, 20 minutes to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and questions and answers.

Mr Brian Crow: Mr Chair, members, my name is Brian Crow. I'm president of the Ontario Motor Coach Association. The OMCA represents bus companies, tour operators, bus suppliers. We have affiliate members that range from hoteliers, foodservice organizations, attractions and destination management organizations that sell to the motorcoach tour industry. We have members in every province and in 43 states. We have a total of 1,209 members.

Our membership is very diverse. The interests of those members that supply products or services to a tour company are different from the interests of the tour company. The interests of the tour company are quite different from the interests of the bus company that supplies them charters.

Even within the bus operator membership of OMCA there is diversity. Some bus companies operate scheduled services with or without BPX. Some operate charter services, others tours, others contract municipal transit services, some operate commuter runs and some operate contract services.

Bus company members in our association vary greatly in size. We have the largest bus operator in North America — it operates 30,000 vehicles — and we have a one-bus operation affectionately referred to as a mom-and-pop operation. The needs of these bus operators vary greatly. The needs of a large carrier are significantly different from the needs of a small carrier, so with economic regulation, our opinions vary significantly. The opinion on economic regulation is not unanimous.

In the 1920s, the Ontario government chose to regulate our industry. They created regulation in the hope of creating stability in the industry to better serve the public. Over the years, the Public Vehicles Act has been amended, but generally on a relatively minor basis. The principles that applied to the initial economic regulation still apply today.

Our industry has worked and invested under these rules of economic regulation. The industry has accepted the bargain which sees the higher-density routes and higher-return services cross-subsidize services that are more remote or more rural in nature and that are unprofitable. This service to the public was the industry's end of the bargain. In return, the industry received a stability gain through a regulated market.

Over the past five years, OMCA has tried to get our members to read, shall I call it, the writing on the wall as it applies to economic regulation. There is a global movement towards deregulation. Other transportation sectors, as well as other industries, have been deregulated.

NAFTA discussed deregulation. The federal government has convened a Canadian Extraprovincial Bus Task Force to look at deregulation of the industry, and the federal government has indicated its preference for deregulation. We have to consider that direction.

In 1993, OMCA wanted to find out what our members thought, so we hired Professor Richard Sobberman of the University of Toronto, who surveyed our members. Conclusion: The vast majority of our members wanted to retain economic regulation, but the vast majority of our members did not think the existing system worked.

In 1995, we engaged the service of Dr Mark Bunting, whom you just heard, to do a more in-depth survey of our operator members. Dr Bunting found that most of our members prefer continued regulation but at the same time do not support the status quo. In particular, licensing enforcement processes could be greatly improved and their cost reduced.

Our members also expressed concern that while they are not opposed to competition, outright deregulation could compromise safe operations and would greatly diminish the role of Ontario carriers faced with unfair competition with out-of-province carriers. Many of our tour operators — some operate buses, some don't — are in favour of deregulation so that they can get better prices or better service.

In August 1995, we met with the Honourable Al Palladini, Minister of Transportation, who indicated and made it very clear to us that deregulation was inevitable and it was a matter of deciding when. Consequently, our operator membership met, discussed this direction and approved a proposal to phase in deregulation over a three-year period. The proposal was submitted to the Ontario government and it was not accepted.

Again in November, our operator membership met and discussed the issue of deregulation and expressed, among other things, the following concerns: harmonization with neighbouring provinces; time to adjust for deregulation; effective enforcement in the interim period; a fair and consistently applied system and that it be cost-effective.

With that, we developed another position that was approved by the majority of our members in February 1996. That position, in most respects, reflects Bill 39.

When it became apparent that the government would deregulate our industry, we believed we only had three options: outright deregulation immediately; maintain the existing system until deregulation; or develop an interim regulatory system as similarly proposed in Bill 39. We were not in favour of outright deregulation.

There are many in our industry who believe the existing regulatory system is on a slippery slope to a deregulated environment. The existing system has seen reductions in scheduled service. It has provided for a huge influx of Quebec-based operators into the Toronto market; for example, 50 to 60 Quebec operators at Pearson airport and only seven or eight Ontario carriers.

The existing system has antiquated wording in some licences which makes it impossible for proper interpretations, understanding and enforcement of these licences, and consequently enforcement has suffered.

Another example is a carrier that has a line run licence from Drayton to Kitchener, but got charged for picking up in Waterloo on his way to Kitchener.

Why does OMCA support the passing of Bill 39? It is our understanding this is not a deregulation bill. We support it because we think it will provide the Ontario government time to harmonize the regulatory environment so that Ontario carriers are not discriminated against by other provinces.

We are in favour of it because it will provide the Ministry of Transportation time to implement safety and insurance standards that ensure continuance of the excellent safety record of our industry. It will provide the industry time to adjust to and plan for open competition at some point in the future and, very importantly, it will create an environment where enforcement will be easier and more effective.

It will assist the public, in that carriers will have to provide 90 days' notice of termination of service or 30 days' notice for major reduction of service. It will require carriers to assist in finding replacement service if they decide to discontinue a service.

It will provide a more streamlined application process.

The longer the industry is left hanging, the harder it will be for our industry. Many carriers want to get on with it so they can make business decisions either to reinvest in the industry or to remove themselves from the industry.

In summary, it is our opinion that defeating Bill 39 will result in de facto deregulation of our industry. This is our belief because the existing regulatory system, without a commitment to and funds for enforcement by government, will in fact be deregulation.

There need to be rules, but it's important that all carriers know the rules and abide by them. Passing Bill 39 provides an interim period when carriers know the rules, the rules for now and the rules after January 1, 1998, and can be prepared for deregulation. It also provides for enforcement of these rules. Also, importantly, it allows time for the industry, along with government, to deal with issues such as safety and harmonization.

We ask that you approve Bill 39. Thank you for your time.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Crow. You've allowed us three and a half minutes per caucus. The questioning this time will start with the official opposition.

Mr Colle: Mr Crow, just a question of interest. Do any Ontario operators have a licence to operate out of Dorval? How many licences would there be?

Mr Crow: I believe there are two, whether it's Mirabel or Dorval. The other problem is there's two; one's international and one's domestic. At Pearson it's all the same. I believe there are two Ontario carriers that have licences out of the airport in Montreal.

Mr Colle: The fact that there are two, is that just because our carriers don't have any interests there or is it because of the restrictions imposed on Ontario carriers by the Quebec government?

Mr Crow: There were restrictions imposed on Ontario carriers. Up until just recently you had to be a resident of the province of Quebec before you could get a licence in Quebec. We worked on that restriction and I think it was removed six months to a year ago.

Mr Colle: So now you can apply for a licence if you are an Ontario-based carrier and not a citizen?

Mr Crow: Correct.

Mr Colle: Do you think that will open up opportunities for other Ontario companies to seek licences in Quebec?

Mr Crow: A couple have already applied. Their applications are in process, but I don't believe there will be anywhere near the neighbourhood of 50 or 60 applying or obtaining licences in Quebec, because you still have to obtain it. There's still a PNC, or public need and convenience, contest there.

Mr Colle: So there's still going to be some difficulty obtaining those licences. Do you see that as an ongoing problem, despite the fact they've changed some of the rules?

Mr Crow: It will not be easy to obtain licences in the province of Quebec anywhere, airports included.

Mr Colle: Would it be profitable or viable, do you think, for Ontario companies to get into Quebec? Is there the kind of market there that could benefit Ontario carriers?

Mr Crow: There's certainly a market there. There are certainly trips that come in from Europe and Asia, although I believe Pearson is the predominant airport where the most business is. Consequently, we're getting that competition from those Quebec carriers.

Mr Colle: I think you've given a pretty good rundown of the juxtaposed positions and problems with bus deregulation, and there are some concerns. You feel that Bill 39 essentially gives you an opportunity to iron out some of the problems the industry may have over the next couple of years before deregulation comes about. As you said, there are some concerns that deregulation may impact negatively on some of your members.

Mr Crow: Absolutely. As I said, we've been operating under a set of rules for 60 years; now that the rules are changed. We need some time to work with government to make sure, as Mr Pouliot said earlier, we have a level playing field between non-domicile and domicile carriers.

Mr Colle: That would be the biggest concern you think your members would have, basically that level playing field. Of all the other concerns they have about deregulation, is that the one sticking point that would do the most damage if it wasn't corrected?

Mr Crow: As I said, our industry is very diverse and there are a lot of different opinions. It affects different carriers differently. If you're operating a charter market in Toronto with a whole bunch of competition now — if we've got 50 Quebec carriers out of the airport, what's it going to matter if there are 51? That is a little different than a carrier operating out of North Bay, where there are one or two competitors. He may face another 10 or 15 competitors.

Mr Colle: So it depends on whether you provide line service or charter and then —

Mr Crow: That difference as well, yes.

Mr Pouliot: Mr Crow, I want to take you back to the HighGrader magazine that has a picture of people who work in the mining sector. It says: "In their 1995 brief to the intercity bus task force, the OMCA predicted that once deregulation came into Ontario" — Mr Crow, let's make no mistake about it, if I may be bold — may I?

Mr Crow: Go ahead. I notice the article is entitled Cheap Shot. Is that something I should be concerned about?

Mr Pouliot: No. You should be more concerned about my having immunity at the committee and you not having it.

A year and a half from now, whether you like it or not, the minister is coming in with deregulation, period. You can take that to the bank and cash it, and it won't bounce; that's what it says.

Your brief says, "When it became apparent that government would deregulate our industry, many in our industry believe that our options are limited." That's what you're saying yourself, so you have some degree of acquiescence.

At the bottom of your page 2, you say, "...provide the Ontario government time to convince the federal government and other provinces to harmonize the regulatory environment...."

We know the very recent position, just a matter of a few months back, of Manitoba — quite adamant. Quebec has other things to look at. They won't move. In a year and a half, in my opinion, it's not likely that there will be enough powers brought forth to lean on the province of Quebec so they will change their mind — to please whom?

It's highly likely that the situation will remain the same. If it were so, would your membership be much more concerned? I'm not talking about regulatory changes that could be done to regulation amendments; I'm talking about the introduction of deregulation, because that's what this bill is all about. It just gives a little time for the transition. A year and a half from now, you wake up one morning, and that's what it is. How would your membership feel if there was no harmonization between Manitoba and Ontario in the next year and a half?

Mr Crow: The majority of our members would not like that at all. We are concerned about deregulation. We're concerned about the federal government announcing its plans to deregulate. As you heard earlier today, if the federal government deregulates, there's not an awful lot left of provincial regulation to deregulate. So we're obviously concerned with deregulation, whether it's now, whether it's by the province or whether it's by the federal government.

Mr Pouliot: Mr Crow, was that a cheap shot?

Mr Crow: No, but the article did say that, didn't it?

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Crow. We appreciate your taking — oh, a great afternoon I'm having. Mr Carroll.

Mr Carroll: Mr Crow, just a couple of things I'd like you to comment on. Are you familiar with this list that's being circulated around by the Freedom to Move group about the 170 locations they say will lose their bus service?

Mr Crow: I'm not familiar with that one, but I assume it's the same 170 that somebody issued a release on last fall.

Mr Carroll: Any comment on the validity of that claim?

Mr Crow: When that list came out, I contacted the carriers that I thought would be serving those points. The carriers indicated to me that it was not a list they had generated, that the companies had generated. I'm not sure where it came from — you'd have to ask the authors — but I was told it was not generated by companies, and it's the companies that make the decisions on what points will be served or not. They did not generate that list.

Mr Carroll: In his brief, Mr Parkin from the ATU said, "Regulation is essential to maintain a healthy competition." Would you care to comment on how you feel about regulation being essential to maintain healthy competition? It seems like a bit of an oxymoron to me. How would you feel about that?

Mr Crow: I guess initially I'd say the same as you: It seems to be an oxymoron. It depends what that regulation does. If the regulation forces a monopoly, then it's not competitive. If regulation allows an oligopoly, then you can have some form of competition. For example, you can regulate municipal transit, but it can be contracted out to the private sector on a bid basis and operated. You can have competition within a regulated framework, but I'm not sure in the context that he talked about it.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Carroll. Again, my apologies. I'm always so mesmerized by Mr Pouliot's preambles.

Thank you again, Mr Crow, for taking the time to come and see us here today.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF STUDENTS — ONTARIO

The Chair: Next up will be the Canadian Federation of Students — Ontario, Heather Bishop, chairperson. Good afternoon, Miss Bishop. Again, we have 20 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and question and answer period.

Miss Heather Bishop: My presentation will be relatively short.

I'm sure you're all wondering what students have to do with the inner workings of the transit industry, and the answer is, very little. We got involved originally last fall with the Freedom to Move coalition when the original announcement was made about bus deregulation. A number of our students from the extreme regions of the province, from smaller communities, called in expressing concern that they wouldn't be having bus service in their communities and letting us know that this was one of the primary modes of transportation for them getting back and forth to school and to job interviews.

I've put some information in the package about the federation and how it works. Basically, all our policies are implemented and brought forward by individual members. So the reason I'm here is because individual members of our organization are concerned that they won't have access to transportation to get back and forth to post-secondary schools and to larger cities to jobs. Primarily these are students coming from the north, from remote communities like Kapuskasing, Hearst, Rainy River, all the ones up there who don't necessarily have access to air transport, don't have the finances to fly, and where rail service has been discontinued.

There are very few details in Bill 39 that we're concerned with. The notice period was the only one that stood out that we felt we should comment on specifically. In the bill it says "in accordance with the regulations," yet we heard the minister say in the House the 30 days and the 90 days. That was something we felt strongly about speaking out in favour of, being more specific with the 30 days and the 90 days. Students get a little bit wrapped up, especially at exam time, around Christmas and at the end of the year, and if they're depending on the bus service, chances are they're not going to buy their bus ticket a whole lot in advance. If there is only 10 days' notice and their route has been discontinued, they may be stranded at Christmastime because of the stress of exams and not a whole lot of planning. If there is 30 to 90 days' notice of a change of route or a discontinued service, that gives them a little bit more time to plan and prepare for that kind of thing and we don't have students stuck far away from home at key times in the year.

Just for interest's sake, we found that students tend to travel about five times a year, travelling back and forth from home to school: Thanksgiving, Christmas, Easter, reading week and one other time throughout the year, generally for a birthday or an anniversary. Students in general are having more access to cars than they had in the past, but again we found that for students from the north and students from smaller communities that's not necessarily the case, and a lot of them are very dependent on the bus service.

Our concentration was more speaking today about deregulation, and I understand that it is more or less inevitable, but we have a year and a half until it comes into place so we felt compelled today to come and speak out about some of the students' concerns with deregulation and plant the seeds of a little bit of a question in people's minds. Maybe before it happens there can be some more changes made that will ensure that smaller communities don't lose their service and students aren't sort of stuck out in the cold.

I've outlined in the brief very shortly some of the costs involved with post-secondary education. That may or may not be of interest to people, but I felt it was important so that people realize that students are facing a huge burden and are looking for the cheapest form of transportation, and in many cases the bus is it. So losing the service through deregulation and losing it in smaller communities could be devastating to a lot of students.

Safety is an issue that we're very concerned with. We've seen in a number of other areas things that have been deregulated. Prices go down initially and service looks really great, and over a period of time, through the competition to make more money, it gets a little bit more fierce and people start cutting back to make that profit. We're concerned that maintenance levels with the vehicles will be cut back, and that's certainly going to cause unsafe conditions not only for the driver and the passengers but for other people on the road. We're concerned about the training involved with the drivers. If unregulated companies don't have to follow specific guidelines for their drivers, we're concerned about the safety of passengers again and of people on the road, especially in the north with severe conditions in the winter.

The safety issue that comes into play that you'll notice in here which concerns me personally the most if service is cut off for students who don't have access to air or rail travel is common practice right now and one that concerns a lot of student leaders, and that's people accepting rides home back and forth from people they don't know. That's especially a concern for women. A lot of times there's only two people in the car. Our parents taught us not to take rides from strangers and people we don't know, yet students do it all the time because certain services aren't available to them. This is a concern, as is hitchhiking, for people from small communities if bus services are cut off in those areas.

Access is listed in here as well. It may sound a little bit farfetched, but there are a large number of students from smaller communities and northern communities that either don't have access to a car or a train or are intimidated by Toronto driving to come down here for job interviews in a car and who rely very heavily on the bus for that. So if the small towns are cut off, it could have something to do with their unemployment levels later on.

Some general concerns that Freedom to Move and other groups we have spoken with have around the issue of bus deregulation include the loss of jobs. There is concern, and I heard it mentioned a few minutes ago, about unfair competition from out of province if the harmonization doesn't happen and Ontario's not allowed to compete in other provinces. Students don't like to hear anything about potential job loss in any industry at this point. We're all hoping that jobs are going to flourish.

The other serious one is the GO bus service. A lot of students, especially in southern Ontario and the Metro Toronto area, are heavily reliant upon the GO bus service to get back and forth to schools and to jobs. Our concern is that if deregulation happens and there isn't some kind of regulation put back into place regarding GO buses, there will be other carriers hijacking peak times and peak hours. Initially that's going to lower the cost for students. Ultimately it's going to cost people who live outside of Guelph and have to take that bus. It's going to cost GO Transit because they're going to have fewer riders. That costs the taxpayer, that service is going to result in decreased service for other people who use it. So that's one of our main concerns in the Metro Toronto area.

I said here that it's easy to criticize any legislation without coming up with alternatives, and I certainly don't claim to have any really great ones. If the industry is prepared to regulate and pay for the cost of regulation, as seems to be the case over the next year or so, we would be happy to see the regulation left in place. If it's not costing the taxpayer anything and it's putting some stipulations on the way the industry is run, that likely is going to make it safer for everyone.

The other option that we thought about was smaller buses, obviously for smaller routes, northern cities. You don't need to have the big 47-passenger bus. Varsity teams and schools have managed on smaller buses. You get what you need and you don't drive the big vehicles and obviously there's going to be some cost savings there.

Students are big ones for working out partnerships with people to try and save money, so perhaps there are businesses in communities or smaller companies that could work out some kind of agreement and some kind of partnership to make sure that people are still serviced in these communities and no one is left stranded.

We recognize that Bill 39 is not the deregulation bill specifically. That's not set to happen until 1998. Students, again, don't have a whole lot of place here discussing the detailed aspects of bus deregulation, but there are some concerns that we have with deregulation and we felt this would be the time to bring them up so that you have a year and a half to think about these and perhaps fix a few of the problems that you may not have considered yet.

Ms Shelley Martel (Sudbury East): Miss Bishop, it's a very good thing that you're here and it's more than appropriate that you've come here today to talk about this issue, because I think all members have to recognize again that while Bill 39, as the government purports, is only some minor changes that will help the industry, especially around what happens at the transport board, Mr Crow certainly made it clear in his last presentation that Mr Palladini does see this as the interim measure before we have full bus deregulation. There's no doubt about it. While some of the government members in the House have been trying to say the year and a half before we get to 1998 will allow the minister to study it, it's very clear that the minister has no intention of studying it. The question is, how fast are we going to get to it? I suspect if we could have done it full tilt right away he probably would have done that too.

Returning to the concerns that you are relating on behalf of students, what do you think this is going to do to access for students who are coming from rural Ontario and northern Ontario? Both Gilles and I, as we said earlier, represent a number of those small communities, he more than I. Certainly, a lot of the kids who are living in those communities don't have cars. Their parents can't afford to give them cars. With their increase in tuition over the next couple of years, a lot of them are not going to be able to afford a bus ticket. What is access for them going to be like if probably the single source of transportation they now have in and out of the community is taken away?

Miss Bishop: We've seen a lot of access questions come up over the last little while, specifically around financial things and the rationalization issues that have been discussed about closing specific universities throughout the region. I think people in rural communities and extreme northern communities are sort of hanging on. A lot of them have succumbed to the fact that they're not going to be able to go away to school and are partaking in distance education programs. There are only a couple of universities in the province that offer distance ed to the extent that a student can complete an entire degree through distance education.

A lot of rural and northern communities are solely dependent on bus travel, many more than I expected until I started getting involved with this. I think it's cutting them right off, frankly. There will be some distance education through Laurentian, through Lakehead, but there certainly isn't the vast range of programs that a student should be entitled to if they're looking at post-secondary education. I personally don't think that it's value for the money. You pay pretty much the same for distance education or for going to the classroom and experiencing the whole experience. I think students in rural communities and in the north especially are being completely cut off from post-secondary education if their final mode of transportation is cut off.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): Thank you very much for the presentation. I have a quick question at the outset. I'm just reading that you represent 110,000 individual members across the province, you're a democratic organization, and the policies originate from the members. Just a question of process: When you have a policy, does it go through the student governments for all the 110,000 students you represent?

Miss Bishop: Generally. Individual policies come forth from students, either directly to the office or through their student union. Those policies then go to general meetings, where they're voted on by representatives from each of the schools, and then they go back to the student unions at the local campuses and are discussed there.

Mr Baird: Did your position on bus deregulation go through the general meeting?

Miss Bishop: It was discussed this past January at our general meeting, because we originally got involved in November with Freedom To Move. It was discussed at our national general meeting just to ensure that students across the country knew what was going on, and there was not a lot of discussion from other parts of the country. It was in November that students from the north spoke up most heavily and said, "We have to do something about this." It was discussed in January.

Mr Baird: But this policy, though, has been through all the —

Miss Bishop: Yes, it has been discussed at our general meeting in January.

Mr Baird: But more than discussed; this policy you're presenting, all the schools in Ontario —

Miss Bishop: Yes, these are the initiatives that were presented by people at our general meeting, so between January and June they all go back to student unions for discussion and they'll be discussed again in June. But these are the initiatives that came up from the students in January for interim policy.

Mr Baird: But the student unions which you appended to your brief would have supported that?

Miss Bishop: Yes, they've all seen these.

Mr Baird: Great, thank you. Just a question with respect to GO Transit, because it is something that I am learning more about because I'm not from the greater Toronto area. On the last page of your brief, with respect to general concerns, you mention that you believe many students are dependent on GO bus service. "If the industry is deregulated, there will be independent companies trying to capture the peak routes and times," which would initially result in lower fares but might see less revenue and then see GO abandon them.

We heard from a previous presenter, with respect particularly to an Uxbridge-Toronto line, which includes Stouffville and Markham, that they were actually able to go in and then when GO pulled out, they were actually able to go in and make up those lines. What would lead you to think that would be the conclusion with respect to GO Transit service?

Miss Bishop: It was just sort of a general overview that we had of people coming in from — this was Guelph that brought up this one because they are very dependent on the GO service — just a general feeling that if there were competitors coming in — the service from that area is heavily used right now and the buses are full, they claim, when they come in.

There were concerns that if competitors came in, originally they would offer lower prices and the service coming into the city would be the same, but the service going outwards from that area, people getting into the smaller communities that are not the major runs, I think obviously — we've seen the way the government works. If the GO service is losing money, we're not going to keep funding it when there's a private company out there that can do the main routes just as well.

So our concern wasn't that the main routes would be lost, it was that the smaller routes, the more rural routes that didn't necessarily come into a bigger city — they operate obviously at a deficit already, so if the major lines begin to operate at a deficit, then those smaller communities are certain to lose.

Mr Baird: But on principle, if a private operator could come in and replace GO Transit and provide an approximate level of service, would the Canadian Federation of Students have a problem with that?

Miss Bishop: Provided it still served the smaller communities at a similar price, then we would support it. What we're not supporting is a private industry that would come in and take over the service and either cut out communities that students are currently in right now, that they need the service, or any kind of dramatic price increase. Students are strapped right now and any kind of increase in anything, even transportation, is going to limit their access to education.

If there's a private company out there that can offer the same kind of service at the same price servicing the same communities and the same numbers without the government subsidy then I would encourage the government to go out there and get them, but I'm not convinced that those communities —

Mr Baird: But it would have to go to all of them —

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Baird. Moving to the official opposition.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): You may have answered this already. I apologize. Do you have any rough idea about how many students actually use bus service in Ontario?

Miss Bishop: It varies from community to community obviously. As I mentioned, the people in Metro and southwestern Ontario rely more heavily on the GO service than they do on Greyhound or the northern services. There are a large number of northern students. I went to Laurentian and about 25% of the students at Laurentian came from the northern communities and probably 20% of those relied on their parents to drive them, which got less and less over the years as their parents could take less time off work obviously to come and pick them up for whatever, and they depended heavily on the bus. My comments were relating specifically to the north. Students in southern Ontario generally have access to other forms of public transit, but northern students are heavily reliant on this.

The Chair: Thank you, Miss Bishop. We appreciate your taking the time to come and see us here today.

CAN-AR COACH SERVICE

The Chair: This moves us along to Can-ar Coach Service, Ray Burley. Mr Burley, good afternoon, having soaked up the ambience all afternoon back there.

Mr Ray Burley: Yes, wonderful. It's not very warm in here.

Thank you for the opportunity to address this standing committee. My name is Ray Burley and I'm vice-president of Tokmakjian Group and I'm also a director of the Ontario Motor Coach Association.

This evening I'd like to address two issues which are critical to the future of the Ontario motor coach industry particular during the runup to full deregulation in 1998.

Before I get into the detailed comments about the impact of Bill 39 on our industry, I'd like to take a few moments to tell you about the Tokmakjian Group and my own experience in this industry.

Tokmakjian Group is a privately held company specialized in the transportation industry. Its operations include Can-ar Coach with about 80 highway coaches; SN Diesel which services and rebuilds all major brands of diesel engines; National Refurbishing, which rebuilds highway and transit buses; and Toronto Truck Centre, a Volvo heavy truck dealership. These operations are all leaders in their respective fields and in all they employ about 350 persons.

My own experience in transportation stretches back more than 25 years, beginning with a family-owned bus company which was typical of the bus industry in this province for many years. Later experience includes sale and servicing of construction equipment and after-market operations for heavy trucks. Most recently, before joining Tokmakjian Group, I was vice-president of sales and marketing for a national distributor of heavy trucks.

I mention this experience because it gives me a unique perspective on road transportation in Ontario. The bus and trucking industries are precisely the same, but there are enough similarities to allow me to make some observations which should be relevant in your consideration of this bill and how it will affect the industry.

The first concern is to ensure a level playing field for motor coach competition in this province. As Brian Crow has pointed out, our industry holds differing opinions on whether deregulation is a good idea or not. Regardless of these opinions, we all recognize that deregulation is a fact of life and that deregulation will benefit Ontario consumers.

Speaking for the Tokmakjian Group, and I believe for most members of the Ontario motor coach industry, we aren't afraid of fair competition, but the emphasis is on fair. As the government establishes a deregulated bus industry in this province, it is important that Ontario bus operators not be placed at a competitive disadvantage compared to their colleagues in neighbouring provinces.

Deregulation in Ontario must be harmonized with parallel action in Manitoba and Quebec. Deregulating point-to-point service in Ontario will certainly invite many new competitors from outside this province. To date, there's no indication that Ontario operators will have the same access to these competitors' home markets.

To permit new competition from out-of-province carriers without ensuring equal access for Ontario carriers in these competitive home markets is to place the Ontario industry at a significant disadvantage. Ontario would become a deregulated oasis while our companies would remain barred from working in other provinces. These competitors will be able to deploy their buses and thereby spread their costs over a much broader business base, and this is a big advantage.

As Ontario legislators, you will recognize that the regulatory environment in other provinces is beyond your realm of responsibility. However, Ontario may well lose skilled jobs and an industrial tax to other provinces if our industry suffers because other provinces' bus industry is provided with a significant competitive advantage at our expense.

I'm not recommending that the Ontario bus industry be actively protected by legislation or regulation. I am suggesting that in deregulating our industry you give full and careful consideration to balance, fairness and a level playing field for Ontario business. I believe your analysis of this situation will lend you to conclude that deregulation in Ontario must be harmonized with neighbouring provinces.

The second issue I want to address with you this evening is even more critical, and that's the importance of maintaining high safety standards in the Ontario bus transportation industry.

With more than 25 years' experience in this industry, I can assure you that Ontario's bus safety standards are higher than any other jurisdiction in North America. We can take our buses and drivers anywhere with confidence. In contrast, Ontario's standards cause operators in other jurisdictions serious concerns about their ability to measure up.

Secondly, Ontario bus operators are acutely conscious of the responsibility of carrying human cargo. Generally we don't view minimum safety standards as maximums for daily operations. We're always looking for ways to make operations safer. Because we depend on public confidence for our livelihood, the highest safety standards are both morally imperative and sound business judgement. Our record over the road is very good and it reflects this deep commitment to safety.

Yet my experience with deregulation of the trucking industry leads me to be concerned about bus safety in a highly competitive deregulated environment. That experience tells me that routine maintenance is often delayed and sometimes cut out entirely to cut cost and boost hours and service.

Recently we had an out-of-province registered bus in our Toronto service shop when it broke down. In addition to being several years older than the oldest buses still in general service in Ontario, this vehicle had at least five gross safety defects. The problem included broken glass, bald tires and one tire on the point of a blowout with a bad sidewall bulge. This bus shouldn't have been on the road anywhere, let alone in Ontario. We informed the operator that if this bus was left in our shop in that condition, we would report it immediately. The contrast between this bus and an average Ontario bus would have been obvious even to the casual observer. This isn't a very complex business.

Our industry has been told repeatedly that safety isn't being deregulated, but I have to express some doubts. Certainly the bus I described was a horrifying deviation from most currently running on Ontario roads, but let me make two points to put this example into better perspective.

Firstly, the bus I described already slipped through the system, both where it began and the trip in Ontario. Nobody from the Ministry of Transportation or the OPP caught this bus. It just turned up in our repair shop and while there will always be exceptions to general rules, it would become harder to catch the exceptions, not easier. It will become harder to catch the really bad vehicles because while the number of coaches on the road will remain about the same as today, the number of operators is expected to increase dramatically. It's comparatively easy to inspect 100 buses operated by one company; it's much harder to inspect 100 buses operated by 50 or 100 small companies.

It's also fair to suggest that small operators rarely have the financial resources to invest in new vehicles or in the most modern diagnostic and repair systems. Older vehicles aren't inherently bad or unsafe, but they do take more maintenance than newer buses if they're to be kept in safe, productive use.

Unfortunately, a deregulated operating environment with insufficient resources for safety and enforcement is unlikely to create the right conditions for a high standard of safety throughout the fleet.

The second reason for concern about this bus and about safety in a deregulated bus industry is the directly comparable experience of the trucking industry after deregulation. The Ontario bus industry has not experienced the high-profile accidents which have beset the trucking business in recent years, at least not yet. Evidence from the trucking industry after deregulation suggests that maintenance and safety issues will grow. That suggests to me that buses, such as the ones I saw, will become more common in a deregulated environment.

Accidents can occur both in the large fleets and the smallest operation and both be spectacular and tragic in their result. In addition to the immediate human cost, any significant increase in the perceived frequency or severity of bus accidents could badly damage public confidence in bus transportation generally. That will more than cancel any consumer benefit obtained from increased competition, as well as delivering irreparable harm to the industry.

It should also be pointed out that there's a very large international market in Asia, Latin America and other regions for used buses. Because of the high standards to which they've been maintained, Ontario buses bring better prices and hold their values longer. That business would also suffer if Ontario's bus safety standards were relaxed.

To maintain both high safety standards and a high degree of public confidence, our industry and our association recommended that any carrier operating in this province be required to meet our current high standards. One way to ensure the standard would be to have applicants pass a safety audit prior to start of operations instead of within six months of startups as is currently proposed.

In addition, our industry and our association support the imposition of a high minimum standard of liability insurance coverage. Many members of the OMCA have invested in more insurance coverage than mandated by regulation, and some carriers currently operating in Ontario, perhaps including the operator of the bus I described, have insurance coverage which is only comparable to that of a private passenger car. In our view, that's totally irresponsible.

While we acknowledge there's a degree of economic protection for Ontario's established motor coach carriers in the imposition of high minimum standards of liability insurance, we believe that the enhanced public protection outweighs any reduction in the potential competition in the marketplace. Our experience over more than 60 years is that safety is good business.

Let me sum up briefly before I respond to your questions. Regardless of the collective and individual opinions on deregulation, Ontario's motor coach operators are preparing for deregulation which will increase competition to the benefit of the Ontario consumers.

In shaping the environment in which we will operate for the next 20 months, we ask you to consider these two important points:

Firstly, we ask that you ensure that on opening the Ontario bus transportation market to increased competition you do not provide potential competitors with access to this market which is not reciprocated with access to their markets for our operators.

Secondly, we ask that you maintain Ontario's long-established high standards for bus transportation safety by ensuring adequate resources for enforcement of safety standards, by maintaining current high vehicle and operator safety standards for any new interests, and by imposing high minimum standards of liability insurance for all bus operators in Ontario.

Bill 39 provides the time to address these issues and to ensure that the Ontario motor coach industry can continue to provide safe and productive service for the people of Ontario.

As the environment in which we operate begins to change, to keep pace with changing needs of our consumer, we ask that you consider the importance of fair competition for the industry and high safety standards as a key element of a successful system of bus transportation. These are important to both our industry and to the people we serve.

Mrs Lillian Ross (Hamilton West): Thank you very much for your presentation. In reading your brief, on page 2, you made a comment that bus deregulation is the way of the future. I wonder if you could tell me why you would make that statement.

Mr Burley: It's very difficult to operate in this global market that we operate in and have regulated environments. We are going to be confronted with that, like it or not, and if we're going to be successful in this globe, we will be deregulated in most, if not all, things we do.

Mrs Ross: Carrying on with that statement, you also say that deregulation will offer Ontario bus transportation consumers important benefits. What benefits do you see for the consumers?

Mr Burley: Hopefully, lower prices should arrive from that. That's what you typically get in that kind of competitive environment. You continue to provide the services. It always finds its optimum level and the customer usually wins in that benefit.

Mrs Ross: Do you see that competition would also provide better service?

Mr Burley: Conceivably it could in certain areas. You never know. When you're in a regulated environment, you don't know what a deregulated environment does until you step into it. I would use the truck industry. Having lived through the truck deregulation, there was a lot of bruising; I still have a lot on my back. However, at the end of the day, I think it was a healthy environment for the consumer. There are a lot of excellent companies that were brand-new companies that came out of it.

Mrs Ross: I want to talk to you a little bit about safety. You've addressed it in several areas. Safety is a priority with the Ministry of Transportation. If safety issues were addressed and Ontario's high safety standards were maintained and perhaps even enhanced, would that alleviate your fears with respect to —

Mr Burley: It certainly would help.

Mrs Ross: You know of course that recently the ministry has had several truck blitzes where they've pulled trucks over and inspected them for safety, maintenance and all that sort of thing.

Mr Burley: Correct.

Mrs Ross: I think that addresses the safety issues. As I say, the ministry's very concerned about safety. I think that I heard — I'm not sure if this is true; well, I know this is true — that harsher penalties are going to be brought into force for unsafe vehicles. That would also address that problem.

Mr Burley: As long as the enforcement is there on a continuous basis for that large volume of people who will be playing in that competitive market. I've referred to one bus which I've physically seen in our shop — because we cross so many lines and we repair buses and we repair engines — and you would have been appalled if you had seen this piece of product that was in our shop. The only reason it ended up there was that the brakes failed and the driver had called back to the office. This was an out-of-state product and we wouldn't release it until they gave us a purchase order to bring it up to safety standards. They didn't really want to do that, but they also didn't have any option. But had you been a passenger or had to have been a passenger on that bus, you would not have been a very happy person from a safety point of view. It was really surprising how that thing even hung together.

Mr Colle: It would be very interesting to see how the enforcement's going to take place when they're just about to chop 1,200 people in the Ministry of Transportation. You just can't have it both ways. By the way, Mr Burley, I think your presentation was very incisive because it really focuses in on the issue here, and that is safety. In essence, the deregulation of the trucking industry has been a disaster from a safety perspective because people have been able to enter a market to make that fast buck — I'm not talking about the good operators in Ontario. They've taken advantage of the good operators by cutting costs on safety. They've done irreparable damage to the trucking industry, and if the government doesn't learn by that lesson that you just can't deregulate and forget safety —

You have a government that has said that come January 1, 1998, it's going to deregulate. Now, if I were a Quebec trucking firm or if I were the Quebec government, why wouldn't I just wait the Ontario government out, let them go through this period and, come January 1, they've got the whole Ontario market? They've already said they're going to deregulate, so why should Quebec move to level the playing field?

Mr Burley: You stated why they won't move to deregulate it. That's why we're asking for you to put as much emphasis as you can on that situation. I don't think we're unrealistic. As I stated in there, you only have so much capability, but if I were sitting on the same side of the fence, I would wait it out as well.

Mr Colle: Yes, because from my reading of it, I think what the government had intended to do was deregulate April 1.

Mr Burley: Yes.

Mr Colle: That was their intention. They realized that they hadn't looked at the consequences and, all of a sudden, they changed gears dramatically in reverse. I think they burned out the engine in doing it. What do we do at this point now, when we've got a government that's already played its card and has said, "We're going to deregulate, come hell or high water, on the 1st because ideologically it's the best thing to do"? What recommendation can we give them to say, "Hey, wait a minute, here's what you can do to get out of this mess, with Quebec sitting there waiting to pick off the rest of the Ontario industry"? What can they do to get out of that mess?

Mr Burley: I think the key issue then falls under the safety side of it. As long as everyone knows that in this deregulated environment for us operating in Ontario — and we appreciate the fact that we have 20 months to build up to it, that it isn't a complete drop on us, to try and prepare as businessmen as best we can — the safety and the insurance become the key issues in this thing. We need to make sure that everyone has proper and adequate insurance in case that accident does happen, that the passengers, or at least the survivors, in those situations are taken care of. Because I believe many operators in those situations, in going back to the trucking side — they call them brokers for more than one reason. You'll see that, as I said, in this particular bus that I witnessed myself in our shop. If I have to compete with that, it's very unfair. For what it costs us in overhead to operate the shops, to maintain that product, we also — you believe that people are intelligent, the consumer you're dealing with at large. Listening to the speaker before me being concerned about the students, obviously people are aware of those things and hopefully they won't step on those types of vehicles and support them, but let's face it, in this economic climate it's pretty difficult.

Mr Pouliot: I too find it passing strange that on the one hand you lay off 1,200 people from the Ministry of Transportation, yet you factor in that when you have a deregulated environment with the trucking industry — we've literally seen the wheels fall of the trucks — safety will all of a sudden become a high priority by virtue of a decree. It doesn't add up; in fact it's contradictory. Just as much as a safety and employment issue, and I'm seeking your expertise, it is not likely in the next year and a half that Premier Mike Harris will achieve success in convincing Premier Filmon and Premier Bouchard. If you were to call the people who hold book, the book shop, you can get pretty good odds on that. In fact, I'll give them to you; no, I won't, because it's illegal.

In your opinion, how many jobs would be impacted — I'm talking about women and men, Ontarians — if things remain the way they are, that in a deregulated environment Manitobans and Quebecers are entitled to come and get a licence while we cannot reciprocate? That is the real climate we are facing in a year and a half, as true as we're sitting here today. What kind of impact will it have on Ontario jobs and therefore Ontario companies?

Mr Burley: It's very difficult for me to put a number on it. Brian, you may have a thought about that as a number. It could be in the thousands, literally. There's a tremendous number of people employed in this industry, from ticket agents to the mechanics who repair them. It could be a dramatic number if indeed it's not an equalized playing field. I'm concerned about other provinces; I'm concerned about nearby states.

Mr Pouliot: I need your insight. I just cannot shake the safety aspect. Please involve me in your own world. Everyone professes to — I mean, I don't meet people who don't like their mothers; I don't meet people who don't preach family values; I don't meet people who don't preach safety. But what happens in the real world when competition is such? How does it happen that safety does not necessarily take a back seat, but in orders of priorities it might not be as catalytical, as important, as sacred as it would be otherwise if you have more latitude? How does that happen?

Mr Burley: Absolutely, you're correct. It doesn't take place. I mean, that's the first thing to go. It's expensive. If you're competing in an environment and your profit is diminishing, you only have so many places that you can take that out of if you're going to stay in business. I would use probably, on the truck side of it, a perfect example of a situation that we have in the province of Ontario — I'm not sure whether it has been rectified yet or not — with a carrier from another province that I witnessed previously. Prior to deregulation in the truck industry, it was very profitable and maintained very high standards within its fleet. Yet not less than eight months ago they were in a tragedy type of situation with a vehicle hanging over the side of a bridge in Ontario, and I'm looking at a vehicle that shouldn't even be on the highway. I know the government is still dealing with that particular issue. That's what happens. If you do not pay attention to safety, that's what will happen, because it has to come from someplace.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Burley, for appearing before us here today and making those comments. I appreciate it.

TRAVEL VENTURES CANADA INC

The Chair: Next up is Travel Ventures Canada Inc, Mr Larry Hundt, president. Good afternoon, sir.

Mr Larry Hundt: Good afternoon, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. First of all, I'd like to thank you for the opportunity of speaking here today. With the limited time we have, if you'll excuse me, I'm going to read my presentation.

Firstly, to tell you a little bit about myself and our company, I've been involved in the bus business for 27 years, in all facets of the bus business. I've been involved in bus passenger service, charter service and, in more recent years, the bus tour side of the business. Presently, along with my wife, I operate a company called Travel Ventures. We probably rank ourselves as the second-largest bus tour company in the province serving the Ontario public.

As far as the changes that are being proposed to the Public Vehicles Act are concerned, I certainly have a number of things I'd like to point out. It's very troubling for me to see the indecision and confusion that the current government has created since taking office, keeping in mind that it's very hard to make decisions about purchasing half-million-dollar motor coaches when you can't determine from one month to the next whether you're going to have regulation or not. I applaud the present government for moving in the direction of deregulation. It's something that should have been done many years ago, in my opinion.

One of my biggest concerns is that presently, with this legislation, no allowances have been made to make this a meaningful transition. We're going from 60 years of a regulated system that has fostered a very conservative and non-competitive industry to a sudden change to a free market environment.

Many of the older complacent companies will not survive a sudden change to a free, open market environment. There should be a period of adjustment and transition, in my opinion. The new legislation does not serve the industry well in this transition, if there's no relaxing of these entry requirements.

There has been, in recent years, one area of growth in our industry that comes from a huge influx of international travellers coming into our country, because of the weakness of our currency. There are really only about six bus carriers serving this market, and they simply can't handle the huge influx of these travellers. In 1994 they banded together and fixed prices, passing on rather large increases, some as much as 35%, to the travelling public without very much warning.

Let me tell you that the vast majority of the bus operators in the province are anxious for deregulation, in my opinion. I've spoken to a lot of the smaller carriers who feel that way, because they look upon this lucrative Toronto market and all of this international business that's coming into the city and feel that they can provide some of the service that's necessary to serve these people.

One of my biggest concerns about the new legislation is that it gives enormous power to the OHTB board member without any appeal process or ability to challenge his decisions in the courts. This person also is going to have to be a very good magician to look after the multitude of licence applications and rule on the many enforcement issues that are going to be put before him. There has been no consultation with the bus tour industry whatsoever in the formulation of this legislation.

The Ontario Motor Coach Association, unfortunately, just represents the bus operators, and not the tour operators. The bus tour operators have been forced into hiring buses over the years from a very limited number of bus companies, many of which are often direct competitors in the tour market. Our company has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars over the years to develop innovative tour programs, only later to expose these ideas to bus companies that can take these ideas and customer lists and use them to compete with us directly.

When the trucking companies were regulated in the past, a large percentage of the business was their ability to apply for special licences to serve specific customers. This type of name-user application has not been looked upon kindly by the OHTB in regard to the bus side of our industry, and really, quite frankly, should have been.

The PV Act restricts bus companies, insisting that 75% of their passengers have to come from a particular licensed area. This is one of the most restrictive, unrealistic and unworkable regulations that exists in our industry today. Our company and many others are constantly breaking this law because there simply is no company that can work under this regulation.

All too often, we underestimate the impact tourism has on our job growth potential and its economic impact. The bus tour market contributes over $1.6 billion to the Canadian economy. Every night a tour comes to a community, it leaves behind $6,500 to that local economy. The current regulations have stifled the growth and potential of tourism in our country.

A great deal of discussion will ensue over the next few months about the future of our industry. Greyhound has been leading the way, lobbying the government and certain special-interest groups, talking about the loss of rural mobility. I think it would be wise to look at Greyhound's history and have a good look at their company just to see what their contribution to the loss of rural mobility might be. They have dropped service over the years to such a point that now they serve only our major corridors. They have all the gravy.

Why should they be left with only the best routes in this country? Why shouldn't they too accept some of the responsibility for moving some of the people in those rural markets? I might also ask why the cost of rural mobility is shouldered by the smaller bus companies that, in turn, have to pass the cost on to the charter and tour passengers.

The Ontario government pours millions and millions of dollars into transit subsidies for cities, and plenty of money also goes into GO service for commuters who want to go into Toronto, but nothing for rural mobility. It's not fair that the government shouldn't be paying something to provide service for the less fortunate living in the more remote areas. I really can't see the fairness in the system in having rural mobility strictly the responsibility of the charter and tour customers.

That's about all I have to say. I'd be willing to answer any questions.

Mr Colle: Thank you, Mr Hundt, for your presentation. I guess the one point that I wanted to start with is that the bus tour operators were not consulted prior to Bill 39. Is there a group or are there individuals or how does that work?

Mr Hundt: Unfortunately, the bus tour side of our industry is not officially represented by any group. There are 80-some-odd members that belong to the Ontario Motor Coach Association, but they really don't have an official voice within the OMCA about policy decisions, about regulations.

Mr Colle: The other concern you raised was one that I've raised myself, in terms of it looks like they're going to have a one-person board. That's going to be a quorum. What if the person before the board disagrees with that board member's decision? They've cut away the appeal to cabinet. They're cutting away appeal to the Divisional Court. I can't find out where the recourse would be.

Mr Hundt: I agree, Mr Colle. That's an area that is of grave concern to me.

Mr Colle: What, I wonder, could be a suggestion that we could make an amendment to it that might give an individual recourse to appeal a decision of that one-person decision? Would Divisional Court still be too expensive a process for an appeal for a small company, for instance?

Mr Hundt: It could be a very lengthy process with time constraints and deregulation hopefully coming. The courts may not be our best avenue. But certainly before, the appeal to cabinet at least gave you a sober second opinion.

Mr Colle: In terms of the process here in place, I know your industry or I guess the tour operators basically think deregulation would help you achieve, I guess, a greater opportunity to present your product and to compete etc. Are there any suggestions you might make in the interim that could improve Bill 39 in terms of ensuring that we end up with a mechanism in place by January 1, 1998, that could ensure there's an orderly constructive transition to deregulation? I know you mentioned that there didn't seem to be any mechanisms in 39. What suggestions could you make that you think might enable this to be proceeding towards that goal of deregulation but at the same time putting in mechanisms to make it viable?

Mr Hundt: I think there should be a reasonable transition period here, and this new legislation doesn't provide for that. I would like to see them relax the entry requirements so that there could be more competition. I know that a policy directive from the minister in the past has been for more competition, and I'm not so sure that the board has given us that more competition that we need in this transition period. Maybe some more name-user applications could be grants so that tour operators, if they don't want to use a bus company that could be competing with them, could use another carrier. They wouldn't have to be compelled to use a competitor.

Mr Colle: Because right now you're forced to use those carriers because, in most cases, tour operators don't have their own buses.

Mr Hundt: That's right.

Mr Colle: And so that would be a suggestion of enabling more options for the tour operators.

Mr Pouliot: Mr Hundt, as an applicant, suppose you no longer have to satisfy public necessity and convenience as criteria; all you have to do on the regulation side is answer the safety criterion, the safety concern, and provide proof of published insurance requirement — that would make an applicant more likely to have success, would it not?

Mr Hundt: Yes.

Mr Pouliot: Share with me, please. At present, if you make an application and you're turned down by the board, what appeal mechanism do you have, in your opinion?

Mr Hundt: Presently, all you can do is appeal to cabinet and hope that they will reverse the decision of the board.

Mr Pouliot: Oh, so you would appeal to cabinet. What do you think your chances would be? I don't know; I'm asking, sir. If you're turned down by the board, you've applied for a licence and then you appeal to cabinet, there's been nothing catastrophic, there have been no new circumstances or evidence to change the value of your application. It's been turned down by the board. The same goes to cabinet for review and possible approval. What do you think your chances are? Be careful. Then I will tell you how many have been approved.

Mr Hundt: I think that there have been a couple of interesting test situations where historically in the past it's been difficult for tour operators to get licences. There have been two where they've gone to cabinet and cabinet has reversed the decision of the OHTB that I'm aware of.

Mr Pouliot: You know why ministers are afraid? I know why one minister was petrified by these things and when you are in doubt and when you're petrified, you say no. Because the board is quasi-judicial. You try not to even have a cup of coffee with them because of the relationship, and that's always the bête noire, the glass jaw of any relationship. It's quasi-judicial. Why don't they make it judicial or not judicial? You operate at arm's length, so you set the guideline, you give them the tools but you can't get them back in, so unless it is extraordinary in its application, you're always frightened that somebody will point the finger and say, "This is too political."

What I'm saying is, maybe if we had a mechanism where you would have a frivolous argument thrown out, that you don't reapply for the sake of reapplying, or if new evidence comes to form, that you would have a body after a reasonable time period that would not review but would consider that application deemed to be a new application even if it is by the same person.

Mr Hundt: Yes.

Mr Pouliot: I share in your concern. I wouldn't count too much, and I say this with respect. I think regardless of administration, people are quite reluctant when it comes to appeal to cabinet, because things haven't changed a heck of a lot. It's just one more crack at it and it has very little chance of success because it kills the ministry in terms of morale and it certainly undermines the authority of the board.

Mr Carroll: Following up on that line of thinking, because I'm a little bit confused as to exactly what the issue was there, but the new board that we're proposing will not have a political component to it. Do you not see that as an improvement over the current situation as described by Mr Pouliot?

Mr Hundt: The Ontario Highway Transport Board to my knowledge has never had a political component, but there was always this option, if you were turned down by the board, to appeal to cabinet. So they were always supposed to be completely neutral, OHTB.

Mr Carroll: You'd like to see us allow more competition through that transition period. In other words, you'd like to see deregulation tomorrow. That would be your preferred position?

Mr Hundt: Yes, by all means.

Mr Carroll: Okay. But in the absence of that, you would like to see Bill 39 allow more deregulation, instead of just, "On January 1, 1998, we're deregulated." Would you believe in deregulation?

Mr Hundt: Yes.

Mr Carroll: Explain to me a little bit. We had a gentleman in here before who was in the same business you're in, the bus tour operator business. He didn't own any coaches. You own some coaches that you operate under somebody else's licence, I understand.

Mr Hundt: That's correct.

Mr Carroll: He talked about a situation, the problem being that for him to buy the service of the coach he was totally at the mercy of the person who had the licence to operate in the area he wanted to pick the people up from. He talked about a situation, a specific one, where to take people from London to Atlantic City was $2,600 but to take people from St Catharines to Atlantic City was $5,400 because he was dealing with two different people. Is that a fairly common occurrence? Maybe not of that magnitude but —

Mr Hundt: That is very common and it makes it very difficult, as tour operators, to offer prices to the public when one bus company's charging him one rate and another one could be charging him rates that could be 30% or 40% higher.

Mr Carroll: And you have to use that company?

Mr Hundt: That's right; you have no choice.

Mr Carroll: Having your own buses and operating under somebody else's licence: How does that change that scenario for you?

Mr Hundt: It gives us more control over the quality of our service. We work with a lot of senior citizens and we've got drivers who do a much better job in serving those people. It gives us a lot more control, and also control over our pricing.

Mr Carroll: If you wanted to go outside of those areas where those licences function, you can't use your own buses?

Mr Hundt: That's right. Sometimes we've got to park a half-million-dollar coach, which doesn't make a lot of sense, and hire a coach from somebody else.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Hundt, for taking the time to appear before us here today.

HUGH MORRIS

The Chair: Our last presentation this afternoon will be Mr Hugh Morris. Good afternoon.

Mr Hugh Morris: I'm appearing on my own behalf, but I'm also a member of the Canadian Transport Lawyers' Association. At about 5 o'clock their executive authorized me to appear on their behalf as well.

The transport lawyers' association is a group in Canada of about 125 lawyers, 100 of whom are Canadians and the remainder are Americans, and there's an allied organization in the United States. Our association's been active, and I certainly have been active, in appearing before regulatory tribunals across Canada for four decades.

I want to talk about six things, and hopefully I can keep my remarks focused and also brief, bearing in mind the hour of the day.

Firstly, I want to applaud the scheme of Bill 39. I think, as one who has appeared — I was adding up today. I'll bet I have appeared 5,000 days in my career before the Ontario Highway Transport Board and other tribunals across Canada, so I've got some sense of how these regulatory tribunals work. I think what you have achieved is an attempt to telescope a function. Particularly, moving the enforcement side of transportation regulation over to the board is a major step forward.

I also like the idea of telescoping time, if it's at all possible, in order to have speedy hearings and hearings of some finality, although I'll have some comment about that in a moment.

By moving administration of enforcement to the board as well as the board functions to one body, I don't think three days a week, which I understand is the amount of time they're going to be given to operate, is nearly enough. I think in whatever budgeting that takes place or direction takes place, you need to give the flexibility, if the workload is there, to let them work somewhat longer.

I know this industry has relied upon this board in particular for decades, for as long as I've been there, firstly as a body of expert opinion and a board that works very, very efficiently. The industry has found over the years — and certainly I as a practising lawyer and I think my colleagues — you need advice on a timely basis, you need it on a daily basis, you need it to be responsive, and you need decision-making to be done in a speedy manner as well. My experience over the last 10 years, and particularly today's board, it's a very dedicated group of public servants who do an outstanding job and I just question how they can do it in three days.

The second point I want to make is the question of no hearings. I know the purpose of this is to speed up the process, but I tell you, no hearings will not speed up the process.

I think of Dr Bunting who's sitting back here. My hunch is the new procedure, the new process will be not bringing in 100 people to a hearing from all across northern Ontario, or all across anywhere else, and saying: "We're in favour of more competition." It'll be expert testimony: city managers, city industrial officers, experts such as Dr Bunting. Most tribunals with which I am familiar give the tribunal the power to determine that it will be no hearing, or it will be a hearing, or part of it will be in public hearing.

For instance, Dr Bunting could be far more effective giving evidence orally. He files his brief. "Dr Bunting, do you swear the contents to be true?" "Yes, I do." "Would you give the same answers today if you were asked them orally?" "Yes, I would."

No more direct examination; cross-examination instantly. The board gets the flavour of what he's got to say in cross-examination because his brief is already there, the competing brief is there and that kind of expert testimony is far more effective for the decision-maker if it's in a public hearing, because what if the board has some questions? We've got Dr Bunting's brief, we've got

Dr X's brief in competition, but I have some questions. How do I question them? I don't have any way of questioning it or asking more questions or informing myself.

If the essence of this legislation is to speed up the process, in my view it can be far more quickly handled than to have to prepare a long document in reply, no questions, and maybe another reply document from the applicant, no questions. It all takes a lot of time and is far more efficient if handled in a public hearing. It lets the board decide, based on the written material it has. "That's not necessary for a public hearing. I don't need to hear 100 citizens from Timbuctoo saying they want more competition. I'll accept that evidence, but I do want to see what the expert has got to say under cross-examination."

Page 3, paragraph 2 of my brief. The board can't rehear or review or amend its decisions, basically doing away with sections 16 to 20. I heard some comments on the appeal provisions and I really wasn't intending to spend any time on it, but if I could briefly comment, petitions to cabinet have not worked, traditionally. That's too time-consuming, too much written material and it's really difficult for a cabinet to understand why the board made the decision it did.

There is a provision in the existing act which works very well and has some salutary benefit to the unhappy applicant or the unhappy respondent; that is, you can bring a motion asking for a hearing by way of argument only, and maybe the legislation or rules of the board would be "written argument only, a written motion only," everything filed by fax, shortening the time limit. The purpose of all this is to speed up the process. We don't want hearings going on for months and months, in writing or otherwise.

If you're unhappy, you file a motion maybe on five days' notice by fax. The board considers it and gives an answer. The respondent to that motion replies in another five days, the board reads it and says, "No, you're not entitled to another hearing," or "You're entitled to a hearing on this one specific issue," just one narrow issue. At least it gives you a little bit of a safety valve to let possible errors be corrected, and I'm not talking about typing errors, because the Statutory Powers Procedure Act provides for them.

I think you need to look at the entire section in the Statutory Powers Procedure Act that lets a board make its own rules as to how it's going to handle this situation. If you're going to make the system work and have some credibility, I would have some safety valve, but shorten the time; make it very short, maybe no hearing on the rehearing, if you will, but some method by which you can say, "Hey, you missed the whole point on this area," or "You've disintitled me to something that everybody agreed to and you've given me something that nobody agreed to."

There's got to be some safety valve because you can get decisions that might be 10 pages long; it's easy to make a mistake when you don't have a chance to consult in one way or the other. A rehearing on a very simplified basis I know would work.

The transition provision is unfair to the public. If the purpose is to speed up the process, I want to back up. In February, the Ministry of Transportation advised the transport board: "No more hearings. You can't do anything with anything." I objected. That's unlawful, in my opinion. I threatened to take the board to court if they wouldn't hold hearings. I've now got my hearings back.

This was all in anticipation of legislation that would have been enacted a couple of months ago. I understand, and I applaud what the ministry had done in trying to harmonize and speed up this process. I think they've done an outstanding job, but in that area we've got commercial transactions sitting out there and the public buying and selling, and I can't have a hearing. Now we can have hearings.

Let's say this legislation is enacted on June 15. I have an application I filed last week. Normally it would be published for a hearing in the March 25 or March 30 Ontario Gazette, whenever that Saturday was — 29 days to oppose, so I've gone past June 15 and I have to start all over again; I have to refile. I'd have to put in a business plan now. I don't have to put in a business plan the way the current system is. I do that at the hearing.

My hunch is that by not allowing the legislation to permit applications filed and hearings commenced to go forward under the transition provisions, I could lose two, two and a half months in time in an industry that depends historically on fast reaction time from the board, a very efficient board and a very quick response time in terms of your ability to get a hearing and get a decision.

I don't see how anyone is prejudiced if you allow me to file today, get my hearing and proceed under the old legislation rather than having to start all over again in a costly, time-consuming, time-wasting process.

It's a big industry. A lot of mom-and-pop companies operate in this industry, but I believe it's unfair to force me to start all over again, especially in these economic times.

The final point I want to make, and you've all touched on it, is this whole question of harmonization. As I said earlier, I've spent more time before this board than I think they care to admit, but I can tell you that in eastern Ontario a lot of small operators will be dead meat very quickly if the competitive environment suddenly has them facing not just the big Montreal operators, of whom there are many, but many other small mother-and-father operators in western Quebec who will move into that market just like that. It's unfair.

I know for a fact that the Ontario segment of this industry — not just the Ottawa Valley — northeastern Ontario, coming over from Rouyn-Noranda, would be devastated within six months, I assure you, with this additional competition if they didn't have an opportunity to operate on the same level playing field. It just will hurt them very badly. I'd have the applications filed tomorrow. If you do deregulate, in a year and a half it will hurt those family businesses very badly.

The same would hold true for northwestern Ontario. Manitoba operators will be here just like this. I've tracked this both in the United States and Canada for many years. Certainly, from what I read of what Quebec wants and what Manitoba wants, they believe in a system which in essence protects rural communities with service by virtue of their regulatory scheme, and I don't see them changing their minds in the near future.

In conclusion, I applaud what's been attempted here. I think it's a first-class piece of work. For the next while it will work well, especially the ability to handle much of this work on a no-hearing basis. Even if you accept my thesis that where you've got a specialist or an expert such as Dr Bunting, it's far more effective and far better for the tribunal, in making its decision, to have that person heard orally, but you don't need troops of witnesses coming in to make their submissions.

My very last point is, if it is intended to deregulate on December 31, 1997, if we have legislation on June 15, in essence we have about 18 months. I have to say that's a very short period of time for anyone to be on a learning curve. I would hope that whomever the government appoints, they pick some people who have the administrative experience, the historical experience of how this board has worked, because if they don't, they'll fail.

I don't agree with all the decisions the existing board makes. I've never agreed with all the decisions, because sometimes I lost, but if you talk about integrity, competence and experience, it takes a long time to learn it, and the people you've got there are first-class administrators in a really tough job. If they are to be replaced, fine, that's government choice, but I certainly hope the government will pick people of similar experience and dedication, because these are really good people. Thank you very much.

Mr Pouliot: When one listens to Mr Morris, integrity, competence and experience come to the forefront. With respect, sir, I say this not so much by way of a compliment as by way of observation and reputation. Any government would be well advised to listen to your counsel. Not to do so, in my opinion, would be at the peril of the public good. You offer equilibrium and true balance. Your experience has long been acquiesced and attested to by people on all sides of the issue.

Unfortunately, what makes us all worried is not if they will deregulate and under what conditions; we have to assume from sitting where we are, Mr Morris, that it will be done under existing conditions — if we could have the certainty that time would permit us to witness other practices than predatory, because not vultures but certainly some entrepreneurs are poised for the day when it's legal to file and they will be soliciting your good advice and your good service. They won't come by the thousands, but those who come will be well equipped and there will be many. I don't think anyone wishes to have anyone hurt, and I certainly appreciate very much your understanding of process.

What better light and expert to guide a client? If I were a proponent, if I were in that sector, I would hire yourself and I would hire the good doctor as well. Hopefully, with expediency I would be able to afford both of you. I really have no question, just comments. Thank you.

Mr Morris: I accept.

Mr Tascona: Thank you, Mr Morris, for your presentation. I just want to refer you to page 3 of your brief dealing with the section 16 review. What types of errors are you referring to? You alluded to possible other circumstances as well where the review powers would be beneficial.

Mr Morris: The kind of situation where they may describe a route and misname the route, misname the towns, misname the counties or the townships or the regional municipalities, misname the types of equipment, make errors with respect to various conditions the parties had agreed to in a licence. Licensing is a very complicated process. Some of that can be corrected under the Statutory Powers Procedure Act, but that act also says boards can make powers to rehear unless specifically prohibited by a statute. I just question that.

My hunch is that there weren't two motions in the whole year to rehear a case before the board; maybe three, but that doesn't take a lot of time. There was one recently, which I was only watching peripherally, where the person was not a lawyer. They filed a motion and the board heard the motion and said, "Yes, we're going to hear argument on this one narrow point." It was just one narrow point, and the person was successful.

With fax today it needn't take two or four weeks or notice in the press or anything else. You just give notice to the parties, and it's a very salutary way of helping to correct those errors, but also to try to air a subject where you're an aggrieved party on one side or the other.

The key is speed, and I think this legislation has to be handled very quickly because the industry is just sitting in limbo. But I also think that once it's in force, the ability of the board to move quickly, expeditiously and give very quick service to the public will have a lot to do with its ultimate success over the next 18 months or two or three years.

Mr Tascona: Isn't that why it's important that you don't have applications filed prior? Your point in terms of applications filed, that's going to slow down the board if you have a flood of applications filed for the transition.

Mr Morris: Why would it slow them down? Why can't they sit and have the hearing right now?

Mr Tascona: If you want to move fast, if you're going to have those types of procedures in place which still will be subject to section 16 review, you wouldn't have the speed you would need.

Mr Morris: I don't understand you, sir.

Mr Tascona: I think my point is basically that if its hearings commence, the rules don't change, but you could have had a flood of applications coming in before, and that will slow down the board.

Mr Morris: Not really, because a lot of them are not opposed. The board has power over its own procedures, and you can elect. I can say: "I don't want to spend a lot of money on a five-day hearing. I'll go the other route." Why take away that option?

Mr Colle: Thank you, Mr Morris. I think you've made some very good suggestions that might improve this bill. The one thing that is very apparent here is that the board is going to have some complicated matters before them and they're going to have to deal with them quickly. Do you feel that the one way of allowing for a safeguard on decisions made for the board and recourse for applicants is to allow people possibly to file a motion that would enable them to have an opportunity to address an error or some kind of contradiction in the ruling?

Mr Morris: That's correct, but again on a very tight, time-limited basis, and the motion might be handled in writing. All I say is, you need a safety valve of some kind. It'll work better if there is that safety valve, provided it doesn't delay the process.

Mr Colle: If the safety valve isn't in place, how will it cause confusion and problems in the industry?

Mr Morris: I don't see it. The safety valve is there now, excluding petitions to cabinet and going to the court, which I agree don't work. I can bring a motion and say I want to rehear this case, and the board has pretty tight rules on whether I can succeed even on that motion.

Mr Colle: Those are pretty rare.

Mr Morris: Very rare.

Mr Colle: At least in this case, if it's kept there you know there is that recourse.

Mr Morris: That's right. It's a great safety valve.

Mr Colle: For that odd time it happens.

Mr Morris: Seldom used.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Morris. I'm glad we were able to accommodate you at the last minute at the hearings today.

That being the last submission for us today, this committee stands adjourned until 3:30 in this room on Wednesday, May 15.

The committee adjourned at 1908.

WALSH TRANSPORTATION LTD

The Vice-Chair (Mrs Barbara Fisher): Good afternoon. I'd like to welcome everybody to the second day of hearings on Bill 39. We will be able to provide 20 minutes to each of the participants who come forward this afternoon. Sir, I assume you're Mr Rick Walsh, president and owner of Walsh Transportation Ltd. Welcome to our hearing process.

Mr Rick Walsh: I'd like to thank this committee very much for the opportunity to be able to speak in front of you. I'll try to be brief and summarize for your information, with the hope that some of the comments I make will bring some response and questions from your various members.

My name is Rick Walsh. I'm president of Walsh Transportation. Walsh Transportation is located in Haileybury. It's been in business since 1935. We are licensed with various licences from Kirkland Lake and the Tri-towns — North Bay, Huntsville and Bracebridge. Our head offices are in Haileybury, serving the Tri-towns.

We run a variety of different bus transportation modes, such as the public transit system for the Tri-towns. We have line runs. We have a fleet of school buses. We have charters and tours. We have airport service, van rentals, limousine service. We have maintenance facilities for ourselves as well as serving various other operators in the province.

We employ about 85 people, with about 70 pieces of bus equipment.

I have done some consulting work for various other industries in the area. I've been a board member of the Timiskaming health unit and the Tri-town Association for Community Living. I'm a 20-some-year member of Rotary and past president twice over; and also in Knights of Columbus. I'm married with four lovely daughters.

The present regulatory bus system has worked relatively well over the years. The writer believes that the system could have adapted to the changing environment by allowing more entry to create more competition, but at the same time serving the public with safe, reliable equipment at a competitive price. It is believed by myself that the government's commitment to make things easier and more free for business while serving the public well could have been achieved under a regulatory regime.

Having said this, and before addressing the interim legislation, I would like to make the following comments.

The Quebec and US carriers: First of all, it's very hard for Ontario to open up the floodgates in terms of deregulation without other jurisdictions being deregulated at the same time. If that happens, these people will come into our jurisdiction, take our business away from us, cost Ontario jobs and create a lot fewer taxes and benefits to Ontario.

Our position is that we do work for major carriers in the Toronto market during our summer months, when in the winter months our ski buses and hockey teams and various other teams are on the go. I'm not sure how viable we would be if we didn't have access to the Toronto market through other major carriers during the summertime. If we are to deregulate at this time without, say, Quebec and Manitoba deregulating, then these people would come into our jurisdiction and take our trips, certainly making a lot of bus companies in Ontario less viable.

Walsh Transportation has been competing against the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission for many years. It is ironic that its taxes are going to subsidize a government-run competitor of ours. Walsh Transportation is willing and able to take over the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission's line runs in northern Ontario without any loss of service. In fact, we believe the service would be much better, and I'll give you an example of this in a couple of minutes. Because Ontario Northland does service the area from Toronto to North Bay and to Sudbury, we also have a southern operator that would joint-venture such an endeavour. We believe that there are other people in the industry who would also take over the Ontario Northland Transportation routes as well as ourselves, and that you people, or us as taxpayers, would not have to subsidize the service.

The fact that rural Ontario would lose service, as suggested by some of the big line carriers, in my opinion is false. An example of this: Even though the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission is subsidized throughout northeastern Ontario with my dollars, I run a limousine service daily from Kirkland Lake and the Tri-towns to Toronto, Sudbury and North Bay. The ridership is good; it's increasing. We also run a division in North Bay called Northern Airport Service, where we run two daily trips from North Bay, Powassan, South River, Huntsville and Bracebridge to Pearson International Airport.

We believe that our level of service is most probably superior to the ONR. It doesn't cost us a dollar as taxpayers. We think that there's no place but to grow in this area and that the public has been relatively poorly served. We believe the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission has not been very well managed over the years.

The second thing in terms of seeing rural Ontario being served is that I must mention that when you're going from North Bay, say, to Toronto, all the little towns in between North Bay and Toronto will get serviced. It would be crazy not to service these small towns when you're going right by their door. With the example of a place that is out of the way and not on a major corridor between two points, such as the town of Kirkland Lake, we're already serving that city. If you've decided, in all wisdom, that deregulation is happening, even if you're in a place like Peterborough and want to get into Toronto, we firmly believe there are people in private enterprise who will take up all these line runs, and rural Ontario will not only be served, but it'll be served better than it is now because of the monopolistic situation.

There's one thing — and my apology — that I forgot to mention in the brief, and that is, as I mentioned earlier, we are a public transit operator. We've run under contract with the municipalities of Dymond township, New Liskeard, Haileybury and Cobalt for 21 years now. Consistently, our rates run about half those of your public sector municipalities that are running their own systems. We believe private enterprise could save the taxpayers of Ontario hundreds of millions of dollars by privatizing yet keeping control of the system.

I run the system for the municipalities. The politicians tell me how to run it, and they have checks and balances to make sure I run it properly and according to their will, so that the public need is being taken care of. My apologies for not mentioning transit contracting, but I think there are a lot of places in Ontario right now, such as Barrie, New Liskeard, Haileybury, Cobalt, Chatham and various localities, that are now privatized out, and it's being done at consistently much lower rates.

A point to remember is that my employees are not paid consistently much less than the unionized employees are paid in some of these systems. That's a point you should remember: It's not that we're cutting our labour rates to do this. Our employees do make within 20% or 10% of what public sector unionized — we're not unionized, by the way.

Bill 39: I believe some sort of mechanism has to be in place during a transition period. My largest concern in terms of the free trade deal back in the late 1980s was the fact that business was not given sufficient time and knowledge to adjust to the free trade deal. I believe one of the main reasons we lost hundreds of thousands of Ontario jobs was that business wasn't ready. You people, as governments, did not really — maybe we needed a two by six to our heads to knock into us what was coming, but we lost a lot of jobs in Ontario because of the free trade deal, because we weren't ready for it. I believe a lot of jobs went to the States.

I believe that a transition period that genuinely moves towards deregulation at the least cost is a good idea. We have to have open markets, not shelter existing monopolies. I am for the act in that it makes the best of a bad situation and gives time needed so that other jurisdictions in Canada may open their gates and deregulate at the same time as Ontario. We need this time period. If we don't have the time period, it's going to cost Ontario jobs, because Quebecers are going to come in and steal a lot of our work, as well as people from the States.

Also, hopefully with what the government is doing in terms of taking the handcuffs of private enterprise so that we can do our job better, there's also responsibility. I'm non-partisan, but I believe the government is running in the right direction in terms of lowering its costs, because when we open the floodgates and we have Americans coming in who are paying $1 a gallon for fuel, and their regulations and various other costs are lower, then we're going to have to be damned smart to compete against these people. We have to have lower costs, and I think it's going to take Ontario several years to get our costs down so that we can compete against other jurisdictions.

I believe that this legislation, when it's implemented, should move very strongly towards deregulation, that we shouldn't leave everything as it is for the next 18 months. That's not going to do us, as business people, any favour. We need you people to gradually open the door so that we can compete against the Greyhounds or whoever else, so that we can be ready when the gates are opened. If we're not, I believe the same damned thing is going to happen to the bus industry as happened to a lot of manufacturing jobs in Ontario.

I believe Bill 39 is far from perfect and I believe the industry's long-term viability has been compromised by certain parties in that I don't really think this is a genuine transition period. It should be a transition period so we can be ready. The other thing is also that we have to compete against other jurisdictions, so they have to deregulate at the same time we do; otherwise, we're just going to get beat up badly.

So, reservedly, for the above reasons, I support Bill 39. I wish to thank you very much for allowing me to present this brief, and I would like you people to ask me some questions.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Walsh. We have approximately two minutes per party to share in question period, and we'll start with the government side.

Mr Jack Carroll (Chatham-Kent): Mr Walsh, thanks very much for an excellent presentation. Are you familiar with the organization Freedom to Move?

Mr Walsh: Yes, I am.

Mr Carroll: They are doing a fair bit of fearmongering about all of the communities that will lose service should Bill 39 happen and should we go to deregulation. Three places they mention on here of the 170 that will lose service are Bracebridge, Huntsville and Kirkland Lake, three areas that you currently serve. Would you care to comment on the validity of their claim that those three communities would lose service if we proceed down the road we're going?

Mr Walsh: I think that not only won't they lose service, but they'll have more service. It's what form that will take. For example, in the first week of July or June we're going to be starting service — where we were running limousine services from Kirkland Lake to Toronto, we're upgrading our licence. We've got an application before the Ontario Highway Transport Board to put on airport-type buses with reclining seats, air-conditioning, air ride: a very, very nice, smaller piece of equipment that costs less to run than the big coaches. So if anything, service to the communities you've mentioned, as far as we're concerned, will only get better.

Mr Carroll: I was also interested in your comment that your company feels very comfortable that it could take over the routes serviced by ONTC and provide better service and not use any taxpayers' dollars to subsidize that. Has that been a position you've held for some time or is it new, and will Bill 39 affect that position?

Mr Walsh: We've felt that for a long time. I was competing in various markets in northeastern Ontario against a government-run outfit that would cut their charter rates just to get the trips. If anybody's looked at their statements for the last few years, they've lost a pile of our money, where I've made money. I think if and when the deregulation happened, we've already got line runs between Kirkland Lake and those various points that I mentioned, and we will increase these, and I would venture to say that unless the government subsidizes or would continue to subsidize the Ontario Northland, they're going to get knocked either by us or by somebody else because we're going to beat them on service.

Mr Mike Colle (Oakwood): It's an interesting comment you have at the end here. You're saying, "It bothers me though that this legislation has been influenced only to give the Greyhounds of the industry time to get their houses in order at the expense of not having a gradual, more open phase to deregulation." Could you explain how this legislation is catering to Greyhound and other big carriers?

Mr Walsh: I believe — and by the way, I'm a director of the Ontario Motor Coach Association also and I didn't indicate that because I'm appearing as a private company — we had some comments back to the MTO and to the Minister of Transportation on ways to move towards deregulation and open the gates more. I believe the gates aren't going to be opened enough, and they're not going to be opened enough because there was influence on certain parties. I think that's a very serious mistake in the long term for the bus industry in Ontario.

Mr Colle: So basically the government caved in to pressure from some of these big carriers and didn't proceed as they had intended to.

Mr Walsh: I think they didn't take the advice of the rest of the industry and proceed as they should have proceeded.

Mr Colle: And that advice is?

Mr Walsh: There are 80 other bus companies in Ontario that we, as a board of directors in the Ontario

Motor Coach Association, had canvassed, and that had voted on various ways to make the system more streamlined, yet I feel honestly that we're not going to move in the next 18 months and it's going to hurt us.

Mr Colle: So how could you support this bill, since the government basically, through this bill, caved in to people you disagree with in terms of their perspective on where the bus industry is going?

Mr Walsh: We have to support the bill because we didn't have any choice. If we don't support the bill, I believe that de facto deregulation would occur immediately and that Quebec and US operators would have come in and cost Ontario many thousands of jobs. That's why we had to support it.

Ms Shelley Martel (Sudbury East): I want to focus on your comments around your concern with deregulation in the context of Quebec and Manitoba not deregulating. Maybe I can just read you their positions, and they are positions as of November 1995, so they're pretty recent.

Manitoba says there is simply no major problem that would be addressed by bus deregulation and no significant constituency advocating it other than on theoretical or ideological grounds. They have written to the federal Minister of Transport and said they do not support bus deregulation.

Quebec said: "As things stand, total deregulation threatens to accelerate the process whereby regional bus transport services gradually disappear. Moreover, the resulting greater competition on more profitable routes would force carriers to drop less heavily travelled time periods and concentrate on the hours and periods most in demand." Their position as well was that they were opposed to the federal proposition of bus deregulation.

The questions I wanted to raise with you are around that. We haven't heard anything to the contrary to indicate a change in their positions, so I assume in a year and a half from now we're going to be moving into full deregulation in this province, with our neighbours not deregulating. What kind of impact will that have on your service that operates out of Toronto in terms of service lost and jobs lost?

Mr Walsh: First of all, to answer the first part of your question, Shelley, I believe the industry basically is not in favour of deregulation but we were told by the government that we were being deregulated. As I stated in my first few sentences, I believe the system could have been streamlined and made more competitive so that the public was better served. Making that point clear, the industry does not favour deregulation but we were told that's what's going to happen.

Secondly, this is what this interim bill does: It allows us to wait until Quebec and Manitoba are forced because of the free trade deal to deregulate, so that we're all deregulating at the same time. Whether the date is right, 1998, or whether it's going to be 1999 or 2000, it is our hope that when it comes, and if those other jurisdictions are not ready to deregulate, Ontario will put a postponement in place so that we're not deregulated before the other parties, or what you said will happen and there will be a loss of jobs.

Ms Martel: Maybe I can just tell you what the minister said on April 4 when he announced this in the House. It was that, "Today I am announcing interim measures aimed at easing the transition to full deregulation of the intercity bus industry in Ontario on January 1, 1998." I can tell you, there's nothing in the statement he made or statements that he's made since in the House to indicate that over the next year and a half we're going to study this issue, and if Quebec and Manitoba don't move or we see something else happening, we're not going to implement that on January 1. There's been no indication about that at all. So my sense would be that we're moving and it's coming upon us and you and a whole bunch of other carriers are going to find yourselves in a position where you're having to compete directly with regulated markets both to the east and west of us, and a serious problem coming from the US as well.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Walsh, for attending today. We've enjoyed your presentation.

MAJOR INTERCITY CARRIERS OF ONTARIO

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that Don Haire, president of Proteus Transportation Enterprises, come forward.

Mr Don Haire: I'd like to thank the Chair and members of the committee for the opportunity to speak. I intend to read a very brief statement which summarizes the position of the group I represent, and from that point forward I'm available for questions.

My name is Don Haire. I am the coordinator of MICO, which is an acronym which stands for Major Intercity Carriers of Ontario. MICO was set up in October 1995 for the specific purpose of responding to the government's request for comments and suggestions on how to introduce economic bus deregulation in Ontario.

The members of MICO are Grey Goose Bus Lines, Greyhound Bus Lines of Canada, Ontario Northland Transportation and Voyageur Colonial. These four bus carriers represent some 80% of the scheduled intercity passenger traffic in the province, some 95% of Ontario's bus parcel services, and an important component of Ontario's charter bus services, albeit less than 50%. For calendar year 1994, MICO members operated a total of 21.9 million service miles, as per their 1994 Ontario fuel tax returns. To summarize, the MICO members represent the substantial majority of scheduled bus services in the province and are also a significant component of the province's charter bus industry.

If I may, I just want to give you some background of how MICO came into being. In August and September of 1995, through a series of announcements, the Ontario bus industry was informed that the government was essentially committed to doing three things:

(1) Introducing full economic bus deregulation within three years, thereby permitting open-market entry and exit.

(2) Sharply reducing government spending on economic regulation and economic enforcement, starting almost immediately on April 1, 1996.

(3) Maintaining and enhancing, where appropriate, bus safety regulation and enforcement.

At that point, the government invited the various bus industry members to make suggestions on how the government could best achieve these goals. The bus industry itself at that time can be depicted as having split in effect, into three camps. There was a camp of bus carriers who essentially refused to partake in the process. As to whether there was absolute disagreement with the government or it was nothing more than not wanting to be bothered, it's difficult to say, but there were a number of people who just didn't get involved. There was a group of carriers who wanted rapid deregulation within Ontario among Ontario-based carriers, but they also wanted protection for an extended period of time from carriers from outside Ontario. Then there were those carriers who wanted a runup period prior to full economic deregulation in order to prepare, in effect, for the new regime. The MICO bus carriers are firmly in this last camp; that is, they want a runup period prior to full deregulation.

A key point: The MICO carriers favour bus regulatory reform rather than complete economic deregulation, but they recognize that the government is committed to this latter policy direction. Consequently, the MICO carriers structured a proposed approach on how best to achieve the government's objective in this regard.

MICO's suggestions, as well as the suggestions from other bus industry members, were received with prompt attention by the government. A composite of this industry input resulted in what you have before you today, Bill 39.

Bill 39 incorporates suggestions from all industry groups, of those that participated. It is the view of MICO that the government has done an excellent job both in soliciting industry input and in incorporating the subsequent feedback. This collegial and cooperative approach has earned the government considerable respect within bus industry circles. In effect, they stipulated their policy goal and then they sought advice on how best to achieve it. While we are not in full agreement with their policy goal, we applaud their efforts at this consultative process. We also recognize that it's the government's role, and indeed you can argue it's the government's duty, to establish such policy goals whether we agree or not.

In establishing a 21-month runup period prior to full bus deregulation, Bill 39 achieves three central objectives:

(1) It gives the government the necessary time to decide on and make whatever changes they feel they need in order to ensure the bus industry's excellent safety record is continued after deregulation.

(2) It allows existing bus carriers to make the necessary changes to their cost base so as to have every reasonable opportunity for economic survival in a deregulated environment, thereby protecting existing industry jobs.

(3) It allows a reasonable planning period for adjustments of operating networks so that the loss of bus service to outlying communities is either avoided or minimized.

MICO believes that Bill 39 will prevent a repeat of the chaos that accompanied de facto trucking deregulation in the late 1980s. Bill 39 contemplates a strengthening of economic regulatory enforcement in order to prevent bus carriers from jumping the gun prior to full economic deregulation. Bill 39 contemplates easing the conditions for market entry where existing bus services are sparse or otherwise inadequate. Bill 39 also requires a mandatory period of notice and consultation prior to any significant bus service reductions.

Given the government's stated commitment to full economic bus deregulation, MICO believes that Bill 39 reflects an intelligent adjustment mechanism for achieving this goal. It minimizes the shocks to public bus service levels that would otherwise obtain if deregulation were to occur in a less structured and more abrupt fashion.

Lastly, and this we find an important point, we observe that Bill 39 is open-ended. While the government has signalled its intent to pursue full economic bus deregulation as of January 1, 1998, it has specifically refrained from incorporating such a sunset date into Bill 39. We note with that the government has given itself the flexibility to adjust the timing of full deregulation should such compelling circumstances as interprovincial bilateral negotiations determine common dates for deregulation that are at variance with the January 1, 1998 date.

The government has articulated its goals and has also articulated its timetable, and those are the signals which industry needs in order to adjust and prepare itself. Based upon experience to date, MICO is confident that the government will be pragmatic in its pursuit of these targets, and we are further confident that the government will continue its consultative approach in the face of any contemplated adjustments to its announced intentions.

With that, I'm certainly prepared to answer any questions you may pose.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. We have about four minutes each for questioning, starting with the official opposition.

Mr Colle: Thank you, Mr Haire, for a good comprehensive overview of the bus industry and how it relates to Bill 39.

I guess one of the interesting, intriguing comments you made is that even though the minister has been very specific about the January 1, 1998 date for deregulation, I too noted that there's no sunset provision in it. In other words, deregulation may come into effect January 1 and it may not. Therefore, the industry as a whole is basically of the opinion that January 1 doesn't have any real binding, let's say, direction?

Mr Haire: No. If I may, Mr Colle, I think you have to take it back one step. One of the things which virtually everybody, to my knowledge, made very clear to the minister was, tell us what you're going to do and tell us when you're going to do it. So in a sense the industry has been asking for direction as to the timetable.

Yes, when I look at the fact that Bill 39 does not have a sunset date, that indicates to me that at the very least they are going to have to come back and pass some form of legislation which will be open to discussion, I presume, at that time. Until they do that, what is now the interim regulatory period continues on indefinitely.

My own reading of the situation is that the government is strongly committed to deregulation, and by not putting a sunset date in in effect they're giving themselves some degree of latitude that if, for example, a deal had been worked with Quebec that there was going to be common deregulation on July 1, 1998, I suspect, although I can't speak for the minister, they would just let Bill 39 continue in existence for another six months. That's my reading of it.

Mr Colle: Another area, just quickly. In essence, you're saying the people you represent believe there are some problems with total deregulation and you think there should be some regulation of the environment and the industry. What are the benefits of keeping a certain degree of regulation, as far as you see it, as far as the industry is concerned?

Mr Haire: The main benefits of maintaining a regulatory environment — although I would add that just about everybody agrees that the current regulatory environment is not good and needs some form of reform — the main benefit, in my view, is the fact that it maintains orderly markets. You don't get fast surprises out there. There is a process that people have to go through to change service levels. In effect, there's a process that people have to go through in order to radically change fare levels to the degree that there is certainly cross-subsidization, although we've just heard a counter-argument from someone else. You can argue that there will be better geographic network coverage with some form of regulated environment.

The position of most of the industry is that regulatory reform would have been preferable to complete deregulation. But let me add that we do not have in any way, and neither do we assert that we have, a monopoly on wisdom. There are pros and cons. The government happens to believe there are more pros associated with deregulation than cons. The bus industry feels somewhat of the reverse. But it is not a black and white situation.

Mr Colle: One of your partners here is Ontario Northland. They're government subsidized, aren't they?

Mr Haire: They are a government crown, and there's an argument as to whether or not the bus operations are subsidized, but I'll leave that for somebody else to decide.

Ms Martel: I want to go to your three points that you raise on page 4 where you say that by having a runup to full bus dereg the bill achieves three objectives and you talk about allowing existing carriers to make necessary changes to their cost base. Can you describe that, tell me what that means?

Further, if you were going to assume that the government was going to live up to everything the minister has already said about moving to full bus deregulation as of January 1, what kind of changes would the four carriers involved in your group have to make to be ready for that as of January 1?

Mr Haire: I'll have to speculate because I'm not a party to their individual plans, but I certainly know a fair amount about the industry.

One of the things I think a lot of people lose sight of is that what they'll have to do is review their entire commitment to fixed infrastructure. They may decide, for example, to get out of terminal garage facilities that they own and go to a variable cost basis so that when the surprises of changes in volumes occur they're not stuck with a fixed cost overhead which is overhanging their cost base.

Again, I can't speak for the individual carriers per se, but certainly you can expect that there will be attempts which will happen in cooperative terms, I would hope, between the companies and the unions to try and vary their existing collective bargaining agreements. So they can vary themselves to the conditions they face.

One of the things which happens with deregulation is change starts coming at you at a tremendously fast pace. You cannot foresee what's going to happen out there. A new operator can pop up and he can have an introductory price offer of 75% off. You have to respond to that. There are several ways you can respond to it. One, you can match his price or, two, you can get out or, three, you can do some combination thereof, which is what most people will end up doing. They'll partly match his price but they'll also restrict service. For each individual market event the response could be different.

I don't know if I'm helping with this, but there are a lot of things that they have to be worried about. At the fundament of it, what they need to do is to get themselves into a position where their cost base is as variable as possible so they can respond quickly.

Ms Martel: Does that include cutting off service to communities where that service is just not viable?

Mr Haire: I think in some cases it will, quite honestly, but that doesn't mean that that service is going to lose all bus service. You're going to have situations in which the large carriers are going to say, "No, I am not going to service the following towns." Then in some cases people are going to step in and say, "I can do it because I'm a lower-cost operator." In other cases perhaps nobody's going to step in. It's really very difficult to stipulate in any detail what exactly is going to happen because nobody ultimately knows.

Mr Len Wood (Cochrane North): A lot of concern out there with Bill 39 is that for small communities, and I'm from northern Ontario, when you have the large bus companies, with deregulation they're going to end up cutting the rates down to the bare minimum, whatever they can, to drive the small operators out of business and then in turn jack their prices back up. It has happened in the States. I'm just wondering if you think this might happen as well.

Mr Haire: There will possibly be examples of that kind of behaviour which, to me, verges on predation. There was some instance of it in the UK more than in the United States. I don't think it happened that much in the United States, quite frankly. There was a pattern of that to some degree in the United Kingdom. But I think any time you have a situation in which you're in a market regulatory framework which is open, where you have entry and exit on a rapid basis if necessary, you cannot easily force somebody out and then go back in and raise your rates, because the moment you raise your rates you just attract somebody back in.

Granted, there is going to be a time delay but it's not necessarily that large in the bus industry, because this is not an airline where you've got fixed airports and very expensive planes. People can enter and exit from the industry fairly rapidly if they have to.

Mr Len Wood: But if they've either gone bankrupt or sold all their buses, they're not going to get back in.

Mr Haire: Then they're out.

Mr Len Wood: Exactly.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Just a quick question about your industry. First of all, what percentage of the actual parcel industry does your industry occupy, including the other major players?

Mr Haire: Including the couriers?

Mr Ouellette: Yes. Do you have any idea on those?

Mr Haire: Yes, it's bizarre. It's very small in the east like less than a 1% market share, but if you go out west it's quite significant, 20% or something like that.

Mr Ouellette: I just wanted some information on that. One of the spokesmen for Grey Goose stated that it would not be Grey Goose's intent to reduce services. Is this what we can expect from most of the members of your organization?

Mr Haire: You have to ask me as me, not as MICO, because we honestly haven't discussed that. I've got to believe that some of them are going to reduce services. I'm a former president of Voyager and I certainly know there are a couple of routes that, were I president, I probably wouldn't operate. But I'm not saying that somebody won't step in and operate them.

Mr Ouellette: Some of your other members actually stated that there was a potential to go to mini-buses or minivans to carry passengers. Do you see that as a problem in your industry?

Mr Haire: I have some problems with it, and they relate fundamentally to safety. I can think of some vans I'd rather not see in commercial service and I can think of other vans that would be okay. It depends on the construction of the van itself. This is an area which is being looked at not only by the Ontario government but also by the federal government as to what nature of vehicles should be available for public carriage. The answer is, downsizing makes sense on certain routes, there's no question about it, but there is a point at which it would not be smart. Some of these minivans I think are quite dangerous.

Mr Ouellette: Do you expect the appeal mechanism in Bill 39 to pose any problems to your members?

Mr Haire: I don't think so, no; the life of the interim framework is so short. The whole idea of doing that was to be able to establish discipline in the market so that if somebody was a bad actor, the board could act. I don't think that anybody's rights are being terribly jeopardized because it's only for a short period of time. This is what I mean about avoiding the chaos which happened out of de facto trucking deregulation.

Mr Carroll: I have one quick question. The government obviously has a role to play in safety standards, liability insurance standards. Do you think the government should set a minimum amount of the liability insurances required for bus operators and, if they do, can you hazard what that number should be?

Mr Haire: Right now it's two. They've already indicated they're taking it to five. I think the majority of the bus membership wouldn't mind if it went as far as 10. That, if I may be so bold as to say so, is partly because that's the smart thing to do, but also partly that will prevent fly-by-night operators from jumping in if they have to show a meaningful proof of insurance.

The higher you put the insurance level, the more you then bring the insurance industry into controlling the safety levels of the insurance client, because they have a bigger potential downside risk. I think that basically most of the bus industry, no matter which side of the Bill 39 question they're on, would not object to a higher insurance standard.

Mr Carroll: But can —

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, Mr Carroll.

Mr Carroll: — because it's required to keep out the small operators.

Mr Haire: Both.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for appearing before us today.

AMALGAMATED TRANSIT UNION, LOCAL 1415

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that the Amalgamated Transit Union representative Bill Noddle please come forward. Good afternoon.

Mr Bill Noddle: Good afternoon. My name is Bill Noddle, and I'm the president and business agent for the Amalgamated Transit Union, Local 1415. I want to thank the resources development committee for the opportunity to comment on Bill 39, which is An Act to amend the Ontario Highway Transport Act and the Public Vehicles Act.

The Amalgamated Transit Union, Local 1415, represents operators, mechanics, cleaners and other employees of Greyhound Canada's eastern division. We view ourselves as partners in the industry, and are supportive of all efforts to expand the intercity service.

For that reason, we support initiatives that streamline the OHTB. With respect to Bill 39, we believe that with some amendment we could support this piece of legislation. I'd like to take the opportunity to make some recommendations or modifications on it.

One, we'd like a purpose clause. For those of you who have not been in and around the debates of the OHTB over the years, there has been some movement towards the idea of creating a purpose clause in an attempt to assist board members. Many other acts that use interpretive boards include purpose clauses.

We support the concept of a purpose clause and feel that such a clause should explicitly state that the OHTB exists to regulate the commercial use of Ontario's public roadways in the best interests of the people of Ontario, particularly to promote the ability to travel to smaller communities that otherwise would have no public transit system at all.

On the matter of rehearing, we believe that the intention of the government is good, but it has gone too far. Hearings are obviously expensive, and we are supportive of efforts to ensure that the board's time is spent in the most efficient manner possible. However, completely eliminating rehearings is like completely eliminating retrials in criminal cases.

It may surprise some committee members, but in the past parties to a board hearing have submitted erroneous and even fraudulent evidence. Not knowing any better, the board accepts the evidence and makes a decision considering that evidence. Without the ability to rehear, we'll be stuck with decisions that are, to be blunt, based on lies. Obviously, that is a completely unacceptable situation. Sometimes a board makes mistakes in giving weight, or even consideration, to evidence. Without rehearings there is no opportunity to fix these errors.

Finally, there should be rehearings in some cases where the interest of the board has not been strongly enough represented in the decision. This would allow the board to correct errors to ensure that decisions are consistent with the purpose of the board.

I believe these amendments would make the guidelines for rehearing more specific, while still allowing for the types of rehearings that are essential to ensure predictability and lawfulness from the board.

In regard to oral hearings, under Bill 39 oral hearings would only be reheard when all parties to the hearing agree to oral hearings; otherwise, hearings would be written. The intention of this amendment is to streamline the process.

However, I believe that in many cases a party may attempt to use written hearings as a way to escape strong cross-examination. Cross-examination can be a much faster tool for a board than written hearings, especially if the goal of one party is to attempt to obscure some facts. Also, for members of the general public who are parties to the board, writing a brief may not always be possible. In these cases, I would think other parties might wish to cross-examine such a witness. It is our belief that the hearings should generally be oral, unless there is agreement to the contrary. Generally, hearings are not long. The average hearing lasts about one and a quarter days. With these amendments, however, we believe that hearing can be made even more brief and efficient.

Who is a party in front of the board? The new act states that someone with an economic interest may be a party to a board hearing. But who is someone with an economic interest or, more appropriately, who isn't? Does a mayor of a town that has been hit with abandonment have an economic interest? Does a person whose regular bus has been cancelled have an economic interest? The legislation has to be more clear about the meaning of the phrase. It seems to me that the clear intention of this amendment was to reduce hearing time. My suggestion would be to allow members of the public to be parties to the hearing. After all, the board exists to regulate in the public's interest, but only after making an application stating their intention. As a streamlining effort at the time of appearance, parties to the board should be warned that they could be charged for the full costs they incur at the board if the board believes the intervention was frivolous.

Access to justice: As you know, because the ministry has already cut about $350,000 in funding to the board, revenues from fines and fees, which were about $100,000 last year, will have to be tripled. Allocating the full cost of a hearing to the parties, especially when the cost will be going up so fast, may be unfair to smaller companies and individuals. For that reason, we are hoping there can be some changes to allow for equal access to justice.

Sometimes you can go into a board hearing thinking you've got the strongest argument and the rightest cause, only to come out losing. In situations like these, a "degree of success" rule would really hurt, especially if the party was a small company or an individual. We are hoping the legislation can be amended to allow the board to waive or lower fees in specific cases.

Summary: Our position with respect to Bill 39 is fairly straightforward. With changes, we believe we can support the bill. The changes we believe would be helpful are: (1) a purpose clause to give the board a clear sense of the intentions of the crown; (2) the ability to rehear cases so that decisions based on errors or fraud or running contrary to the purpose of the board can be reversed; (3) fairness in court fees to ensure that small operators and members of the public are not denied access to the OHTB; (4) oral hearings to speed hearings and gain more accurate testimony through cross-examination; (5) requirement that a person must apply in advance to be a party to the board; (6) harsher penalties for the parties who want to waste the board's time.

Our position on deregulation, on the idea that in a year or so there should be an attempt to deregulate the intercity bus industry: Let me say that we believe deregulation is not in the interests of anyone; not the companies, the passengers, the BPX clients or the employees. At the same time, we know that Minister Palladini sometimes throws ideas out for consideration to see what the public thinks, like he did with increasing of speed limits.

So let me give you our response to your trial balloon. We believe deregulation is a bad policy for three main reasons.

(1) Quebec-licensed companies won't need a licence to work in Ontario while Ontario-licensed companies will need a licence to work in Quebec, which is highly unlikely ever to be granted.

(2) It will lead to the loss of service in a huge number of smaller communities that receive no other form of public transportation.

(3) It will lead to unregulated monopolies in certain regions or routes that will increase prices and undermine competition.

Ontario is the province that would be most hurt by unilateral deregulation. Unilateral deregulation will place every advantage in the hands of non-Ontario companies and put every Ontario company at a disadvantage. Deregulating in the belief that other provinces will fall into line is playing a high-risk game with the futures of communities, employees and companies. We urge you not to do it.

Policy around intercity busing really is a federal issue. There is a federal process already under way and it makes sense to give that process the time to work. Unilateral deregulation won't force Quebec to deregulate, it will only make them more unlikely to do so. Basically, they'll have their cake and eat it too at that time.

Deregulation and loss of rural service: The idea has been put forward that deregulation can better protect the service in smaller communities. I believe a comparison with what happened in the United States since they deregulated in 1982 clearly shows that a regulated bus industry is better at preserving service into the small communities. According to the Ontario Ministry of Transportation, 1,500 communities were served in 1982, while only 1,100 are served today. That's a drop of about 25% in that time period. However, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, there were 11,820 American communities served in 1982, which was the year of deregulation, and in 1991 there are only 5,690. That's a drop of 52% not 25%. And in the United States, some states subsidize remote and rural routes. Without that subsidy, more than 52% of the communities would have lost their service. It seems strange that if we are trying to save money by deregulating we are going to be spending it by subsidizing. It seemed a little contradictory to me.

I believe we can conclude that deregulation would cause an acceleration in the trend of route abandonment.

Regional and route monopolies: In both the US and in Britain, bus deregulation has led to unregulated regional monopolies. In the Canadian airline industry we've experienced much the same situation. Smaller airlines were incorporated into larger ones, even to the point that Canadian Airlines is effectively controlled by American Airlines. In transportation industries regulation is often the only effective way of maintaining some level of competition.

In regard to smaller buses, sometimes I have heard it said that deregulation would be a good thing because regulation requires companies to use expensive 47-passenger coaches and under deregulation they could use passenger vans. Let me clearly state to you that there is absolutely nothing in the existing regulation which places any requirements on coach size on any operator. Under existing regulation, licensed operators could be running passenger vans if they wanted to.

Statements that suggest regulation requires operators to use vehicles of a specified size are completely untrue. Therefore, the argument that deregulation would expand service by replacing buses with more frequent passenger vans is also completely untrue. Right now, if companies thought they could earn more money by replacing coaches with more frequent van service there is no regulation stopping them from doing it. But they haven't, and they won't do it under deregulation either because it doesn't make business sense.

Quite simply, deregulation will cause abandonment of service, especially to small towns and rural areas, and that service will not be replaced by buses or vans. The service will just disappear as it did in the United States.

Deregulation is not a good transportation policy for Ontario. Many town councils — Sault Ste. Marie, Timmins, Barry's Bay, St Thomas, Lakefield and others — have passed motions and resolutions in opposition to deregulation knowing the damage that could be inflicted upon them. There have been petitions, mail-back cards, newspaper stories and letters to the editors. Sitting here in Toronto, you won't have seen those kinds of stories because they're not covered by our daily press. But go to the small towns where the weekly newspaper is read with the attention of the Bible and that's where this is going to hurt.

Members of the committee, this summer listen to the concerns of your constituents. Listen to the person who runs your local bus service. Listen to the shopkeeper where the bus stops or the agent who sells tickets. In the last election, you didn't knock on doors promising to deregulate bus service. Mike Harris never mentioned it and it doesn't appear anywhere in the Common Sense Revolution.

Bill 39 saves you some money by moving the cost of the board on to the industry, so the tax-cutting agenda has been served. After that, there's no compelling reason to upset the apple cart any further. Don't take on a problem that isn't yours, especially a problem that's in your own backyard.

This was not your idea and you don't have to feel you have any commitment to it. It is a trial balloon from the minister and now you are hearing the public's response. I hope that after some time of reflection you will agree that this trial balloon should be allowed to float away. Thank you.

Ms Martel: Thank you very much for your presentation, Mr Noddle. There was one thing that I disagreed with in what you said in terms of making the comparison with the US and deregulation and what the costs would be here. You said, "It seems strange that if we're trying to save money we'll have to spend money to subsidize routes." I can assure you that will not happen with this government. What you will see is a whole bunch of communities losing service because they have no intention of subsidizing any of these routes. That's part of what this is all about, even in terms of cross-subsidization for the private sector.

Let me just go back to your concern about deregulation, because those of us on this side really believe this is what this bill is leading to. The minister's made it clear in every comment that he's made that this is the transition process to full bus deregulation as of January 1, 1998. "It doesn't matter what's happening in other jurisdictions. We hope they'll get on board and deregulate too. If they don't, too bad."

What do you think it's going to mean in terms of job loss for the people you represent if we move to a situation, as I fully expect we will in a year and a half from now, of being fully deregulated here in Ontario and having both our neighbours in Quebec and Manitoba still operating under a regulatory regime?

Mr Noddle: The best thing I can do is quote the facts I know, and that's from the example that occurred in the United States. In 1982, there were 14,000 Greyhound employees; in 1987, there were about 3,200. So less than a quarter.

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): You said at the start that you're a partner in your industry and I know you're proud of your ability to offer competitive service. If there were unregulated markets in Manitoba and Quebec, could the companies your workers work for compete in those open markets?

Mr Noddle: Could we compete? On certain lines. The small towns and villages, no. They would have to be dropped; exactly what happened in the United States.

Mr Maves: With regard to small lines, Mr Carroll had talked about Freedom to Move. Do you remember that?

Mr Noddle: Yes.

Mr Maves: Some of the communities that are mentioned as losing service are Bracebridge, Huntsville and Kirkland Lake. We've just heard a smaller operator previous to yourself say they would actually increase the service in those communities. How does your position jibe with that?

Mr Noddle: On either side of the coin, you will hear the pros and cons of either position. You'll hear that with deregulation some communities will gain service and on the other side of the coin there will be numerous communities lose service. Deregulation would make it a free-for-all in a dog-eat-dog atmosphere, and then people lose out in the long run, as they did in the United States.

Mr Colle: The real catch-22 in this bill is that they've signalled Quebec to hold on to January 1, 1998. We're going to deregulate. Quebec is sitting in the bushes across from Hawkesbury, saying: "Okay, they're coming in here. They're going to deregulate. We're just going to pick off this Ontario industry."

Mr Noddle: Quebec is sitting on top of the world if we deregulate. It's going to be a one-way street for those people, and Manitoba operators also. It —

Mr Colle: Sorry to interrupt, but the only way they can really fix this error they've made is to say, "We're not going to deregulate unless we get a level playing field with Quebec and Ontario operators get the same entry into the Quebec market that they're getting into our market."

Mr Noddle: Absolutely.

Mr Colle: And that's not in this bill.

Mr Noddle: No.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for attending this afternoon.

ONTARIO SCHOOL BUS ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that Fred Thompson and Rick Donaldson come forward on behalf of the Ontario School Bus Association. Welcome to our hearing process.

Mr Fred Thompson: Good afternoon. My name is Fred Thompson. I'm the vice-president of the Ontario School Bus Association, otherwise known as OSBA. I'm also the general manager of the Metro Toronto division of Charterways Transportation. My colleague Rick Donaldson is the OSBA executive director.

The OSBA is a voluntary association representing 240 private sector school bus companies, plus 60 school boards. Our fleets vary in size from one bus to 2,700 buses. We enjoy about 75% representation of the total industry in Ontario. Our organization is headed by a volunteer board of directors. To quote from our mission statement, "Through advocacy and education, we strive to create an environment that enhances the long-term safety record, stability and viability of our industry." I trust this will help you to put our remarks into context.

We wish to appear before the committee today to express our support for economic deregulation of bus transportation industries in this province. More specifically, we came to support Bill 39. We also have a few observations on this legislation to offer.

In February of this year, the Ontario School Bus Association wrote to the transportation minister urging an early end to economic regulation of Ontario bus transportation industries. By "early," you should know that we supported Minister Palladini's original target deregulation date of April 1, 1996. At that time, we were aware of requests from some charter/tour operators and scheduled line run carriers for a transitional period that would allow a gradual adjustment to open market conditions. The Ministry of Transportation, working in consultation with industry, arrived at the interim regulatory mechanism ultimately described in Bill 39.

As the school bus industry, we feel no strong need for such an interim regulatory mechanism. Our accustomed method of demonstrating how public necessity and convenience are served was by presenting to the former Ontario Highway Transport Board a contract already awarded by a board of education. Very seldom, once such a contract is produced, is our operating authority ever contested or otherwise called into question.

However, we recognize merits in Bill 39 and are quite prepared to comply with the new legislation until January 1, 1998. We feel the transition period will allow adequate time for complementary safety regulations and important reciprocity agreements to be completed. Of course, we are anticipating open market conditions after that date. We share the Ontario government's view that removing bureaucratic red tape and barriers to entrepreneurship will ultimately benefit both the bus passengers and the bus transporters.

Remember that school buses are to be found in virtually every county in the province. Consider for a moment that school buses are historically underutilized outside of school hours. You will quickly realize what we realized: After January 1, 1998, the school bus industry will be well placed to extend our excellent safety and service record to broader community transportation needs all over urban and rural Ontario.

Indeed, our industry welcomes fresh challenges and opportunities to compete in new markets. When all the safety factors are weighed, when all the costs are counted, our school bus operations consistently excel. For decades we have been the safest, most secure and most cost-effective transporter of students in the province. Last year alone, we provided over 296 million safe rides. We know we can maintain this enviable record. At the same time, we can begin to serve public necessity and convenience in ways which would likely have remained closed to us under the old system of economic regulation.

This committee may or may not be aware of the province's recent community transportation review, or CTR, initiative. Essentially, CTR has been exploring ways to use existing provincially funded transportation resources more effectively. Making maximum use of investments is something we strive to do daily in our own operations, so naturally the OSBA has been supportive of the CTR. It is clear to us that ending economic regulation of Ontario's bus industries is one step forward in realizing the fundamental objectives of the CTR.

There is just one word of caution we would offer you today pertaining to the effects of increased competition on Ontario's bus industries. We do not doubt the potential for open market conditions to better align the price of bus transportation with the cost of providing service, except in one special scenario.

Substantial Ministry of Transportation subsidies paid to municipal public sector transporters have in the past allowed them to offer student transportation services to boards of education at deep discounts. Transportation cross-subsidizes education, you could say. But of course the ultimate cost is borne by Ontario taxpayers who may, but more likely do not, derive any direct benefit. Let me elaborate on that.

For decades our industry has observed large portions of municipal public transit fleets become dedicated to student transportation, even though the costs of using those transit vehicles can actually be as much as four times higher than for standard 72-passenger school buses to provide the same service. Some municipal public transit costing models of which we are aware simply neglect to consider maintenance, administration or even capital cost components adequately. Only the chronic lack of full-cost accounting practices by transit properties, and perhaps also by the province, allows this wasteful situation to persist.

After levelling the playing field, because in our perception that's precisely what economic deregulation is going to do for bus transportation in Ontario, we urge government to keep the field level. Make sure all the costs to all the ministries are properly accounted for when comparing public sector and private sector service providers. To this end, we appeared before the standing committee on public accounts earlier this year in support of the Provincial Auditor's proposed amendments to require full-cost accounting and value-for-money audits in the MUSH sector.

I'd like to thank you today, members of the standing committee on resources development, for your time and attention. The Ontario School Bus Association supports the work Bill 39 seeks to accomplish, and we'd be pleased to answer any questions at this time.

Mr Dave Boushy (Sarnia): Could you elaborate a little more on the changes and how they reduce the red tape and lessen the burden on the school bus industry?

Mr Rick Donaldson: If I can answer that, the basic elements of this package scale down the administrative practices of the board. Historically, it has been that, as we said in our brief, once the operator presents a contract signed between a board of education and the operator, that is sufficient proof to allow an operator's licence to be issued by the Ministry of Transportation. In essence, it's a rubber stamp. We see that any administrative pruning of that is beneficial.

Mr Boushy: There have been fears from the opposition, and I've heard many comments, about smaller operators not being able to compete with big bus companies, which I consider you to be. Is that fear justified? How do you feel about these comments?

Mr Donaldson: I can only answer on behalf of the school bus industry, and I want to make it clear that I am. As we say, we have operators with one school bus and operators with 2,700 school buses, and we don't believe it will impact negatively on those smaller operators. In fact, we know in some communities, in Sudbury and elsewhere, that there are some small school bus operators doing many of the sort of community transportation services that we've referenced in here. We don't see that the small operator will be disadvantaged, and neither will the large operator. There are business opportunities.

Mr Carroll: Thank you very much for your presentation. We're sort of falling into a mindset here that we in Ontario can't compete with bus operators in Quebec and Manitoba. Is that a valid concern for us to have? Is there any reason why we can't compete in Ontario with bus operators from Quebec and Manitoba?

Mr Donaldson: Well again, on behalf of the industry, I think we can compete certainly with school bus operators in Quebec. We have a safety record, we have a system in place that is well regarded and well respected. We have good relations with our Quebec school bus operators. We operate into Quebec and they operate across the borders, and there have been no difficulties to my knowledge.

Mr Carroll: School buses, by the very nature of what they're used for, tend to not get used — utilization is not 100% obviously.

Mr Donaldson: Well, it's 100% during the terms of the contract, if you will. In other words, if you're moving kids to school and home from school, it's 100% utilization in that time period.

Mr Carroll: If you were allowed to use those buses for more things, to compete with some other current operators for more business, would you see them in your industry become more efficient and in actual fact you could lower the cost of school bus transportation, which would inevitably lower the cost of education in our province? Could you see that kind of a result happening?

Mr Thompson: I guess one response I might have to that is that our industry is heavily involved right now with the Ministry of Education and Training in terms of utilizing the vehicle more in a given day. Historically, there was the morning, the noon and the afternoon, whereas now the bus is being — in some cases, we're quadrupling, close to 200 children in one period of time. The bell times are staggering. To say that they'd be able to become competitive in the charter market, it's hard to say. Right now we're addressing what we can do within the school times, what we can do to better utilize the vehicle for the boards of ed. Charters are sort of what we term as gravy. It's incremental revenue. We're looking at all of that, but right now our biggest focus is on what can we do with the board to make better use of the vehicle.

Mr Colle: I'm a bit puzzled. I hear your response to the question from the honourable member Carroll that the Quebec competition isn't a problem. My understanding of it is if you want to charter a line service and try to get a licence in Quebec, it's almost impossible, yet they can come in here and get licences and operate out of Pearson or all over the place. They're waiting on the other side of Hawkesbury to basically poach. How is it different for the school bus industry? You have no problems in getting a licence and operating and picking up passengers in Quebec? How is it different than — this is the first time I've ever heard this, that there's no problem with the Quebec situation.

Mr Thompson: I think what Rick was referring to was where we have contracts with boards of education and take excursion trips across Quebec or into another province, those communities that border the province from one to the other, there's interprovincial boundaries, and if it's a school trip my understanding is that that's —

Mr Colle: But have you any licences where you can pick up kids on the other side of the Quebec border?

Mr Donaldson: No. On that point, I'm aware that a number of our contractors do move from Ontario into Quebec, take students into Quebec, but we're solely talking school bus operations, we're not talking line carrier runs. We're talking where a school board has contracted with an operator and those children may move into Quebec for a charter for the day through their school. Some may go to school across the border and then they come back at night. That's the context —

Mr Colle: No, but we're talking about operating let's say a fixed service and picking up regularly on the other side of the border as an Ontario-based business. It's owned by an Ontario company and Ontario operated. They would have no problem operating on the other side on a regular route?

Mr Donaldson: I can't answer that. I'm saying solely for the school bus contract with boards of education, they move into Quebec and they move out of Quebec. That's the contract I'm talking about. I'm not talking about scheduled line runs, I'm talking about our experience moving kids in and out of Quebec.

Mr Colle: Moving but not establishing a business like the Quebec operators. Let me make sure we clarify that, because I think it's certainly inconsistent with the reality of what's happening. As you well know, the line carriers, the charter carriers, are being hammered by the fact that in Quebec they don't allow Ontario businesses to set up their operation on the other side.

There are so many requirements and so many obstacles; whereas, on the other hand, we seem to have no obstacles to them setting and running out of Pearson willy-nilly. I think there are more Quebec operators out at Pearson than Ontario operators. I think it's 50 Quebec licences and six Ontario operators out of Pearson. I just wanted to put that on the record, because I think it's a bit misleading in terms of your sort of particular niche of taking students across to Quebec City and bringing them back, whatever it may be. I'm not sure what it is, but I just wanted to make sure that was clarified.

By the way, I am glad that you are advocating the Provincial Auditor's proposal to really investigate this whole MUSH sector, municipalities, school boards and so forth, where we find out exactly where tax dollars are going and how they're being used in those sectors, and they're more accountable. Certainly, as members of the public accounts committee we're trying our best to ensure that recommendation of the auditor is taken seriously. I think it would be part of levelling the playing field that private entrepreneurs like yourself have at the present time. Sometimes it is a bit of a disadvantage, no doubt.

Mr Donaldson: Thank you.

Mr Len Wood: You're going to have to help me. I'm a little bit confused here. On page 6, you're saying that you're competing against the Ministry of Transportation that is subsidizing municipal bus lines. In my community, and a lot of other communities that I know of around Ontario, the school bus industry is 100% subsidized from the Ministry of Transportation or from municipalities. In my community they collect 60-40. It's all taxpayers' money that is being used to pay for the school buses that are out there, although you sign contracts with the school board.

What is the difference? You're getting 100% subsidized from the taxpayers in the province either through collection of school taxes at the local level or through the Ministry of Education transporting them. Municipal school buses are being subsidized by property taxpayers, the Ministry of Transportation, and they're also being subsidized by paying 50 cents or $1 or whatever. You're saying you want to go out and compete with one group that is being subsidized partially when you are being subsidized 100% by the taxpayers in the province. I just want to get some clarification. I'm confused.

Mr Donaldson: I think, first of all, I take offence; we're not subsidized. We provide a service, and boards buy the service. There's a difference between a subsidy and a contract price. Our contracts are —

Mr Len Wood: It's taxpayers' money in the province.

Mr Donaldson: Yes, it's taxpayers' cost, but it's not a subsidy, and I'd be glad to send you a submission that we made to the Minister of Finance. There's quite a difference between a hidden subsidy and a contracted cost, where the price of the service equals the cost. If everybody were to do that on the municipal sector side, I think you'd save an awful lot of money.

Mr Len Wood: But the point I wanted to make is — and I know Ms Martel's got a question — as far as I know, school buses are 100% subsidized by the taxpayers in this province either through property taxes or through transfers from the province, as well as municipal buses are supported three ways: by individual fees, by the municipal tax levels and by transfers from the Ministry of Transportation. You're saying, from what I can gather, during the off months you want to be able to go out and compete with the other ones after being subsidized for eight or 10 months of the year 100% from the province; you want to compete with the private sector.

Mr Donaldson: Well, Mr Wood, if I had half an hour I'd love that half an hour to talk —

Mr Len Wood: I need that clarification because —

Mr Donaldson: I'd be glad to send you a submission we made, which explains it. The Ministry of Education provides grants to school boards to purchase transportation services.

Mr Len Wood: Yes, exactly.

Mr Donaldson: So it's all coming out of the taxpayer. It's a grant, it's not a subsidy. It's a grant.

Mr Len Wood: Same thing.

Mr Donaldson: No, it's not, with due respect.

Mr Len Wood: It's taxpayers' money.

Mr Donaldson: It's taxpayers' money, but there is a difference between a hidden subsidy and a service provided at full cost; and I'd be glad to send you some material which will explain that.

1700

Mr Len Wood: When Mike Harris campaigned he said, "There's only one taxpayer." So the taxpayer's putting money into the Ministry of Transportation, they're putting it into the Ministry of Education and they're feeding it out. They give you 100%, and the other buses they only give 40% or 50%. You're saying, I get 100% for looking after all the school buses, now I'd like to compete with the private sector or compete with the municipalities and take away their business during the time you're not busy. That's the impression I'm getting here.

Mr Donaldson: No, again, the contract is only for transportation to and from during school hours.

Mr Len Wood: Yes, exactly.

Mr Donaldson: So the buses could be used outside of those hours.

Mr Len Wood: Yes, use taxpayers' money, compete in the private sector.

Mr Donaldson: I'd remind you of a statistic that in the last three years there's been a $130-million reduction in the student transportation budget from the province. We've still been an efficient operation.

Ms Martel: I think that —

The Vice-Chair: I'm sorry, the time has expired. I'm sorry you didn't get to share the time there. Thank you very much for coming this afternoon and making your presentation.

PENETANG-MIDLAND COACH LINES LTD

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that Penetang-Midland Coach Lines represented by Brian Dubeau come forward please. Good afternoon, Mr Dubeau. Welcome to our hearing process.

Mr Brian Dubeau: I appreciate the opportunity to appear before the committee on deregulation. I have prepared a portfolio for you, and I'd just like to step you through it. I'm here to answer questions regarding our company's position and where we see the deregulation going in the bus business in the future.

First of all, our company is 129 years in the same family, the same business, in the transportation business, originating in Penetang. Over the years, we have grown to serve various parts of Ontario.

We employ approximately 650 people. The Dubeau family are basically the shareholders of the company, and I'm only one compared to six others. If you look on the front of the brochure, the fellow driving the stagecoach is my uncle Jumbo. He's passed away. The fellow on the right is my father and the fellow looking out the window is my son. He's in the back of the coach.

Our company, PMCL, to be able to sustain in a market today, to be able to branch out and to do different aspects of transportation, our business is made up of different divisions. Our head office is in the town of Midland. Our branch offices are in Toronto, Barrie, Collingwood, Orillia and Elmvalle.

The company is made up of charters and tours, primarily operating anywhere in the province of Ontario, anywhere in the dominion of Canada and all points in the United States.

Under municipal transit contracts, our company operates the city of Barrie transit contract, the city of Orillia, the town of Midland and the town of Collingwood. The reason I'm giving you this is because it all fits. You're looking at a mixed operation. To make it fit in this business today, you have to have a mixed bag of goods.

The transit operations are operations that the city own the buses and we operate the contracts for the respective municipalities.

School contracts is another part of our business where we operate school contracts for the following boards as listed, anywhere from Simcoe county right through to Metropolitan Toronto.

Transport Canada contracts Pearson airport, terminals 1, 2 and 3, under Transport Canada.

I've enclosed for you a green document that represents our intercity schedule services. I'd just like to step you through this because our company is primarily a rural Ontario company.

When I say rural Ontario, I look at the fact that the services we operate are vital services. The routes we've taken over in the last few years — we've expanded our routes, we've gone through the application route, made application to prove public convenience and necessity. That's all we know: proving public convenience and necessity.

The main core of our routes is Toronto, Barrie, Orillia, and I must say before we go any further that the routes we basically are operating are routes that have been disbanded by other operators. I use the Toronto Transit Commission, which operated the routes in conjunction with Gray Coach Lines. While we were operating our own routes down the backroads, we then got into the main corridor route, which I refer to as the Toronto-Barrie-Orillia corridor, which is the main trunk.

Just recently another route we have taken over is a route that was dropped off by the Ontario Northland Transportation. They dropped service into Port Carling and Bala this year and we now operate services into Port Carling-Bala. These are routes that we have built on other people dropping.

The Toronto-Barrie-Midland-Penetang route is another ex-Gray Coach route, again in our backyard. Toronto-Barrie-Collingwood-Owen Sound is another route dropped by another carrier, which was Gray Coach Lines. Toronto-Bolton-Alliston-CFB Borden is another route that was dropped by Gray Coach Lines.

GO Transit put services into the communities of Bolton, Vaughan, Caledon, and then dropped those services. Even while we were competing, they competed against us. They now have dropped those services. GO Transit has also dropped services in the area of Uxbridge. Private operators have gone out and picked up those routes. The routes of Owen Sound over to Southampton-Port Elgin-Kincardine have been dropped by various bus companies over the years over there.

We have put a network together that works. Our network is important to us, and deregulation will hurt our company.

Another part of our business boils down to transportation and tourism. Over the years we have developed a tourism business of cruise boat operations, the PMCL 30,000 Island Boat Cruises at Midland. This cruise boat fits in with our marketing of the province of Ontario. The Miss Midland carries approximately 40,000 passengers in the months of May to October. It fits and is part of our transportation and tourism plan. A new boat we're building for the city of Barrie this year is the Serendipity Princess, which will be a 250-passenger paddle-wheel. Again it fits.

I would like to look at the unfair competition that our company and I think other companies that operate in the province of Ontario have to face. Over the years, as I've mentioned to you, we competed heavily with Gray Coach Lines, which was a subsidized company, and even today we're doing the same thing with Ontario Northland. Contrary to Ontario Northland's opinion, Highway 7 is not the boundary for northern Ontario. Northern Ontario is northern Ontario. Even though they bought the routes from Gray Coach Lines and paid excess dollars to maintain a presence, a connection from Toronto to North Bay and Toronto to Sudbury, today we are sharing the corridor with Ontario Northland between Toronto, Barrie and Orillia, where each company is picking up each other's tickets and so forth.

Should deregulation take place, you will see that competition will control the movement of people. Competition will be that people will not be able to honour each other's tickets and people will be stranded. When we competed with Ontario Northland, they tried to exercise their strength and they failed. Competition doesn't scare us. We'll compete with anybody. But there was a problem on tickets, the freedom of movement where people can take one bus between one point and honour on the next bus where it's another carrier. This company tried to restrict the movement of people. The minister at that time, Ms Martel I believe, took a position to set them straight and I appreciate the effort that she did at that time.

Deregulation hits. You're going to see a restriction of people moving between point A and point B because a company will not honour tickets. There are only so many carriers in the bus business today operating intercity routes.

I look at the GO Transit operations, heavily subsidized operations, again impeding the operations of private carriers. I'm not here to bash government. I'm just here to tell you my thoughts on how to save dollars and where there's contracting out, we as private operators are capable of doing that because we do transit operations.

I use Barrie as my backyard because I know the operations well. I don't go to sleep without looking at schedules. For instance, you have the Ontario Northland operating commuter services between Toronto and Barrie, totally uncalled for. Highway 7 does not dictate northern Ontario. They are losing dollars the way they operate, but you cannot get that through to the government as to how they operate. Look at GO Transit. They operate in competition with Ontario Northland on commuter services between Toronto and Yorkdale, Toronto and Union Station. Again, they compete with themselves.

The point I'm trying to make is that we believe deregulation will hurt our company, will hurt the travelling public. Our feeder routes between Barrie and Midland and the spurs of Barrie, Collingwood, Owen Sound to Kincardine are marginal routes. They carry few people. The aspect of operating a large bus compared to a small bus does not buy. We have operated those small buses before. Your cost of operation is there, and the idea that small bus companies with vans will feed larger bus companies will not happen. You may think it is, you may be told it is, but it will not happen.

The system that is in place in Ontario today is what you have. The carriers that are out there that want to serve the public on point A to point B are in place. Our company was not part of the MICO group, for unknown reasons. Maybe they didn't like the style of operation, maybe they don't like how we do things. Maybe I don't believe in the philosophies of the MICO group, but I do believe in the fact that rural Ontario will be affected. You will see companies like ourselves, companies like the major carriers are going to protect their main-line hauls, the main points, the main cities.

If you look at dormant licences, Greyhound, Voyageur Colonial and Ontario Northland, if they really wanted to go out and serve rural Ontario, they have the opportunity. They have licences today but they've dropped them. They're primarily interested in point A to point B, half-load, full loads or whatever.

I could go on, but I think you may have some questions to ask me and I'm here to serve you the best I can.

Mr Colle: Just quickly, to summarize, Mr Dubeau, you're a free enterpriser. You've been taking over routes that other big companies have got rid off. You've created this network with basically no government help. You've provided the service. I see everything from Loretto to Minesing, Elmvalle, Stayner. You're all over the place, and you've done this on your own. You're also concerned about competing with government-subsidized operations like Ontario Northland and GO.

Obviously you are typical of what this government wants: free enterprise, rugged individualism, get out there and do it for yourself. You've done that. Yet you believe that deregulation is really going to hinder you who basically have a proven track record of doing it on your own without government help. Do you want to just quickly restate that to make clear how that's going to hurt you?

Mr Dubeau: What you're going to find is the fact that the cross-subsidy principle, which maybe you've talked about before, the cross-subsidy principle of charters and cross-subsidizing line run services — the main markets are markets of high populations. People who want to get into the bus business today are not interested in getting in the line run business. They're interested in getting into the charter coach business primarily.

However, you have these people on the fringes outside of Toronto where if the government agencies would open up their doors and let private enterprise share, whether on a contracting basis — I don't think I've answered your question, because I've always been a poor listener, but I hope I have.

Mr Colle: What I think isn't clear, though —

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Mr Colle, our time is up for that rotation. We'll move on to the third party.

Ms Martel: I was interested as I was listening to you talk about the routes that had been dropped by other carriers that were subsidized, which is a bad word some days in this committee, and picked up by you, and how you ran even in competition with some of these groups and picked up those lines, I could see my colleagues across the way saying: "This is exactly the reason why we need to have deregulation. Here it is. Here's a classic example of the people who are going to walk into this market and make things operate and provide service." Then all of a sudden you said, and I quote, "Deregulation will hurt our company."

I need you really to expand on this, because you just blew the air out of all their balloons over there. You're the person they're looking to say why deregulation is going to work in this province, yet you, as an experienced operator, one who doesn't get a government subsidy, one who has competed against government carriers and has still continued to capture that market, don't want deregulation. Why is that?

Mr Dubeau: Because of the fact that the routes we operate are marginal routes. I look at the spurs from Barrie up to Collingwood-Owen Sound; those routes are marginal routes. We rely on some cross-subsidy, whatever it is. We don't need protection, but there is some cross-subsidy. If we start seeing van pools, if we start seeing small vehicles competing against us in those corridors, what's the first thing we're going to do? We're going to protect our main corridor routes. I'm trying to protect the route system we have put in place.

We'll compete with deregulation if they open it up, but just because you go out and compete doesn't mean you're going to be profitable. We will protect. We are not afraid of deregulation. However, the fact is you may say, "The sitting group over here is the type of guy we want," but I don't believe that. I go back to the fact that the government, operating the services that they do, could very easily open up the markets for the private operations on contracting out. The routes we have are marginal routes. I look at the services we need, some assistance, some assurance, number one. If deregulation goes out, we are going to say to ourselves, do we really need the cross east-west service? But if it does go out, we're prepared. 1720

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Simcoe Centre): Thank you, Mr Dubeau, for coming down from Penetang to join us today. You said you had picked up routes that had been abandoned by the bigger firms. My question is, if it was profitable for your firm to do that, as a smaller bus line, to take over these routes, why wouldn't it, for firms that are smaller than yourself, be in their interest to pick up smaller abandoned routes that will result as you said?

Mr Dubeau: Good question. If you look at the points that we operate, they're mixed services. We have school bus operations, we have transit operations, we've got package tour operations, we have tourism boat operations all mixing together. You need a mix to get the product sold. If somebody on their own is going to operate a sole bus system, they will not survive. You need a mixed bag of operations to make it work.

Mr Tascona: With respect to the safety issue, certainly the government's role in terms of protecting safety in this industry is not going to change by this bill, but do you think it's better for the government to use its scarce resources to enforce a system of market entry control that is arguably burdensome and onerous on both government and industry?

Mr Dubeau: Market entry control, whether it be from the outside province of Quebec or the United States, they're just licking their chops to get at us. They're licking their chops to get at the Ontario operations' high population centres.

I want to just go on to the safety aspect. Operators today are waiting out there with 23- and 24-year-old vehicles to put them into the market. The buses we're buying today are costing us $475,000. They'll go and buy a used bus, and we are operating under regulations of CVOR and the safety and insurance levels and so forth. Talk about $2,000; $2,000 today is like a ticket between Penetang and Midland when it comes to insurance. You want to put some teeth into insurance, look at somewhere in the $15-million range and see how many people want to get into the business.

There are school boards out there today — there are contracts that are given out by municipal transit operations where they're saying millions of dollars are up front before you get into it. Some of them are not getting into it because of the fact it's a fly-by-night operation.

You've got to be concerned with regard to safety. It's a big item. One person just two days ago said, "I was waiting for deregulation to come in on April 1 because I went out and bought a bus 23 years old."

Mr Tascona: Arguably, those buses have to be inspected before they get on the road though.

Mr Dubeau: They have to be inspected —

Ms Martel: If you have MTO staff.

Mr Tascona: Ms Martel, you're not answering questions so don't interfere.

The Chair: Mr Tascona, we've used up your time allocation as well.

Thank you, Mr Dubeau. We appreciate your taking the time to come and make a presentation, and particularly I appreciate your rescheduling yourself to accommodate the cancellation we had.

Mr Colle: He's always on schedule.

The Chair: Thank you very much for coming in to see us here today.

Mr Colle: When does that boat leave Midland there, the first one?

Mr Dubeau: It started today, but you've got to look at this new boat we're putting in to Barrie. That's the one that's going to be the eye-catcher, guaranteed. I say to Mr Tascona and all you people from northern Ontario, you go through that direction, so stop in.

UNITED TRANSPORTATION UNION

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from the United Transportation Union, Mr King and Mr Tessier. Good afternoon, gentlemen. Welcome to the committee.

Mr Glenn King: Good afternoon, Mr Gilchrist and members of the standing committee. I'm Glenn King, secretary of the Ontario legislative board, United Transportation Union. With me today is Guilles Tessier, alternate legislative representative, Local 1161, United Transportation Union. We are both presently employed — and maybe I should put my head down after the previous presentation — by Ontario Northland Transportation Commission.

On behalf of the United Transportation Union, I would like to thank the resources development committee for the opportunity to provide input on Bill 39, An Act to amend the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act and the Public Vehicles Act.

As secretary of the Ontario legislative board, I've been afforded the opportunity to speak to you today on behalf of the 2,900 rail and bus members we represent in the province of Ontario. Presently we have members operating municipal bus service in Sault Ste Marie, intercity bus service along the Highway 11, 69 and 144 corridors and interprovincial charter services.

I wish to make it quite clear to the standing committee that the United Transportation Union supports many of the initiatives of Bill 39, but we are totally opposed to the government's intention to fully deregulate the bus industry in 1998 or any move to abolish the Ontario Highway Transport Board.

It would be appreciated by our organization if the standing committee would consider our suggestions and amendments as presented today. The UTU wishes to suggest that a purpose clause be considered as an amendment to the OHTB Act in order to enshrine the continuation of service to smaller communities. Ultimately, a purpose clause would set the parameters for the operation of the board. We feel that our amendment should be noted as section 1 of Bill 39, and we suggest that it be worded in the following manner:

"The Ontario Highway Transport Board exists to protect the transportation interests of smaller communities and ensure the greatest level of service possible from commercial use of public highways."

We believe a purpose clause is a clear mission statement that the OHTB is responsible for defending the interests of citizens and smaller communities in this province, ensuring that service is a priority and the travelling public has an opportunity to commute in a comfortable and efficient manner.

If it would be suitable, we have in our brief provided a presentation which is along the lines of what the Amalgamated Transit Union has presented today, and with due respect to the Chairman, we'd like to just move on to the end of our presentation. I think you understand our points and what we would like to see amended. We hope that you will consider those recommendations when you do a clause-by-clause review of the bill.

To commence on page 3, fourth paragraph, as we stated above, the United Transportation Union is adamantly opposed to bus deregulation. Mr Palladini has indicated that the Ontario government is committed to eliminating red tape and reducing regulatory burdens in this province. He feels that continued economic regulation of the intercity bus industry represents a barrier to job creation, economic growth and investment in this province.

In a fully deregulated environment, any operator will be allowed to start up a bus service, with safety and proof of insurance being the only criteria for licensing. It is still not confirmed as to who would take over the OHTB's regulatory authority and ensure that provincial safety standards and regulations will be adhered to.

It should be recognized by this committee that the OMCA is clearly divided over the issue of bus deregulation, as you've heard today, and has attempted to lobby the Minister of Transportation. They have suggested legislative changes, but to this point in time there has been no direct change in government direction.

If the bus industry is deregulated, many communities in northeastern Ontario could incur a loss of service. In a deregulated environment, the provision of bus service will be driven by market forces. This move will result in a no-demand, no-service scenario, much like what we've seen in the airline industry and in northern Ontario with the loss of norOntair. Furthermore, there will be no requirement to prove public necessity or convenience. We feel there will be a scooping of Ontario Northland's prime runs by outside carriers, which will increase in a deregulated environment, and further service cuts to northern communities will occur.

If Ontario moves to a fully deregulated environment, the competition for charter business will be intense, and our carriers will be operating at a disadvantage. Carriers that previously had no charter rights in Ontario will have full rights to compete with Ontario's currently regulated carriers, while still enjoying protection in their home jurisdiction. We've seen the results of this in the United States over a 10-year period, from 1982 to 1992. During the Reagan era, 7,000 communities lost their regularly scheduled bus service. We feel that there are upwards of possibly 170 communities in Ontario that could lose their regularly scheduled line services.

Due to the above concerns, the United Transportation Union has made presentations to municipal councils and we have been granted resolutions from the communities of Sault Ste Marie, Timmins and Kirkland Lake. There is one provided from the town of Warren, a community that is west of North Bay by about 50 miles. I just received that this morning and I hope there is a copy for everybody.

As a point of interest for the committee, the town of Warren is most concerned. They are not a regularly scheduled bus stop. They are a flag stop. They have been in contact with Greyhound to look at setting up a depot, and Greyhound has come back to tell them that until the issue of deregulation is solved, there will be no regularly scheduled stop in the town of Warren.

On May 10, 1996, we attended the Federation of Northern Ontario Municipalities conference in North Bay. At FONOM we received a unanimous resolution to oppose intercity bus deregulation, and a copy of that resolution is attached for your information.

On numerous occasions the present government has indicated in the Legislature that bus deregulation is a viable option for Ontario. We request that you listen to the travelling public and municipal leaders. They have been instrumental in supporting this government. Please acknowledge their direction.

The Chair: Thank you very much. You've allowed about four and a quarter minutes per caucus. The questions this time will commence with the third party.

Ms Martel: Let me start with FONOM. Maybe you can just explain to the committee how many municipalities that involves, because that is certainly an important body to have spoken to and have gotten a resolution from.

ities. There were 160 delegates present from the communities in northern Ontario, and that conference was held in the Best Western at North Bay on the 9th, 10th and 11th last week. It was most interesting. In talking to many of the delegates, they do not have an understanding of what this government is proposing by throwing out a balloon regarding bus deregulation, and they were also concerned at their lack of opportunity to provide input into Bill 39.

Ms Martel: What does bus service mean in northern Ontario? You can appreciate that the northern members who have been on this committee spoke at great length in opposition to bus deregulation. We spoke about it in the context of this bill, because we certainly believe that is exactly where this bill is leading, and the minister has made that point abundantly clear, but we've also tried to point out from the communities that we represent why having adequate, regular, scheduled bus service is terribly important in our part of the province. Given that you work in this industry and you deal with these folks, maybe you can describe it better than we.

Mr King: Certainly. When we lost our — and I'm talking along the Highway 11 corridor now, and it's much the same in western Ontario with the loss of rail services. The federal government was quite effective in indicating and lobbying that northern communities were overserved with rail, bus and plane. We're coming down to an issue now where possibly the bus might be the only viable means of transportation for most people in those communities. In northern Ontario we've seen the recent loss of norOntair. There have been contracts go out to try and alleviate that problem, but there are still difficulties in awarding those contracts.

A community much affected is Kirkland Lake, which is north of North Bay by about 130 miles. They've been successful in having an air carrier come in and service their community, being I believe Bearskin, but they're still under the onus that it's ridership and if the demand isn't there, they're not going to have that service. This is a big bus community too. They're most concerned about what's going on here.

Mr Len Wood: Just briefly, I also attended FONOM in North Bay last Thursday and I can vouch for the anxiety that there was no consultation, there were no discussions whatsoever in bringing in Bill 39 and saying, "We know everything and this is what's going to happen," and railroading it through.

Just going back a little bit on norOntair, last Thursday was a good example. When you don't have norOntair service, it costs an additional $500. I could not get out of North Bay going north unless I flew back to Toronto and then from Toronto flew over top of North Bay to get into Timmins and then in turn get in there. So just by what the government has done, it's added an extra burden of $500 or $600 on to the individual. Some of them can't afford it. I'm fortunate that the taxpayers are subsidizing me and my transportation and I'm able to do it.

As far as the question is concerned, do you feel that the next step is that we might lose the bus, the Ontario Northland bus, with deregulation?

Mr King: Our carriers are all concerned about a deregulated environment. There's going to be a lot of competition. If you take communities along the northern Highway 11 corridor, we touch very closely with the province of Quebec. Kirkland Lake is one of them. We have concerns that they'll be coming in out of Quebec and cherry-picking our routes there.

Mr Carroll: Mr King, are you familiar with the Freedom to Move organization?

Mr King: Yes, I am, sir. I work very closely with that coalition.

Mr Carroll: Then obviously you're aware of this list of 170 threatened communities. I'd just like to ask you a couple of questions about that. There's quite a range of places on here, places like Armstrong in the north; the town of Wallaceburg in my riding has got 12,000 or 13,000 people in it; the town of Leamington, 12,000 or 13,000 people; Port Perry, which is basically a suburb of Oshawa — they probably wouldn't like me to say that. Can you tell me based on what evidence this list was put together?

Mr King: That was a selection of communities based on, from what I understand, looking at schedules, and I would say that some ridership figures were looked at. A lot of those communities, sir, have ridership where we draw four or five passengers out of them. Those are the communities that are in jeopardy here. When you're not running a half-filled motorcoach, you're not going to be making any money at it. That's the concern.

Mr Carroll: So it's just kind of anecdotal evidence that put this list together.

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Carroll: One of the places that's on here is Kirkland Lake. You made reference to Kirkland Lake, and Kirkland Lake has passed a motion; their town council has passed a motion. Yet Mr Walsh, who owns the bus company that services Kirkland Lake, told us quite emphatically that deregulation would have absolutely no effect on his company's ability to service Kirkland Lake.

Mr King: Is that right?

Mr Carroll: What basis do you have to refute the man who is providing the service now? On what basis do you say that, no, that service will be discontinued?

Mr King: I think if we look at what the government is proposing and if I go up there and buy myself a minivan, I'm competing in Mr Walsh's environment, and that's what concerns us. If he's not concerned about deregulation, I would think he should be.

Mr Carroll: Is there any possibility that what we have here on behalf of your organization is an element of fearmongering designed to protect the jobs of the unionized workers?

Mr King: No, sir.

Mr Len Wood: It's fearmongering on the part of the Tory caucus. That's what the fearmongering is.

Mr Carroll: I'm asking him the questions, Mr Wood.

Mr King: No, I don't think it is, sir. I don't know of anybody today who isn't concerned about their job. No job is guaranteed here.

Ms Martel: Especially with this group.

Mr Carroll: On what basis then can you justify circulating this list — and you've admitted it comes from just anecdotal evidence — telling people these 170 communities are going to lose their service if we proceed with deregulation, if it's not fearmongering?

Mr King: No. We've said they could lose them. I think if you look at the evidence that has been provided from the communities in the United States, we're very concerned about where the transportation industry is going in Ontario. Being out there with the travelling public, we want to see the people transported around.

Mr Guilles Tessier: I think you also have to realize the number of towns that would be affected that are not on this list. Those have to be taken into account as well.

Mr Carroll: On what basis, though, sir, would you have them on the list?

Mr Tessier: I can tell you right now that between Sudbury and North Bay, for instance, which is the Trans-Canada Highway, the ridership really isn't there. If any company could run non-stop through them, they probably would because it would save them time and money.

Mr Carroll: Would you not agree with me, sir, that the operators who are running the routes are the best judges of whether or not the route will continue to be viable? Do you not agree with that?

Mr Tessier: I personally think, especially in northern Ontario where, like we said, bus service is a crucial service because it's the only means of transportation for seniors and students to get home on weekends, if you read the whole fact sheet, you'll understand our whole point behind Freedom to Move.

Mr Carroll: But this, I submit, is fearmongering designed to protect union jobs.

Mr Tessier: Absolutely not.

Mr Carroll: That's all, Mr Chairman.

1740

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): Would you agree that protecting union jobs in the province is a noble and worthy endeavour?

Mr Tessier: I would think that any job we protect in this province, whether it be union or non-union, is important.

Mr Duncan: Absolutely. Talk to me a bit about the economics of transportation, particularly in the north, and indeed in towns like Wallaceburg and Leamington, which I too am familiar with. My understanding is that a carrier like Mr Walsh, their first objective is profit, and properly so. It's my understanding that a number of these lines, without the regulatory protection, would not be profitable. Would that be your view?

Mr Tessier: Yes, generally through the way licences are awarded, the smaller communities are covered in service agreements for more profitable runs.

Mr Duncan: So that we in effect use the leverage of the profitable runs to ensure that those communities that can't be profitable on their own, like Wallaceburg and Leamington, very important towns in this province — we use the leverage associated with the more profitable runs to subsidize those towns that would not be profitable on their own.

Mr Tessier: Yes.

Mr Duncan: Would it be your view, given your experience in the industry, that the regulatory climate that has developed over the years, I suppose, has served us well?

Mr Tessier: Yes.

Mr Duncan: Are there other ways of amending the regulatory climate we've talked about that you think could enhance service and profitability, and would you expound on that a bit?

Mr Tessier: I think anything that gives the carrier flexibility to set up a run or drop a run, if we're looking at fees — when you're looking at setting ticket prices and that, I believe the carriers need that flexibility and to not be running back to a regulatory body to get that approval so they can do it.

Mr Duncan: And your union and others would be prepared to work cooperatively to find those kinds of regulatory changes that would make Ontario more competitive and at the same time protect those vulnerable communities like Wallaceburg that will stand at least some chance of losing their service?

Mr Tessier: Sure. We're willing to work with anybody. We're out there.

The Chair: Mr Tessier, Mr King, thank you very much for taking the time to make a presentation before us here today. We appreciate you coming in.

TRANSPORTATION ACTION NOW

The Chair: Our next group is Transportation Action Now. Good afternoon.

Mr Stephen Little: We have circulated two presentations because ours is basically in two parts, and we will be reading from parts of them, so I urge all the committee members to read the entire submission to capture the full flavour of what we hope to be able to capture concisely right now.

Thanks for the opportunity to be able to present to the resources committee on this very important subject. I bring regrets from the acting executive director, Janice Tait, who unfortunately had a family emergency. My name is Stephen Little and I'm a member of the board of Transportation Action Now. I represent the board members of the organization, a coalition of nearly 100 organizations in Ontario supporting accessible transportation for the over one million Ontarians with disabilities, as well as those ambulatory disabled seniors who cannot drive or have no access to a car.

Our organization has been advocating for accessible transportation since 1985, but there are many of our constituents who have been lobbying for access since the early 1970s. Two of these people, Jean and Lew Blancher, are here with me today. In addition, our legal counsel, David Baker, will speak to you about the situation with respect to the federal regulation on accessibility on intercity buses.

Jean and Lew Blancher complained to the Ontario Highway Transport Board in 1974 that they were refused passage on an intercity bus because they were unable to board independently. Their lawyer argued before the OHTB that bus companies had an obligation to carry people who paid for a ticket and were not drunk or disorderly under section 15 of the Public Vehicles Act. The board agreed with this argument and asked bus companies as a condition of licensing to make provisions for the carriage of people with disabilities. That order has never been carried out.

From our point of view, the two levels of government, federal and provincial, are playing a game of hot potato where each side is trying to pass off responsibility to the other for the issue of accessibility. The Advisory Committee on Accessible Transportation, which advises the federal Minister of Transport, met recently with the bus industry to try and work out some form of voluntary standards, but there has been no progress. So we have the situation in Ontario where Greyhound and Trentway Wagar are making some effort to provide access, while Voyageur, PMCL and GO Transit, the bus part, do nothing.

With deregulation, we anticipate a situation where many people with disabilities or those without a car in smaller towns and cities in Ontario will have no option at all to travel outside their community. Leaving accessibility to the private sector will not work, as we have seen by the reluctant performance of some members of the bus industry to date.

Prior to his election as Premier, Mike Harris stated in response to a written question from our organization that, "A Harris government would work to ensure that all new intercity buses purchased in Ontario are fully accessible."

My questions to this committee today are: Does the Mike Harris government support the integration of people with disabilities into the mainstream of Canadian life? If so, as part of that commitment, will you ensure that barrier reduction in bus transportation services for persons with disabilities will occur? How can you ensure this will happen except by regulation, not by deregulation? If the Harris government does support barrier-free bus transportation, will the minister affirm in Bill 39 that the Ontario government will ensure that persons with disabilities are accommodated?

If the government is interested in economic growth and investment, excluding a large number of people from this form of transportation seems to run contrary to that commitment. Many people in Ontario need accessible intercity bus services to get to school, employment, hospital and medical appointments as well as social and familial activities. All of these activities promote growth and enhance the quality of life for the citizens of this province.

The future of intercity buses in Ontario has now become a lottery. Accessible service is even more problematic. If you need accessible transportation, you are in double jeopardy with this new legislation.

Through this committee, we urge the Minister of Transportation to (1) commit his government to the principles of integration into the mainstream of Canadian life for people with disabilities in this legislation by incorporating the federal access clause, section 63, into the amended Public Vehicles Act; and (2) provide the interim system with the regulatory power to fulfil the commitment made by Mike Harris to purchase only accessible intercity buses.

I'll now give David Baker an opportunity to explain to you how this matter was addressed at the federal level.

Mr David Baker: In 1985, when the federal government proposed deregulating modes of transportation under federal jurisdiction, it was agreed that the government would continue to regulate safety, as the current Ontario minister proposes doing, through the process of deregulation with respect to the intercity bus industry. But the federal government also felt it was essential to continue to regulate accessibility of federal modes of transportation.

At the present time, the intercity bus industry in Ontario is the only mode of transportation where there is no provision and no authority to provide accessibility standards for persons with disabilities. It's the only mode that is in that situation.

In 1987, the federal government introduced specific legislation — we have the sections at pages 3, 4 and 5 of the supplementary submission — and we have reviewed them carefully. With very minor changes, these sections could be inserted into the Public Vehicles Act of Ontario. In other words, the wording need not change, assuming the government is persuaded, as the federal Conservative government was in 1987, that there was, notwithstanding the desire to deregulate, a need to continue to regulate both safety and accessibility.

The response to this issue at the federal level is as follows: When Ontario changed its position in 1993 and indicated that it would be supportive of there being national standards with respect to the intercity bus industry, an effort was made to develop a national standard. That consensus has disappeared as a consequence of the election in Quebec. There is no agreement from Quebec to a national anything, least of all a standard in this area. However, what we are proposing would permit the adoption of any national standard if it were established.

The proposal in 1993 was that there be a national standard but that it be implemented under Ontario legislation. As a consequence of the Blancher case and other cases in which we've been involved involving the Greyhound takeover of Gray Coach and so on, it is clear that under the current legislation if there were a national standard it could not be enforced in Ontario; it could be in other provinces, but it could not be enforced in Ontario without this proposal.

We are submitting to you that if the promise of the Premier is to be kept and if the very important element of accessibility is to have any protection at all, legislation such as that which we are proposing should be adopted now into the Public Vehicles Act.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Baker. That's the end of your submission, so I appreciate that.

Mr Carl DeFaria (Mississauga East): My question is to Mr Baker. I was reviewing your research, and in your research you seem to indicate that the issue of accessibility is with the federal government and it has been delegated to a board in Ontario. As far as intercity transportation is concerned, it was delegated to the Ontario Highway Transport Board. Is that correct?

Mr Baker: No. Perhaps I should apologize if that was how you read what I was saying. The federal government, in the 1960s, delegated authority for buses that go over provincial boundaries. So a bus from Toronto to Quebec is a matter of federal jurisdiction. Because a bus from Toronto to Kingston would be provincial, it was felt it should all be in the hands of the provinces, and the federal government got out of the business.

There was a feeling that it would be useful to have a national standard. There was preliminary agreement to a standard. This would not be regulated; it would simply be by agreement of a federal-provincial-territorial committee. But it would require that there be an amendment such as the one we're proposing here to enforce a national standard if one were ever to emerge.

Unfortunately, what's happened since 1993 is that there's a change in the federal government and also a change in the Quebec government. There is no longer a consensus for a national standard and each province is left to go its own way.

Mr DeFaria: Right, but my question is that the delegation was to the Ontario Highway Transport Board, not to the province of Ontario, because as you know, in constitutional law the federal government could not delegate to the province; it can delegate to a provincial board but not to the province, under the BNA Act and case law.

Mr Baker: I'd have to do some research.

Mr DeFaria: The problem I have with your request for some legislation from Ontario is that it may not be possible under constitutional law.

Mr Baker: The problem I have with that, sir, is that that's exactly what was proposed in 1993 by the federal-provincial-territorial agreement. With all due respect, I assume that if there was that kind of an agreement, certainly it could be done. There is nothing preventing the province from developing its own standard. You may be right, maybe there can't be a national standard, but there certainly can be a provincial standard within the province, which is exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. I would submit to you that that's really no answer to the point I've made.

Mr DeFaria: What I'm talking about is that once the federal government delegates power to a board, the federal government can legislate on accessibility and other things and provide those directions with the delegation. You can't expect the province, which does not have the power under the BNA Act on intercity busing, to create laws that it doesn't have the power to do.

Mr Baker: The province has exclusive jurisdiction over intercity busing within the province. The difficulty I have with what you're saying is that there is nothing preventing the province from establishing standards; that's what we're asking that the province do until such time as there is agreement. There was never any intention of federal legislation. The intention was that there would be a national standard which all the provinces and territories and the federal government agreed to so there'd be a uniform standard. There would be nothing preventing the Ontario government from taking what was proposed and agreed to in 1993 and saying that that's the Ontario standard and hoping that everybody else would adopt the same standard so there would be a uniform standard even without a national agreement, which there couldn't be without Quebec.

Mr Colle: I guess it's no different than when the past NDP government mandated that all new inner-city buses, any new ones, be accessible. They took that action in 1992 or whatever it was. There's precedent for doing that. In essence, I guess you're asking this government to take Mike Harris at his word. He said he would do it, and there is the obvious indication from the Premier that he supports this. This would enable people with disabilities to access buses that go from cities to towns across Ontario. In terms of the federal statute, how specific is it in terms of accessibility on these buses?

Mr Baker: There's no federal statute that deals with accessibility of buses. I'm sorry if I've confused people on this point. There was simply a standard, which means an agreement reached between the federal, provincial and territorial governments, based on some work done by the National Transportation Agency. That standard is not now a national standard, because Quebec is not prepared even to come to the table to discuss it, let alone sign anything.

We have the work all done. There was basically agreement — Ontario bought in 1993 — that could not be implemented without a change such as the one we're proposing to the Public Vehicles Act. That would have had to happen in any event, even if Quebec had agreed. The point is that the standard is known. Everybody knows what's required. All that need be done is that there be a mechanism for enforcing the standard, which there is not at the present time. We would ask that there be a standard.

Mr Colle: You're asking really for the mechanism to be incorporated in an amendment to the Public Vehicles Act, which is strictly under provincial jurisdiction, which we have before us today. That's being amended.

Mr Baker: Absolutely.

Mr Colle: You're asking for a very simple amendment that would allow for an accessibility mechanism to be incorporated in the amendments to Bill 39.

Mr Baker: Which is exactly what the federal Conservative government did in 1987 when it deregulated air.

Mr Colle: Right now in Bill 39 or the proposed amendments there is no reference to doing that. You're saying that is an omission and that should be included in the amendments.

Mr Baker: That's right.

Mr Colle: On a point of order on that, Mr Chair: What is the mechanism here in terms of making amendments?

The Chair: They must be presented in writing to be considered by the committee.

Mr Colle: They must be presented in writing. Is this adequate in terms of being presented in writing?

The Chair: No. It would have to be couched in the form of a motion.

Mr Colle: Those motions can be presented — I know we're going through clause-by-clause —

The Chair: At any point prior to reaching the relevant clause.

Mr Colle: I'd like to move that this amendment be brought forward as on page 8, that "The mechanism selected by the federal government (ie, sections 63.1, 63.3 and 63.4 of the National Transportation Act)" —

The Chair: Mr Colle, if I can stop you, we're not in clause-by-clause yet. There's no mechanism to accept a motion per se during a submission. If you want to do that at such time as we're in clause-by-clause, it would be in order at that time.

Mr Colle: I can present that at that time. That's all I was really asking.

Ms Martel: Maybe we can ask legislative counsel if they might consider that we're going to do that and take some time to look at it. I think the reference you had is actually found on page 3. Was that the text of the federal legislation?

Mr Baker: That's correct, and Mr Colle was referring to the section numbers at page 8.

Ms Martel: I think you will get some support from the two opposition parties in terms of moving that amendment, and certainly we hope the government members would see fit to move that as an amendment, given that we are dealing with the Public Vehicles Act today and changes to it, and given that their Premier made a very specific commitment to this. I hope they would not want to see themselves not supporting a commitment the Premier made, especially during an election campaign. It could be very important.

Mr Len Wood: Yes, or a by-election —

Ms Martel: We just might, given the Premier also said he would resign if he didn't keep his promise on May 10. We'll see what the outcome will be.

Let me go back to your concerns around regulation, because I think they're very serious ones and they're ones the committee, regardless of our partisanship, should probably consider. We have a position today where the very good folks you brought with you many years ago raised this problem with the Highway Transport Board. There were supposed to be some changes to allow for accessibility, and yet, even in a regulated environment where we have a board that can provide some direction, where we have some legal means to force people to provide that direction and to comply with that direction, we've seen that some of the bigger bus companies have no intention whatsoever of complying. Really, your concern is that if you allow smaller companies in, certainly people who are looking at operating minivans, without any kind of protection, you're not going to see accessibility for a long time in many parts of this province.

Mr Little: The issue seems to have escaped resolution simply because there was this dispute as to who actually had jurisdiction over it. With our proposals anchoring it firmly in the Ontario provincial jurisdiction, we would hope there would be no more avoiding any resolutions. If you deregulate and do not have any aspect addressing accessibility — because one recognizes that there is certainly the intent to continue regulating the safety, why not address the issue of accessibility in the same way? If we want to firmly anchor it in the provincial jurisdiction, that way it will get done and it will be enforceable.

Ms Martel: Your position is that if the minister obviously, by his statements in the House, sees that the province and in essence his ministry still have a role to enforce safety, this would be a very significant and very important addition to the role he already plays, not only guaranteeing safety but guaranteeing accessibility, and as a minister of the crown, he can do that and he should do that?

Mr Little: Correct.

Mr Lew Blancher: Not only our safety but the drivers' safety.

Ms Martel: Yes, not only your safety but the drivers' safety as well. Absolutely. Thank you very much for coming here today and taking the time to do so.

The Chair: Yes, thank you all, Mr Little, Mr Baker and the Blanchers. We appreciate your taking the time to come and visit with us today and to make these presentations. We appreciate your comments.

That being the last presentation to be made before us today, we now will move into clause-by-clause consideration of the bill. The clerk will be distributed an assorted packet of amendments already presented by the two opposition parties.

Legal counsel has asked for a minute or two. She wants to be involved while we debate the sections, plus she's just getting some guidance from Mr Colle.

I call the room back to order and commence with our clause-by-clause consideration. Based on what I've received so far, seeing no amendments proposed for subsections 1(1) and (2), are there any comments, questions or amendments on those two subsections?

Ms Martel: I want to add a point in there but it wasn't subsection (1) or (2), it was (3). Do you want me to do that now?

The Chair: I was going to deal with that as the next step.

Ms Martel: Okay, I'll wait.

The Chair: If there are none, I'll put the question. Shall the motion carry?

We will deal with your amendment first, sorry.

Ms Martel: That's okay. I just wondered too if you were going to vote on the whole question.

The Chair: Just doing this job once every three months on different bills, you get rusty.

Ms Martel: I move that section 1 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"(3) Section 2 of the act is amended by adding the following subsection:

"Purpose of board

"(4) The purpose of the board is to protect the transportation interests of smaller communities and to ensure the greatest level of service possible from the commercial use of public highways."

As a brief explanation, you heard a number of the groups that came forward, particularly from the union side, suggest that we should have an actual purpose clause that would outline that the role and responsibility also of the board is to ensure that we are providing service to smaller communities, given that those carriers are using public highways.

We didn't put it into a purpose clause, but we are requesting that it be inserted now as part of the purpose of the board, which is to the greatest level possible make sure that small communities still continue to have some service in this province.

Mr Ouellette: The introduction of such a purpose clause is not necessary because the government's direction to the board is already provided for through the policy statement issued to the board. Currently, the board operates in deciding on licence applications on the basis of a policy statement which sets out the form elements to be considered in determining public necessity and convenience. It does not make sense to add a vague statement of intent at this point, given the temporary nature of the interim regulatory system.

In any event, the board will continue to be fully accountable to the Minister of Transportation and would not be allowed to stray from the government's policy directions. For that reason, we will be opposing the amendment.

Ms Martel: On a point of clarification, I'm assuming it is the government's intention to bring in a second bill before January 1, 1999, which would permit full deregulation. Is that correct?

Mr Ouellette: The House leaders discussed this and are aware of the situation.

Ms Martel: I'm not sure I have an answer to my question, and I will tell you why I'm raising it here. If we're not going to see another bill that moves us to full bus deregulation and in fact we will just have a phasing in of bus deregulation in time for 1998, you will not have any other mechanism to put in a clause that outlines the importance of providing bus transportation to small communities.

I heard you say that right now you've got an interim board with policies and procedures that can take direction from the minister etc. I'm assuming that with full deregulation, we probably won't have a board. I'm not clear what the mechanism will be around enforcing safety. I'm assuming that's going to come through the ministry, and I worry then that any kind of statement of principle around how important I think all of us see bus services to be will have nowhere to be put as a statement of policy, principle or anything else.

That's why I'm asking the question about whether or not we're actually going to see a bill on bus deregulation, because then it could be put there.

Mr Ouellette: The intention is so.

Mr Colle: Just briefly, I don't see the harm in essentially putting in a general intention of protecting transportation interests for small communities — I think that's the intention of the government — and to ensure the greatest level of service possible from commercial use of the highways. It certainly doesn't contradict in any way, shape or form the policy statements of the government, and I don't see any drawback in putting it in there, except it does make a commitment to provide a high level of service.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Shall Ms Martel's motion carry? All those in favour, raise your hands? Those opposed?

I deem the amendment to fail.

Are there any further amendments to section 1? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Shall section 1 carry? All those in favour? Those opposed?

Section 1 carries.

1820

Are there any amendments to section 2 or any comments or questions? Seeing none, I'll put that question. All those in favour of section 2, raise your hands? Contrary?

Section 2 carries.

I see there is at least one amendment to section 3. Mr Colle, are you going to speak to that?

Mr Colle: The intent here is to ensure — I think it was one of the deputants put forth a concern about the problem we may have with limited access to the board if it only sat on a part-time basis, and I think this is trying to make it possible for the board to extend the sitting days to more than the three days. I think that was brought up by Mr Hugh Morris. He thought that would facilitate dealing with matters in a more —

The Chair: Mr Colle, forgive me, but to make the motion, we actually have to have it presented orally. If you could read the motion.

Mr Colle: I move that section 3 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"3. Sections 7, 9 and 10 of the act are repealed and the following substituted:

"Member designated to act for chair

"(7) The chair may designate another member of the board to act as chair in his or her absence.

"Same

"(2) If the chair cannot act and has not designated another member to act as chair, or if the office of chair is vacant, the minister may designate a member of the board to act as chair.

"Same

"(3) A member designated under subsection (1) or (2) may act as and has all the powers of the chair.

"Staff

"9. The board may engage and employ such persons as are necessary to carry out the board's functions."

Again, the basic intention here is just to try and ensure the board has the capacity to meet on a full-time basis when it seems fit that it has to, to meet the demands placed before it.

Mr Ouellette: This motion would remove provision for a part-time board which is needed to reduce the cost of the board and make it flexible to meet the demands which we anticipate to reduce as the deregulation date approaches.

Section 8 of the OHTBA also has a provision against conflict of interest which is presently in the act.

For those reasons, we would oppose this.

Mr Colle: I just think that matters are going to be quite complex in some cases, and you may need to give that board the flexibility to deal comprehensively with issues. I was just trying to facilitate that. In the long run, it may save you money by dealing with something thoroughly and save the applicants some time and energy too.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Shall the motion carry? All those in favour? Those opposed? I deem the motion to fail.

Any further amendments to section 3? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Shall section 3 carry? All those in favour? Contrary?

Section 3 carries.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 4 or 5, I'll ask if there are any comments, questions or amendments for those sections. Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour that sections 4 and 5 carry? Contrary?

Sections 4 and 5 carry.

Section 6: I see two questions. We'll start with yours, Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I move that section 6 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"6. Sections 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20 of the act are repealed and the following substituted:

"Power to review

"16. The board may rehear any application and may review, amend or revoke its decisions, orders, directions, certificates or approvals and may within its jurisdiction review, amend or revoke any decision, certificate or approval made before October 17, 1955, by the Ontario Municipal Board under the Public Vehicles Act or the Public Commercial Vehicles Act, being chapters 322 and 304, respectively, of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1980, if, upon application by any person, a majority of the members of the board is of the opinion that,

"(a) there is cause to doubt the accuracy, conclusiveness, authenticity or like property of any evidence received and relied upon at a previous hearing;

"(b) there has been an error in the administration of this act or the Public Vehicles Act; or

"(c) a rehearing would otherwise serve the purpose of the board as set out in subsection 2(4), as amended."

So that members understand what we are trying to do, this refers to the power of the board to rehear a hearing or any other application. You will know that under the changes the government's proposing at this time, that provision would be eliminated from the bill. I think we heard a number of people make a deputation to say that the board should still have some ability to rehear cases, because from time to time, while we don't like to know that it is so, information might have come before the board that was not accurate and people made a decision based on that information. Or secondly, there may be an error in judgement or an error in law that is only caught afterwards. Right now, as I understand it, the position the government is taking would not allow for a rehearing, and I think we are requesting that some specific provision be put back in to allow that to be so.

Mr Ouellette: The right to a rehearing would not likely provide a carrier but would only delay the inevitable outcome. Unless the original decision was blatantly unfounded, it would be unlikely that the decision would be set aside as a result of the rehearing. If the original decision was blatantly unfounded, then it was probably also in violation of natural justice or jurisdiction and could be jurisdictionally reviewed under the Judicial Review Procedure Act and under the Statutory Powers Procedure Act. A delay would be undesirable and sanctioning, because there is a stay of a stopover pending appeal by virtue of the Statutory Powers Procedure Act.

There is an additional cost associated with a rehearing which would be onerous on the applicant, who in a user-pay system would be forced to invest more money to reach a decision, including greater legal fees.

Also, the industry has spoken with a single voice on this issue that the rehearing provision is not needed and that all unnecessary appeal mechanisms would compromise the effectiveness of the interim regulatory system.

For those reasons, we would oppose the motion presented.

Ms Martel: I would like some clarification from counsel or ministry staff who are here, because it's also my understanding that in fact the Statutory Powers Procedure Act is affected and an appeal under that act would also be compromised by the amendments the government is moving forward with. So I want some clarification, because it doesn't seem to me that is a route that will be open after the bill is passed.

Secondly, from what I heard the member say, there is an assumption that always all of the evidence purported by an operator will be correct and anyone intervening will do so for a frivolous or vexatious matter. I don't think that is the case. There are probably some circumstances, albeit we hope there aren't many, where perhaps the information put forward by an operator was in fact incorrect. So you have others who lose service or don't get a chance to operate as a consequence.

Clearly there can be some mechanism arranged by the board to be sure they don't deal with frivolous and vexatious matters, that they truly only have a rehearing in the case where obviously there has been some judgement in error, in law or some obviously false information that was provided. In those situations, there has to be some other mechanism of appeal.

Mr Ouellette: When there is an error in law, there is the ability for the courts to review the decision in any event. There are small, minor problems such as name changes and things like that that allow for a review by the courts.

Ms Martel: I'd still like an answer to the question as to whether or not what the government is doing also changes people's ability to continue to appeal using the Statutory Powers Procedure Act. It was my intention that it was. If that's not the case, then I'd like to be corrected on that, but that is part of the reason why I'm moving forward this amendment.

The Chair: Mr Ouellette, you can delegate the answer if you prefer.

Mr Murray Forbes: My name is Murray Forbes. I'm a lawyer with the Ministry of Transportation. My understanding is that if there's a denial of natural justice or a jurisdictional error, an application could be brought for judicial review before Divisional Court. This would give protection in cases of blatant refusal, for instance, to take jurisdiction or where one side was not given an opportunity to know what the case was to meet, or something like that.

Ms Martel: So it is not correct to say that people then can still continue to try and find natural justice through the Statutory Powers Procedure Act. That's not an option that's left open to them now.

Mr Forbes: Well, the application would be brought under the Judicial Review Procedure Act and the Statutory Powers Procedure Act to a High Court to review the decision made by the board, if there has been a denial of natural justice by the board.

Ms Martel: So people's option is to go through court then, which would probably be fairly expensive.

Mr Colle: Certainly, one of the worrisome aspects about the bill is that the traditional appeals to cabinet are removed and appeals to Divisional Court are removed. I think we're going to be in most cases dealing with a one-person board whose decisions are final, and if it happens there's an error — because some of these matters are very technical. For the ordinary person, a small operator, before the board, there is no recourse. They can make an appeal to I don't know what level of court, but that is going to be even more expensive than making an appeal before the Divisional Court. Because going on the basis of negation of natural justice is quite a complex matter before a court, and I really wonder how many small operators will be able to undertake that appeal.

It's really making it almost impossible for someone to question the decision of this one-person tribunal, and I don't think that is really going to treat people fairly, especially, again, if you have a small matter that may be a technical error. There's got to be a way of at least presenting that and going to I don't know what level of court — maybe the solicitor would know that — where you would make that appeal. Would you go to a Supreme Court, the provincial court?

Interjection: Divisional Court.

Mr Colle: But you can't go to Divisional Court, because they've said you can't.

The Chair: Mr Forbes, can you clarify that?

Mr Forbes: If there was a technical error, if there was a typographical error or something of that nature, there is power to go back to the board to have it corrected. That's right in the Statutory Powers Procedure Act. That's not actually an appeal, that is just an ability for the board to correct technical-type errors.

Mr Colle: No, but I'm talking about the fact — let's say the board didn't take into consideration that there was a certain costing related to this one route and that was certainly misrepresented or it was misunderstood that the dollar amount and the impact of that on the decision was going to give undue financial hardship to that company, for instance. That's not technical, that's something that maybe somebody — people can make mistakes. This one-person tribunal can make a mistake.

Mr Forbes: There would be no right of appeal on an error of law or fact. There would only be a right to review in the case of want of jurisdiction or —

Mr Colle: So if there was a gross error made by the person making the decision on that tribunal, on the board or agency, whatever it is, there is no way you could appeal it then.

Mr Forbes: Unless the gross error went to the root of the jurisdiction or the gross error resulted in a denial of natural justice.

Mr Colle: So where would you go then?

Mr Forbes: Then you would go to Divisional Court for a review of the board's decision.

Mr Colle: But doesn't that contradict? I'm just looking at the preamble, the explanatory notes. It says, "Appeals to Divisional Court...are no longer available." Isn't that a contradiction?

Mr Forbes: No —

Mr Colle: So in other words, you can still go to the Divisional Court?

Mr Forbes: Yes, you bring an application for judicial review. It would not be an appeal of the decision. You'd ask the superior court to review the decision of the board for denial of natural justice, or a jurisdictional error. You wouldn't appeal on the legal questions or the factual question. You would ask the court to review whether the tribunal had jurisdiction to make the decision it made, or whether the people who appeared before the tribunal had been treated fairly, basically.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Forbes. Mr Colle, any further questions?

Mr Colle: No, that's fine.

The Chair: Any further questions? Comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question.

All those in favour that the motion carry? Those opposed? I deem the motion to fail.

Mr Colle, your motion is next.

Mr Colle: Yes, I'm just trying to keep track here. The next motion deals with the — if I could check with our legal counsel. This is the same section. I think what I was asking for there, if I'm not mistaken, is the right to present a motion. I just want to make sure I've got the right one here.

I move that section 6 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"6. Sections 17, 18, 19 and 20 of the act are repealed."

What I am just trying to accomplish here is that the appeal mechanism —

The Chair: We've seen this before. Could you just re-read the last two words?

Mr Colle: Okay: "are repealed."

The Chair: Nope. Oh, I beg your pardon. So our copy is correct?

Mr Colle: Yes, "are repealed." What I'm trying to achieve here is that there be an appeal mechanism left in the act. That's the objective of this motion before you, just in terms of trying to allow people to at least have recourse for an appeal.

Mr Ouellette: For the same reasons that we opposed the NDP motion, we will be opposing this motion. It should also be noted that in the courts you can recoup your costs as well.

Mr Colle: Just one second. You can recoup the costs depending on what the judge's ruling is. Let's be clear on that. A lot of people have been prohibited from making that appeal because they may have court costs awarded. So it's not an automatic recouping of costs. That's why I think it's a bit of a concern for people.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Shall the motion carry? All those in favour? Opposed? I deem the motion to fail.

Shall section 6 carry? All those in favour? Opposed? Section 6 is carried.

Section 7. The first motion up will be Ms Martel's.

Ms Martel: I move that subsection 22(3) of the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act, as set out in subsection 7(1) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Public and oral hearings

"(3) Despite subsection (1), all hearings of the board shall be open to the public and, if any party to a hearing requests an oral hearing, the hearing shall be an oral hearing."

What we are suggesting in this section, and some of the presenters made reference to it as well, is that there are some real advantages to having a hearing that is open to the public because it involves the public interest, bus service, commercial use of public highways, but secondly that we believe it makes a lot of sense to have an oral hearing, not just in the case if all the parties agree.

We heard some presenters say today that in most cases hearings last all of a day and a half, that what it does when you have an oral hearing is allow people to be cross-examined by the board, but also if there are petitioners or intervenors or objectors, they as well have the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses. In that way, you might have much more information that comes to the fore than you would just through a written appeal.

We don't see that an oral hearing would lengthen the time of a hearing before the board. I think, in fact, it would probably reduce some of the time because of the allowance for cross-examination by the parties involved. I certainly think it would be a much more public process, which I think it should be given that what we are talking about is a service for the public on transportation corridors that are in essence owned and maintained by the public as well.

Mr Ouellette: The industry wanted to keep the costs down, and a significant part of the industry wanted written hearings. Unless credibility is directly at issue, natural justice should be met by written hearings. Cost savings would include costs of hearings, a hearing room and services, which is transcripts, costs of calling witnesses, increased legal fees etc. Also, scheduling would not be a problem, so that the decision is more likely to be reached quickly. Written hearings are public hearings, just as are oral hearings.

Our view is that the bill has been drafted to achieve flexibility and the balance between the use of oral hearings and the use of written submissions. In fact, the board's consideration of enforcement and penalties will rely on oral hearings unless all parties agree to written submissions. In the case of applications, oral hearings are possible where all parties agree to an oral hearing or where one party requests an oral proceeding and the board agrees.

For those reasons, we'll be opposing.

Ms Martel: I just don't understand what the huge cost is here, and I guess I disagree that a written hearing is a public hearing when you have no opportunity to cross-examine either from members of the board or from intervenors. I don't know how that gives people any more access to getting all the information.

It might be that the industry recommended this happen. I suspect there are a lot of people who would like to intervene who will not have an opportunity to because all of the parties won't agree. If you've got the public that's coming in and is saying that someone should not be allowed to discontinue a route because it's going to affect their community, it's not going to be in the bus operator's interest to have an oral hearing. He'll want it written; he'll want it done with the least amount of intervention.

Given that we're talking about the use of something that the public maintains, which is our highways, people should have the broadest opportunity to participate, and I don't see how they do that in a written form.

Mr Ouellette: Over 400 communities currently lost their service and there were no hearings available for them. The process obviously isn't working. We feel that what we've presented here is fair and balanced.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion? Opposed? I deem the motion to fail.

The next motion is yours as well, Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I move that subsection 22(4) of the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act, as set out in subsection 7(1) of the bill, be amended by striking out "and" at the end of clause (a), by adding "and" at the end of clause (b) and by adding the following clause:

"(c) any person who advises the board, in accordance with subsection (5), that the person wishes to make a presentation in the proceeding."

Both this amendment and the one that comes directly after it refer to who is a party at a hearing. We heard some deputations being made about, how do you determine that? Is it only an operator? Should it only be an operator when, in the case of a community, for example, that community that is very reliant on bus service because it has a lot of seniors and a lot of students ends up losing that?

What we're trying to do is find a mechanism so that the issue of who is a party can be a broader one and does not only include an operator who might just be the same operator who is pulling service out of a community who would like to make a presentation and be party to that proceeding.

Mr Ouellette: For the same reasons of the Liberal motion under subsection 14(1), we'll be opposing this. That is, the reasons for limiting parties to those who are economically affected is that the user-pay board is more of a civil process than a regulatory process. There is a need to screen out frivolous representations before the board. Requiring parties to have an economic interest should screen out those frivolous appearances. Any party who wants to become involved in a board proceeding can make their case at the board that they have an economic interest. This flexibility exists in the bill as drafted. If local communities can demonstrate to the board that they have an economic interest in the outcome, then the current wording does not preclude them from being parties.

Ms Martel: I think it's going to be pretty hard for a community to demonstrate an economic interest. It's going to be hard for them to put a dollar value on a service lost to either seniors or students or other people who depend on public transportation in their community. I don't think we can expect them to try and work out that kind of valuation. The people who want to intervene also have a social interest, not just an economic interest. It's how they ensure the people in their community, depending on where they live, especially in rural and northern Ontario, still are in a position to get some service, and when that gets cut off, they can at least appeal somewhere.

These folks are not nominally affected, I can assure you, given that there are communities in my riding that have lost bus service. They are very much affected. For the life of me, you can — in the next amendment it's quite clear — allow the board to develop those criteria upon which they would determine in advance which are frivolous and vexatious interventions and not allow them. But to say that a community, for example, would have to prove some economic interest before it could participate, I think you're clearly writing into the law now all of those reasons why communities are not going to be able to intervene, because they're not going to be able to put an economic value or a monetary value on that kind of loss.

Mr Ouellette: The former government did not take this position when there were 400 communities being lost. We've had presentations from organizations which are willing to take over and support the northern communities. So we fail to see how they feel all of a sudden that because this is the legislation that's coming forward, this is what the impact is going to be. We don't believe what you're presenting is in fact the actual case that will be presented.

Ms Martel: Whether or not we did it is not the issue. You're the government now; you've got the legislation before you. We're in the process of moving clause-by-clause. Our government never considered bus deregulation, which is what this is leading to. What we're trying to do is at least find a mechanism to allow parties in the next 18 months, some of whom, I suspect, are going to lose service, to have some say, to have some intervention.

Mr Ouellette: Under the current regulations, they have the opportunity, as the 400 communities have already lost their service, to remove their service, as was presented today, that Warren had lost services there under the current legislation.

Ms Martel: Warren just lost their service.

Mr Ouellette: That's what I just said.

Ms Martel: Because of what's happening right now.

Mr Ouellette: No, not necessarily. It's because they have the ability to do so. That's what the problem is. We are opening the doors to allow other communities or other entrepreneurs the opportunity to move into those locations, as was presented by numerous groups.

Mr Len Wood: I listened to the argument from Mr Ouellette saying why he wouldn't support this. He's using the argument that 400 other communities lost their service over a number of years so we should put a number of other communities at risk, and even a person's own grandmother or something. How do you put an economic dollar figure on a grandmother who is in a small community that has bus service now who wants to be able to go and visit her children or her grandchildren and as a result of this legislation is going to be denied that? How do you put an economic dollar value, or expect her to put an economic dollar value, on what her social life should be?

The argument doesn't make any sense to me when you say, "Four hundred other communities lost their service and now we have a right to put all the other communities at risk," and even some of the people with disabilities or seniors who have no other choice but to depend on the bus service because they either can't afford a car or they can't drive one. They're going to be isolated as a direct result of this. If we can bring amendments forward that will help to resolve some of the pain and suffering for people in those communities, I can't see why the Tory caucus wouldn't support it.

Mr Colle: It seems very restrictive. I don't see any harm in trying to ensure that perhaps a local reeve or a mayor, or let's say the director of a medical facility, could make a presentation before the board without having to prove economic need. There may be a variety of different interests that go beyond the pure economics. This is very exclusive and it's going to mean that a lot of people affected by decisions of this board may not get the opportunity to present a case to the board. I don't see the value of that, especially when some of the impacts could be very dramatic. I support this motion.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion? Those opposed? I declare that the motion is lost.

Ms Martel?

Ms Martel: I move that section 22 of the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act —

The Chair: I thought you were going to do that one. Unfortunately, because it refers to the amendment we just defeated, it's out of order.

Ms Martel: No. There were two, actually, Mr Chair. One was trying to expand it to parties so there didn't have to be an economic interest, and the second section was to set out who those parties could be and that the board itself could also order any person who was there making frivolous actions to have to pay a fine.

The Chair: Unfortunately, the one that refers to subsections 22(5) and (6) makes a reference to the (4)(c) that was just defeated.

Ms Martel: All right. Mine is also the next one?

The Chair: Yes. You have one for subsection 24(2).

Ms Martel: I move that subsection 24(2) of the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act, as set out in subsection 7(1) of the bill, be amended by adding "unless in the opinion of the board, such additional costs would be injurious to the viability of a commercial entity or would unjustly penalize participation before the board" at the end.

This sets out some guidelines or rules or perhaps a restriction on the ability of the board to charge for its services. We want to be sure that operators of all different levels of incomes still have the ability to make a presentation before the board. We heard a number of operators talk about the cost of doing so at this point, and it's not clear to me whether, with the changes the government is making right now, there's also going to be a change in fees for people appearing before the board. We want to make it clear that the board would have to take into account the ability of operators to pay so we're not moving into a system where only the big guys, big operators, can come before the board for an application or for an appeal etc.

Mr Ouellette: The bus industry clearly told us that the costs should be recovered strictly on a user-pay basis. They were strongly opposed to any across-the-board cost recovery mechanism which would have reduced fees and user costs for board proceedings. The user-pay system is in response to the government's clear direction that funding for continued economic regulation is no longer available. Waiving fees would require money that taxpayers and government simply just don't have.

Ms Martel: Can the parliamentary assistant then tell me what the fees are going to be before the board? Even some of the larger operators raised with us their concerns about how much it costs to appear before the board now. Is that going to change?

Mr Ouellette: The presentations we had by the smaller groups who were in favour of this made no indication that there was any concern regarding the fees at all.

Ms Martel: I seem to recall a reference to $20,000 being made by one presenter.

Mr Ouellette: Those were legal fees administered by that organization.

Ms Martel: Okay, my apologies. I assumed the reference was also to the cost of having to appear and make a whole case.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, we'll put the question. Shall the motion carry? All those in favour? Those opposed? I declare the motion to fail.

Again, Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I move that subsection 7(2) of the bill be amended by adding "Applications and" at the beginning.

This reference goes back to the intervention made by Mr Morris, an individual who told the committee that he does numerous cases before the transport board and has over the last number of years. It's an effort to capture those applications and hearings which started before the government introduced the bill. I think he made it clear to us that the government had directed the highway transport board to stop proceeding with applications while this bill was under review, and that after threatening to sue the government those processes started again. I assume a number of applications are sitting there which may in effect have to be dropped if we don't cover for the period under which the government gave a direction to the board that was to the contrary of how it's proceeding now.

Mr Ouellette: This is specifically against an orderly transition. It would encourage applications being filed to take advantage of the old hearings system that is not user-pay. For the board to be self-funded, a narrow transition must be pursued. We need to have a break-off point.

As a point of clarification, there will be no need for applicants to reapply. Matters currently in the hearing stage will continue under the old rules, while those matters not yet having reaching the hearing stage will be handled under the new rules. The board will endeavour to deal with applications in a timely and efficient manner whether under the old or new rules.

Ms Martel: Are you still not going to find yourself in a position of two different standards being applied to people moving through the system at this time? That's what I'm trying to avoid.

Mr Ouellette: As I said, we need to have a break-off point, and that's what we're aiming for.

Ms Martel: My understanding, though, is that the board decided to continue to accept applications after being threatened to be sued. I'm just trying to get clarification on how you're going to deal with not just the hearings but the applications that may not have been acted upon yet but that were accepted into the system during the time we've been in flux dealing with this bill.

Mr Ouellette: MTO doesn't instruct the OHTB to do anything, and they did not stop taking any applications at all.

Ms Martel: But Mr Morris said something quite different to this committee. He made it very clear that the government told the Ontario Highway Transport Board to stop processing applications while this bill was being deliberated. He said that in his remarks to the committee.

Mr Ouellette: What he said was that they stopped scheduling hearings.

The Chair: I think you'll find that on page 3 under "Transition," Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: Mr Morris says: "Applications will continue to be filed every week between now and the date that the new legislation comes into force. What do we do with these filed applications?" Can the parliamentary assistant tell me what's happening with those applications that continue to be filed?

Mr Ouellette: They would fall under the new system. As I said, we don't instruct the OHTB to do anything.

Ms Martel: We have a contradiction. Mr Morris said: "The past February, the Ministry of Transport directed the board not to set down any more applications for hearing." We have a difference in opinion between the parliamentary assistant and what Mr Morris said. What I'm trying to deal with is that obviously he has put applications in and also has asked the board to schedule hearing dates, and I would like to be clear about how those are going to be handled by the board, both with respect to those that were in place before the legislation is passed and after.

Mr Ouellette: So what you're asking is for us to start mandating what the board's going to do?

Ms Martel: I want to know how they're going to handle those that were in the system before the legislation is passed, given that they obviously were put into the system under a different set of rules than are going to be in place once this legislation is passed. Are we going to be dealing with the applications and the hearings that were in place before the legislation passed under the old rules or not?

Mr Tascona: It's fairly clear on a reading of the section. It says, "Hearings commenced before this section comes into force and continued after this section comes into force" will go under the old rules. If the application does not become a hearing, obviously it won't be dealt with in the same manner. It's very clear language. I think Mr Morris's point when he was asking for the amendment was very clear. He wanted to make sure the applications would be received; obviously they would processed, but if they don't become a hearing by the time this section comes into force, they're not going to be heard under the old rules. An application has to become a hearing.

Ms Martel: Except why wouldn't we allow those who did apply before to continue to operate under the rules that were in place at the time they applied?

Mr Tascona: If they don't become a hearing, I guess it's a matter of time, because there's a time period that has to be dealt with. It would be for the board to determine its own process, not for this committee to determine how it deals with its applications. If the board allows an application to become a hearing before the transition period, it obviously will be dealt with under this section and under the old rules.

Ms Martel: That's not clear to me. That's why I'm asking the question. I do think it's the role of this committee —

Mr Tascona: It's extremely clear, Ms Martel, if you read it. If an application has not become a hearing by the time this comes into force, it is strictly an application. It has to become a hearing. The fact that the board's continuing to take applications — they may become a hearing during the time frame allowed under this act, because there is a transition period. If it's not a hearing, it's still an application and it won't be dealt with under the old rules.

Ms Martel: Then I don't see any problem with accepting the amendment I moved, which said "applications and hearings."

Mr Tascona: Because an application, if it hasn't become a hearing, would be dealt with under the old rules, and as Mr Ouellette indicated, that will clog the system. There has to be a cutoff point. If you're dealing with hearings and you finish the hearings, like under the Labour Relations Act, you finish the hearings under the old rules so everybody knows what they are. That's fair. But if you're dealing with applications and you allow — what Mr Morris is really asking for is a flood of applications to come in and basically clog the system so they won't be dealt with under the new legislation.

Ms Martel: But Mr Morris also made a point that there is an economic interest he's also trying to protect. I recall that he spoke at great length about what a delay would mean for people who had then to operate under a different set of rules. He made it very clear that there would be operators who would lose money as a consequence.

Mr Tascona: He also indicated that he didn't really care if it did change, because he would prefer not to have to go through the old process in terms of the type of preparation that was involved.

Ms Martel: Surely we have an interest, this government more than anyone else when you talk about trying to increase jobs etc, that there would be operators, as he well said in his remarks, who would be adversely affected in a negative economic way. That's also the point we want to deal with.

Mr Tascona: I don't think he did indicate that. I think he was talking professionally, as a lawyer representing the transportation lawyers' association, in terms of the procedure he would like to see in place. But he also indicated he didn't have a problem in terms of how that would be handled. The handling under the old rules was something he would like to avoid, if possible, and put his application after.

Ms Martel: He may have come to speak in that capacity. I think he was also speaking in terms of people he represents, and I think he did make it clear to this committee that there are people in the system, who he is representing now, who would suffer an adverse consequence. Whether they came individually to make that case I don't think is relevant one way or the other.

Mr Tascona: I think he can only speculate in terms of whether they would suffer an adverse consequence, because he indicated that the preparation time under the old system would be alleviated by going under the new system. I don't really think he was suggesting that.

Ms Martel: I don't think it was the prep time as much as when they were going to get a decision. He also made it clear that by the time some of these things were handled, it might even be after the summer, where some of those operators were trying to operate this summer. I don't think it was just an issue for him of preparation time to develop a case; it was also a question of when decisions would be made so that operators could know whether they could carry on.

The Chair: To both the participants, looking inside Mr Morris's mind and who he was representing is perhaps not too germane to the point at hand. I wonder if we could restrict our comments to whether we are in favour of or opposed to the motion on the floor.

Ms Martel: Fair enough, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the wish of the committee that the motion carry? All those in favour? Those opposed? I declare the motion lost.

Shall section 7 carry? All those in favour? Opposed? I declare section 7 carried.

Section 8.

Ms Martel: I move that section 8 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"8(1) Sections 25 and 26 of the act are repealed.

"Transition

"(2) Section 26, as it read immediately before its repeal, continues to apply to a petition that was filed before this section comes into force.

"Same

"(3) After this section comes into force,

"(a) the board shall not state a case under section 25, as it read immediately before its repeal; and

"(b) no petition may be filed under section 26, as it read immediately before its repeal."

This goes back to a point I raised earlier about what people's ability was going to be under the new bill with respect to appeals. We dealt with rehearing and also that it was the view of the government that people could use the court system to try to get some relief in cases of natural justice where they felt their rights had not been respected. This as well would reinstate a repeal to the courts on questions of law and jurisdiction as per the Statutory Powers Procedure Act, and that was a change we felt had been taken out of the act in the amendments the government was moving.

Mr Ouellette: The concerns raised over the delay would apply if appeals to Divisional Court on questions of law were preserved. A judicial review is available without retaining section 27 of the OHTBA, but applications for judicial review would not act as a stay of order reviewed, which would encourage speedy resolution rather than unwarranted delays. We would oppose this motion, this amendment.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the favour of the committee that the motion carries? All those in favour? Those opposed? I declare the motion failed.

That being the only amendment to section 8, shall section 8 carry? All those in favour? Opposed? Section 8 carries.

Section 9. Mr Colle?

Mr Colle: Again just an attempt to get back to the right of appeal of board decisions, a continuation of the previous amendments dealing in that direction.

The Chair: Mr Colle, you did it to me again. You have to read the motion.

Mr Colle: I move that section 28 of the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act, as set out in section 9 of the bill, be amended by adding "Except as provided in section 16" at the beginning.

The Chair: Ms Martel's experience had lulled me into a false sense of security. Any comments?

Mr Ouellette: For the same reasons in regard to the amendment proposed on section 6, we would oppose this amendment.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, is it the favour of the committee that the motion carries? All those in favour? Those opposed? I declare the motion fails.

Now Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I move that section 28 of the Ontario Highway Transport Board Act, as set out in section 9 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Orders of board final and binding

"28. Except as provided in sections 16 and 27, every order, direction and decision of the board is final and binding."

Mr Chair, part of those sections were dependent upon other amendments that we have already moved and that have been voted down, so it probably doesn't make much sense to rephrase the argument I made at that point.

The Chair: You're not making the motion?

Ms Martel: I am, but I know it's going to be voted down because the other sections upon which it was dependent were already voted down.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the favour of the committee that this motion carry? Those in favour? Opposed? I declare the motion lost.

I'll put the question on section 9 itself. Is it the favour of the committee that section 9 carries? All those in favour? Opposed? Section 9 carries.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 10, 11, 12 or 13, are there any comments, questions or amendments now to those sections? Seeing none, all those in favour that sections 10, 11, 12 and 13 carry? Those opposed? Sections 10, 11, 12 and 13 carry.

Section 14.

Mr Colle: I move that the definition of "interested person" in section 1 of the Public Vehicles Act, as set out in subsection 14(1) of the bill, be amended by adding "including elected officials or people affected by decision of the board and residents in a community affected by a decision of the board" at the end.

Essentially, this is again trying to ensure that if people are affected by a board decision there is recourse to come before the board. I was trying to widen that by changing the definition of "interested person." I think this would help ensure that there would be an opportunity to be heard if an impacting decision were made by the board.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, all those in favour of this motion? Those opposed? I declare the motion lost.

I put the question on section 14. Is it the favour of the committee that section 14 carries? All in favour? Opposed? Section 14 carries.

Are there any comments, questions or amendments to sections 15 or 16? Seeing none, all those in favour that sections 15 and 16 carry? In favour? Opposed? Sections 15 and 16 carry.

Section 17.

Ms Martel: I move that subsection 5(2) of the Public Vehicles Act, as set out in section 17 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Discontinuance of scheduled service

"(2) The holder of an operating licence shall not discontinue any scheduled service authorized under the holder's licence except after giving 90 days written notice,

"(a) to the minister; and

"(b) to the public in the area affected, as set out in subsection (4).

"Reduction of scheduled service

"(2.1) The holder of an operating licence shall not reduce by 25% or more any scheduled service authorized under the holder's licence except after giving 30 days written notice,

"(a) to the minister; and

"(b) to the public in the area affected, as set out in subsection (4)."

What this amendment does is take what is now appearing in regulation and put into the act, which we feel would give more weight to it and more strength. Also, it provides for a new section around reducing what is a scheduled service to try and capture some of the concerns that were raised; for example, of people deciding to operate only in peak hours instead of continuing to operate a service that had been in place before. It imposes some responsibilities on a carrier who still wants to continue to provide a service on a route but wants to do that at a much reduced rate and sets out the provisions around how that would have to occur.

Mr Ouellette: The protection proposed in the regulations will do this and more. However, as I'm sure you're well aware, the regulations which set out specifics of the government's proposal to increase protection for small communities can't be disclosed in detail because it must first go through the normal regulatory process but can't proceed to finalization until the bill becomes law.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, all those in favour of the motion? Opposed? I declare the motion lost.

Ms Martel, that would make your next amendment out of order, so the next one up is a Liberal motion.

Mr Duncan: I move that section 6 of the Public Vehicles Act, as set out in section 17 of the bill, be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Safety audit required

"2.1 Upon issuing a licence under subsection (2) the board shall require that a comprehensive safety audit be completed prior to the start of operations."

It's fairly self-explanatory. We reaffirm our commitment to safety on Ontario's roads and would urge the government to do the same.

Mr Ouellette: Safety audits are provided for under the HTA applying to both private and public carriers and to other commercial vehicles. The Ministry of Transportation has committed to implementing new safety measures to augment the existing elaborate array of safety requirements pertaining to bus operators. Specifically, new market entrants will be required to demonstrate to the MTO before being allowed to operate on our roadways that their safety house is in order.

In accomplishing the intent of the proposal for amendment, the bill pertains to economic regulation and is not the proper place to specify safety rules.

Mr Len Wood: I listened to Mr Ouellette's explanation. We just had a presentation that all kinds of people right now are out there anxiously waiting to grab these buses for $1,000 or $2,000 and put them on the road to try to get into the business. You've got somebody who's spending $50,000 or $75,000 or $100,000 on a bus, and then you get somebody else who's going to get a mechanical fitness done that's good for about 30 days, who puts this bus on the road and the wheels start flying off and breaking windshields and causing all kinds of accidents.

All we're saying is that a comprehensive safety audit be done prior to the start of operations. We're talking about putting people at risk, not only the people who are on the buses but people who are on the highways as well. I don't want to see a wheel off a bus come flying at me when I'm driving down the road because I know there are probably 30 or 40 people on the bus who are going to die at the same time as I'm going to die.

Mr Ouellette: As we stated before, they can't put them on the road without an inspection. Our commitment to safety is paramount. There would be no deviation from ensuring that our roads are safe and that the public's best interests are there.

Mr Colle: I found this really contradictory and unbelievable. What we're saying here is essentially that when a person applies for a licence, they undertake an audit prior and not six months after. I don't see how safety is enhanced by waiting six months. If they have the will and the ability to carry people safely, they'll have that in order. Why wouldn't you want to encourage that?

To say safety is paramount and then put a six-month delay on safety — it's especially paramount considering the fact that there are people who will enter into line routes or the charter business who perhaps are not fully up to safety standards. This ensures added protection for the thousands of people who will be on the buses, never mind the people on the roads and highways and the operators. It just doesn't make any sense at all to wait six months. The good, safe carriers have no problem with this. All you're doing is giving a green light to the ones who want to cut corners. Why this government would cut corners on safety — how can you rationalize this? You get the licence and you have the safety audit as you get the licence. You don't wait six months. What happens in that six-month period, with no safety audit?

Mr Ouellette: It is up to six months. The commitment with the bus blitzes currently ongoing, the safety standards we've established and the fact that they have to be inspected as well we believe will ensure that the public is safe there.

Mr Colle: In terms of the bus blitzes, you heard Mr Burley come in here yesterday and say he picked up a bus that went into his garage. How many people are doing bus blitzes in this province right now? We know how many people are doing truck blitzes. How many OPP officers have we got on the truck squad? In the whole province, what are there, a dozen? And you're laying off 1,200 people in the Ministry of Transportation. Who's going to be doing these bus blitzes?

Mr Ouellette: Actually, we've increased the inspection staff and there haven't been any layoffs in that area at all. 1920

Mr Colle: How many are on staff right now?

Mr Ouellette: The exact number? It's up to 240 now.

Mr Colle: For the whole province.

Mr Ouellette: Which is an increase of 30 or 40 individuals.

Mr Colle: And you're going to now say that's going to be adequate, considering you're going to be expanding it; there are more people entering the market as you deregulate. I just don't see the problem. If you've got that many more staff, then you shouldn't have a problem with the —

Mr Ouellette: We feel, with the number of increased inspectors, with the mandatory inspections, the commitment to bus blitzes, that it's more than adequate to ensure that our roads are safe.

Mr Colle: So the six-month —

Mr Carroll: Mr Colle, are you concerned primarily about new buses going on?

Mr Colle: Yes.

Mr Carroll: As I understand the laws of the province of Ontario, you cannot put a licence on a vehicle without a safety inspection. So I think that would cover that if you're talking about new buses going on the road.

Mr Colle: We're talking about a comprehensive safety audit —

Mr Carroll: But a safety inspection —

Mr Colle: — which goes beyond the licensing provision.

Mr Carroll: A safety inspection as required by the Ministry of Transportation should be sufficient.

Mr Colle: Yes, just like the ones people have for cars, you know. They've been buying the certificates and the whole works.

Mr Carroll: Well, that's another issue, but we currently have a system in place in the province of Ontario where a vehicle going on the road for the first time, licensed in Ontario, has to have a safety inspection. I think that's sufficient.

Mr Colle: That may be sufficient for private automobiles — in fact, in many cases it isn't — but as Mr Dubeau said, there are people who are entering the bus business with used vehicles, 20 years of age etc, because of trying to cut costs etc, which is reasonable. So I would think you've got another safeguard by saying you have to have the safety audit done before you operate. I don't see the harm in it. I don't see the downside.

Mr Carroll: It's overkill. We've got lots of regulation now to protect us in that area.

Mr Colle: "Overkill" is maybe the wrong word.

Mr Duncan: Yes, I wouldn't use that word.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion? Opposed? I declare the motion lost.

I'll put the question on section 17. All those in favour that section 17 carry? Opposed? I declare section 17 is carried.

Are there any comments, questions or amendments to sections 18 through 23? Seeing none, I'll put the question. Is it the pleasure of the committee that sections 18 through 23 carry? All in favour? Opposed? Sections 18 through 23 carry.

Section 24.

Mr Colle: I move that section 33 of the Public Vehicles Act as amended by subsection 24(1) of the bill be further amended by adding the following clause:

"(b.3) requiring applicants for licence renewals under subsection 6(3) to provide information and documents relating to the applicant's safety record as specified in the regulation."

All I'm trying to do here, Mr Chair, is ensure that all relevant documentation as it relates to safety is part of the process and is presented by the applicant so that the board can have all pertinent records before them and ensure that's the case, relating to safety.

Mr Ouellette: First of all, the licence renewals are unusual. Most operating licences are permanent. Under both the existing and the proposed systems, such renewals would normally be automatic and only exceptionally go to a hearing. The only change in the proposed system is that the minister would not be referring renewals to the board but it would be up to a competitor to present a case for conduct of a hearing on renewal. On those bases, we would be opposed to this amendment.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion? Those opposed? I declare the motion lost.

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Prescott and Russell): I move that section 24 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"(1.1) Clause 33(d) of the act is amended by adding 'provided that the amount of the liability insurance coverage shall not be less than ten million dollars' at the end."

The purpose of this amendment is, at the present time for car owners, we're asking most of the time that there be coverage of $1 million. This time when it is a bus carrying 47 people, I think we have at least 10 times the number of passengers, and if a small operator doesn't have the ability or the financial support to have insurance with $10 million coverage, he should not be able to operate a bus, for the public safety.

Mr Ouellette: The intent is to continue to allow insurance rates to be at different levels for different sizes of buses, based on passenger capacity. The levels should not be set at unreasonably high minimum levels. What needs to be done and what we intend to do in the regulation under this bill is to bring the insurance requirements for the intercity bus industry in line with today's realities and in line with the levels of neighbouring jurisdictions.

Rest assured that the insurance levels are being raised to appropriate levels. So for those reasons we would oppose this amendment.

Ms Martel: Could I just ask then, is what Mr Lalonde proposed out of whack with other jurisdictions or in line with other jurisdictions? It seems to me if we're moving in that direction, does what he propose actually reflect what's happening in other provinces, or do we have that information?

Mr Ouellette: It is in line with what's going on in other jurisdictions, the way that we have presented it.

Mr Lalonde: It is in line with other jurisdictions?

Mr Ouellette: Yes, the way that we have presented the bill, up to the $10 million, allowing variable rates for the mini-buses and things like that, based on passenger capacity.

Mr Len Wood: Are you saying that the $10 million is the minimum for any operator out there and then if they have bigger buses and more — it's more than that in other jurisdictions?

Mr Ouellette: No. What we're saying is that $10 million, being that it's "shall not be less than," could be too high in certain instances, for small capacities and things like that.

Mr Colle: In terms of the liability threshold here, again I think that the purpose here is to ensure that we don't have the situation which occurs today where some bus operators have about the same level of liability as ordinary motorists do. What it's really doing is ensuring that people have a substantial track record in businesses, that you don't have people entering the market who have no business being there. It's all part of the risk to the public and I think also unfair competition for people who have safe vehicles and carry these costs. So there are two aspects to it.

A $10-million level for a passenger vehicle — if you want to have a special regulation that also deals with minivans or other vehicles, you can do that afterwards by regulation, but a $10-million limit for regular intercity buses is quite reasonable. I'm not sure what the problem is in terms of sending a strong message to people that if you want to enter this field, you have to be willing to secure sufficient insurance. I think it really makes it fair for everybody in the business and at the same time ensures that the public is not going to be at risk in terms of insurance liability.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion? Opposed? I declare the motion lost, which leads us to Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I move that clause 33(o) of the Public Vehicles Act, as set out in subsection 24(2) of the bill, be amended by striking out "the amount of notice and" in the sixth and seventh lines.

The purpose here was to move some provisions that currently appear in regulation into the act itself to give it what we thought would be greater strength in law.

Mr Ouellette: We feel that the regulations are a better place to set out the rules governing notice of discontinuance and reduction so that it can be more flexible to changing requirements if changes are necessary in the public interest. So for those reasons we will be opposing the motion.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion? Opposed? I declare the motion lost.

Mr Colle: I move that section 33 of the Public Vehicles Act, as amended by section 24 of the bill, be further amended by adding the following clause:

"(p) For the purpose of eliminating undue obstacles in the transportation network governed by this act to the mobility of disabled persons, including regulations respecting:

"(i) the design, construction or modification of, and the posting of signs on, in or around, means of transportation and related facilities and premises, including equipment used in them;

"(ii) the training of personnel employed at or in those facilities for premises or by carriers;

"(iii) tariffs, rates, fares, charges and terms and conditions of carriage applicable in respect of the transportation of disabled persons or services incidental thereto;

"(iv) the communication of information to disabled persons;

"(v) exemptions for specified persons, means of transportation, services or related facilities in premises from the application of regulations made under subclause (i), (ii), (iii) or (iv)."

Just again, in support of the deputation we had here, it's very clear that the provincial government has the authority to enact regulations as it relates to intercity buses and their accessibility for public transportation.

We know that the Premier is clearly on record that he would proceed with this and made that commitment, so we're just supporting the Premier's initiative on ensuring that people across Ontario have access to disabled transportation.

I think it's an essential basic right that people have mobility rights across the province of Ontario, especially when many small communities are serviced by the intercity bus industry and they have the right to intercity travel as much as anybody else.

This amendment ensures that the act enables fair, equitable and available mobility for all Ontarians and doesn't exclude any Ontarians who, because of a disability that may be beyond their control, don't have the same access to public transportation.

I think the Premier is right in supporting this proposal of accessibility in Ontario on intercity buses, and we support the Premier's initiative. I'm sure that he would support this amendment, as he has stated so, because I'm sure he doesn't want to resign.

Mr Len Wood: In support of this amendment that's brought forward by my good colleague Mr Colle, it's quite clear in the presentation that was made from the Transportation Action Now group that they were given a written response. Prior to his election as Premier, Mike Harris stated in a response to a written question from our organization that a Harris government would work to ensure that all new intercity buses purchased in Ontario are fully accessible.

He also pointed out on May 10 that he stands by his election promises and will resign if he fails to honour them. He promised persons with disabilities that all new intercity buses purchased in Ontario would be fully accessible.

Either Bill 39 will have to be amended with this section that's brought forward to reflect his campaign promise, or he should be prepared to do the honourable thing and resign.

I point out that in the conclusion by the presenters Transportation Action Now, they say:

"At present there is no mechanism for implementing the government's campaign promise on accessible intercity buses. Transportation Action Now respectfully requests that the government follow the lead of the federal government and establish a mechanism for ensuring not only safety but also accessibility."

I would go back to point out that it was a promise that was made by Mike Harris during the election campaign, and he repeated it again on May 10, that "he stands by his election promises and will resign if he fails to honour them. He promised persons with disabilities that all new intercity buses purchased in Ontario would be fully accessible."

I can't see any reason why anybody in this room would not be fully supportive of a position that Mike Harris, who is the Premier now, has taken during the election campaign and since the election campaign. We saw Sheila Copps make a promise, and she kept her promise. She's fighting it out now in a by-election in Hamilton. She said she would resign if she could not scrap the GST. Mike Harris has said that if he doesn't keep his promise to make buses fully accessible in Ontario, he will resign.

I wouldn't want to see the six or seven Tory members, people over here having to go up in the next couple of weeks and start campaigning for Mike Harris to get re-elected in a by-election in the riding of Nipissing. Of course, I would be up there campaigning against him. I would look for support from all three political parties and make sure that the Premier of Ontario, Mike Harris, does not have to resign over a broken promise if you vote against this amendment.

Mr DeFaria: This is an amendment that I have a great deal of sympathy for. The only problem I have, and maybe Ms Martel will be able to assist me, is that I assume this provision is not presently law in Ontario. There is no such provision presently in our laws?

Ms Martel: I'm going by what the group said to us, which Mr Colle repeated, that there was a provision around municipally operated transit services.

Mr DeFaria: But not intercity.

Ms Martel: Not for transit on line. I would assume charter is included in that as well.

Mr DeFaria: The reason I'm asking that is because both the NDP and the Liberal governments had been in power for so long in the province and had not chosen to bring it forward. Maybe the reason it had not been brought forward is because it would put Ontario operators in a disadvantaged position in comparison to other interprovincial — like Quebec — operators, because interprovincial are also intercity. Some of the intercity go from one province to the other, and provisions such as these would be very difficult to enforce when buses come from Quebec, for example.

Mr Len Wood: We're just saying, don't discriminate against the disabled.

Mr DeFaria: Right, but how would you be able to enforce the training of personnel —

Mr Colle: The Premier —

The Chair: Order. We've got a speaking order.

Mr DeFaria: — and tariffs and rates that are being imposed out of Quebec on people travelling from —

Mr Len Wood: We're simply saying, don't discriminate in Ontario against disabled people. That's all we're saying.

Mr DeFaria: You have specific provisions here. You have training of personnel, tariffs, rates, communication of information, signs. If an operator is coming from Montreal to Toronto, you would have difficulty in enforcing some of these provisions, and maybe that's why your governments didn't choose to legislate it.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): I would like to be on record as supportive of the issue that has been brought before us today. In fairness, we haven't had representation from other stakeholders who would have, I'm sure, something to say about this. I think we should be listening to all parties. This is a 10-year-old problem. I don't think somebody should be introducing it in this way, as a 15-minute, last-minute move. There is going to be an opportunity when further legislation with regard to deregulation is brought forward, and I think that would be the proper time to address it. I agree, and I am compassionate to the issue, but I think it should be handled in a way that is fair not only to the group that made representation requesting consideration of this point today but to those others involved who will have to make changes because of it. I hope we could consider it at the time we bring forward additional legislation. I don't think there's anybody sitting here at this table today — I haven't heard so yet, not one body — who said they didn't agree with the issue being dealt with. But I don't think 10 minutes — it wasn't even 10 minutes — the last thing that happened before we closed, before going into clause-by-clause, is the way to handle this. It's not a responsible way to make a decision on such a major issue.

Ms Martel: In response to both Ms Fisher and Mr DeFaria, someone on that side better explain to me why these weren't all concerns that Mike Harris had when he made the commitment in the first place during the election campaign to get the vote of the disabled. Let's face it, folks, you can't have a double standard, you can't be on both sides of this issue, and that's what you're trying to do right now.

Your leader, the man who is now Premier, had no trouble when he was out on the campaign trail, trying to get votes from people in the disabled community, saying this wasn't going to be a problem. He didn't raise it before the disabled community or send a letter back to their organization which said, "Jeez, we'd like to accommodate you, but we're really worried about having the opportunity to talk to other people, ie, the operators, to see if they can enforce it." He didn't say to them, "We'd like to have an opportunity to see if some of the provisions can be enforced and to determine if that's why the NDP didn't move on it."

No, I'm sorry; Mr Harris, during an election campaign, to try to get votes from the disabled, said, "A Harris government would work to ensure that all new intercity buses purchased in Ontario are fully accessible," period. There you have it. That's what the man said, and if it was good enough before the election to try to get votes from the disabled community, why isn't it good enough now?

Mrs Fisher: It still is.

Ms Martel: If it still is, then let's move the motion now. Obviously, Mr Harris wasn't concerned about all these things when he made the commitment. Mr Harris, in making the commitment, wanted to be sure that people who are disabled have equal access on intercity buses. That must be what he agreed to when he sent this letter back. He had to know what that meant. He had lots of research staff who could have looked into this. Of course he knew what it meant. I suspect that what he wanted to ensure was that there was no discrimination against disabled people in terms of having accessibility to buses in this province. We agree with that. That's why we're moving the amendment now. I really think the government members ought to be supporting this motion. It was sure good enough for him then in the election campaign; it should be good enough now.

Mr Carroll: I want to support what Ms Fisher said, that we agree it is an issue that does need to be dealt with.

It's interesting that the two parties opposite came forward with many amendments, some of which were on very small issues, yet on this particular big issue —

Mr Len Wood: Don't discriminate against the disabled in Ontario; that's all I'm saying.

Mr Carroll: — which they feel is so important now, they did not see fit to come forward with an amendment until the last second, scribbled out on a piece of paper, as a result of a presentation that was made. I think they're reacting to —

Mr Colle: On a point of privilege, Mr Chair: It wasn't our fault that the deputation was made this afternoon at this hour. We did not have an opportunity to set the timetable for deputations; It wasn't our doing. If we had had an opportunity of a couple of days — I think that is very unfair.

Mr Carroll: If the issue is what Mr Harris, the Premier, said during the election campaign, they should have known about that well before today and should have been making the appropriate amendment prior to now. I think it's opportunism on their part. It is something we should be dealing with in the future.

The Chair: Are there any more comments?

Ms Martel: They made all kinds of promises.

The Chair: Ms Martel, please, order. Could we stay on the topic at hand.

Mr Len Wood: With all due respect, the arguments that were given by Ms Fisher, Mr Carroll and Mr DeFaria don't make any sense. It's a simple matter of fact that these people made a presentation based on what Mike Harris told them during the election campaign. He put it in writing. He agreed that he would stop the discrimination against those people who were going to be riding the buses on the highways throughout Ontario. Now all of a sudden we hear the Tory members saying: "We're going to vote against this because we don't think Mike Harris meant that during the election campaign. We don't think we should help him to keep his promises, so we're going to vote against all in the disabled community who want to travel by bus in Ontario."

I'm quite prepared to go out in the by-election and help to make sure Mike Harris is known in his riding for the promises he made, and walking away from them, if he decides that he's going to keep his promise and resign, because this is what it's all about. It's an amendment that was brought forward based on a suggestion that was presented to us by the Transportation Action Now group. It was presented at the last part of the day.

There are all of the arguments asking, "Why didn't the Liberal or the NDP government do it in the 10 years prior to it?" I don't think you would see either the Liberals or the NDP vote against an amendment that would stop discrimination in the province of Ontario against the disabled and those people, aged or whatever, who want to travel the bus system in Ontario. You have the opportunity now to rectify a bad situation. Don't blame the NDP or the Liberals for not doing it. You have the opportunity now to rectify it based on what Mike Harris said — "I'll keep my promises or I will resign." He made a promise that the disabled community would not be discriminated against as far as the public busing system on the highways of Ontario was concerned.

I don't accept the argument that it might be more expensive if there's a bus from Manitoba or Quebec that comes in and wants to discriminate against them. They should be told very clearly, "Look, if you're going to pick up passengers in Ontario, you're going to pick up the disabled people as well as the healthy people or you don't come into the province." It's very simple. Stand up and support what your Premier has said. Don't vote against him and force him into a by-election.

Mr Ouellette: When we started this, we had a discussion that this bill had a very narrow focus in that it was designed to establish an interim regime prior to deregulation, that the intent was to have further legislation coming out. The MTO could not contemplate in the short term the amendment that has been brought forward. We have not consulted with the industry on this. Although, as I stated earlier, we intend to have further legislation come out, this has given the opportunity to review the industry, and so the industry also has the ability to review how it will impact them. At that time, we can expect to see some changes.

For those reasons, as we stated, we're looking at this legislation. That's why it's not in as of April 1, as was stated in one of the earlier presentations, so that all implications can be dealt with. For those reasons, I will be opposing this amendment.

Mrs Fisher: I would like to add one more thing to further support the reason why we should do this in a mature manner. In the presentation that was made to us today, there was a supplementary submission on behalf of the group that came before us. I would like to quote one part of it and why we need to be discussing that, not only with other stakeholders, by the way, but with the federal government. I want to quote from the report that was given to us today why we should be handling it in a proper way. It's section 6, page 6 of the supplementary submission on behalf of Transportation Action Now to our committee today.

"What followed was a 12-year period of waiting for provincial action. In 1991, the federal Minister of Transport asked the National Transportation Agency of Canada to carry out an inquiry into the accessibility of extra-provincial motor coach services in Canada. The agency reported in 1993 in The Road to Accessibility: An Inquiry into Canadian Motor Coach Services. The report recommended that a national standard of accessibility be established and that provinces delegate to the federal government authority over buses under their jurisdiction so that the agency might have a consolidated enforcement authority."

I happen to support that type of intent and I think we should be doing it in cooperation with the federal government. We can show leadership in this as a province that understands the need to take care of a problem that's been long outstanding, and I would urge us to do that. But I don't think by handling a motion today without that kind of consultation that's required to have that partnership between the two levels of authority — governments — we'd be acting in a responsible manner. That's why I will be voting against the motion today, but would be very pleased to look into this further in any capacity that I'm asked to on behalf of the government.

Mr Len Wood: I'm still puzzled. One year ago Mike Harris had no problem standing up at every microphone there was around and saying, "I promise this; I promise that." He promised that he would take action that would help out the disabled community in the province of Ontario; he promised it in writing. Now, a year later, you're saying, "We've got to take some time to look at this to see if we can pass the buck off on to the federal government." That's not acceptable. It's completely not acceptable that you would, a year later, after Mike Harris making those promises, say, "Can we not blame the Liberal government in Ottawa now for not helping out the disabled community in Ontario?"

You have the opportunity now to support Mike Harris in the promise that he made, "If I don't do something about the disabled people in this province as far as busing is concerned, I will resign." He said that; he put it in writing. Don't try to tell me that you have to wait for more time to study to see if you can find a way of passing off the buck on to the Ottawa government. That's completely not acceptable at all.

Mr Maves: On Monday this committee heard from an intercity bus operator who had tried to implement a fully accessible bus service in the Niagara area, yet when he went to the transport board for a licence he was denied, and after he had spent $200,000 on his application. After full deregulation, this gentleman would have been able to provide such accessible service for the disabled. In a sense, with this bill, which is hopefully leading us towards greater deregulation, this gentleman would have been able to have brought on line his business of accessible bus service. He would have to fulfil certain safety requirements, but under full deregulation that accessible service would be there. I think that's significant; it's a way to fulfil such promises. By deregulating, people can more easily bring on these services. That's an example that was heard right in front of this committee on Monday. In the current system, that ability is not there, so this bill is speaking to this issue.

Furthermore, Mr Colle said, "In fairness, we drafted this at the last minute because we just heard of it at the last minute." Clearly, in fairness then, to consider a motion like this you have to have an opportunity to see if the motion, as worded, is proper with ministry lawyers, and there are so many other ramifications that we must have time to consider. Let's look at this logically and quit the grandstanding. Obviously, we should not accept this motion at this point in time, having not had proper time to consider all of the ramifications and the legalities of it. I'll vote against that motion.

Ms Martel: There's no reason, before or after bus deregulation, that any operator should be restricted or feel that he or she can't make anything fully accessible. There's nothing in law or under the current structure that you're now trying to change which forbids or somehow restricts an operator from becoming fully accessible to people who are disabled. That's a ridiculous argument.

Secondly, folks, the Premier made a commitment well over 10 months ago, and it seems to me, since there are enough whiz kids working for this government, that someone, having looked at the Premier's promises, would have been busily working away figuring out exactly what he meant when he said what he said and how that was going to be implemented. To try and say now that we're sitting here at the last minute and dealing with something that no one has any idea about is also ridiculous.

I'm sorry, your Premier made the commitment. Surely when he made the commitment he understood what the consequences would be and what was going to be involved. Why would he make a commitment without having a clear understanding of that? To try and say, "We're going to vote against it because right now, at this hour, we don't know what all the implications are, even though our Premier made the commitment over 10 months ago, and to fulfil his promises we should be looking at what he said and how those things can be implemented," is just not an acceptable argument, not only to the members of this committee, but to the disabled community.

Finally, with respect to waiting for the feds and looking for a national standard, my goodness, if Ontario can't and doesn't want to lead in this regard, then there's something wrong. To say that we're going to wait and we're going to see what everyone else does and we'll spend two or three years fooling around studying it — look, the fact of the matter is it was a Conservative government in 1987, folks, that put this into place, and in 1993 we had an agreement. There's no reason now why we shouldn't be carrying through on that.

The legislation is open now. It's sitting in the hands of your government. Your Premier, when he was out on the campaign trail, thought it was good enough to campaign on, thought it was good enough to make a commitment on with respect to the disabled community. We're asking you today to live up to that commitment on behalf of those folks, and I think you should want to do that.

Mr Len Wood: It frustrates me a little bit to hear some of the arguments out there, because we hear comments that somebody has to spend $200,000 to get permission to take disabled people on the bus. We have buses from the airport, coming into town, going all over the over place.

All we're saying in simple terms is that you have an opportunity now to show the disabled community or the aging community that they are part of society, that if they want to ride a bus on Highway 11, Highway 16 or 69 or whatever the highways are throughout this province, Mike Harris is going to keep his promise and see that they will not be discriminated against any more; they will be allowed to go on these buses. There might be the odd time that the bus with 47 or 50 passengers is going to be able to take only two people in wheelchairs or whatever, but that's understandable. Even the people who are sitting in wheelchairs understand that there's only room for so many of them on a specific bus.

Don't let your Premier down and say we're going to leave these people sitting on the side of the road and they're going to have to spend money out of their pocket to get taxis or whatever, when we have buses going right by there and we have an opportunity now to include this in Bill 39, which is part of the complete deregulation of the bus industry somewhere down the road. It can send a message out loud and clear that the disabled community will be looked after in this province, that Mike Harris wants to do it.

Why do we have the arguments from so many Conservatives that they're not going to do it, they're going to vote against it? I haven't heard a single good reason yet why they would vote against it, knowing that 10 or 11 months ago Mike Harris made that promise and he put it in writing to the group Transportation Action Now. It doesn't make any sense that we would still sit here arguing about whether you should support Mike Harris in his bid or force him into a by-election. I'm sure that when the media get wind of this they're going to be hounding him all over the place.

I was in North Bay last Thursday. They don't think very much of him in his own town. Now if you get this coming out, another broken promise, allowing the continued discrimination against the disabled community by not agreeing to an amendment of this kind, it doesn't make any sense to me. I can't understand it.

Mr DeFaria: Just to clear the record, I think the arguments made on the other side minimize the commitment we made. The commitment we made says, "A Harris government would work to ensure that all new intercity buses purchased within Ontario are fully accessible." Can you tell me, Mr Chair, what that has to do with the posting of signs, which this amendment deals with? It has nothing to do with the commitment.

The commitment is buses purchased within Ontario, that we'd work to ensure that those buses are fully accessible; nothing to do with the posting of signs and other things that this amendment deals with. By putting the two side by side, you're minimizing our commitment made to the disabled community in Ontario.

Mr Colle: Mr Chair, that is an incredible comment. In the disabled community, it's critical to have proper signage. I don't know if you've ever seen signage saying there are ramps available, there is access available. Signage is part and parcel of accessible transportation.

They have the right to know where the access points are. You can't have accessible service without proper direction and the signs are a critical component and a minor component.

The final thing I'll say is that the way this process works is that we had deputations come in today until 5:30; we have scheduled it up to 6 o'clock. It was possible that other deputants would have had some meaningful amendments to make. I think the Chair was reasonable in accepting the fact that these people had legitimate points to make, and there were even a couple of other suggested amendments made by a couple of other deputants that I thought would have been worthwhile to look at.

It wasn't by our design that this came up at the last minute. I think either you say, "Don't bother coming and making deputations," the day that you go to clause-by-clause or you enable them to. We obviously try to accommodate people who make meaningful suggestions. Those people who came today, the last day, have the right to suggest amendments and we're giving them that opportunity. It's not a matter of anything more than that this amendment was brought forward and it had some relevance to our debate here, and I think it's part of the debate. The timing of it is none of our doing or none of the deputants' doing. This is the way the process works here in terms of the time constraints. We don't want to start restricting people.

Mr Duncan: Just to that, we advocated a subcommittee for a longer period of time. Your government, as has been consistent, has insisted on just giving you your marching orders and sending you in here. What has happened is we're here to listen to these delegations, and you know what? You have a chance to right a wrong; you have a chance right now to do exactly what you said you would do. To suggest somehow that we ought to just come in here, listen to deputants, do our clause-by-clause and walk away, to me just undermines the principle of why we're here.

If you want to have clause-by-clause on this section next week, we'll be happy to. We advocated for a longer period of time. We advocated that we travel the province, because we are interested in hearing what people have to say and we're prepared to respond to them. I think you have an opportunity here to adopt a commonsense amendment to the bill which recognizes what municipal authorities and other authorities have done and to do it in a timely fashion. I think you are passing up an opportunity to put the interests of those who require accessibility ahead of whoever else you're representing here today.

Mrs Fisher: I would like to say just a couple of things and then I hope that we will stop reiterating points, but I would like to introduce a new point here.

What some of the members on this side have indicated, those who have spoken so far, and I haven't yet heard any murmurs that there is any dissension with regard to that issue, is that we are more than willing to look at it, and I don't think we should leave the room tonight being portrayed that we're not going to deal with it. We will deal with it. But it's rather ironical that somebody who sits on the other side and continues to say, "You ram it through, you ram it through, you ram it through," all of a sudden wants it rammed through.

There is an ability to deal with this in the near future in a responsible way. I can assure you that this will be raised through our committee and our caucus representatives to this committee with the responsible minister, and I'm sure that some action will be undertaken to deal with the problem.

I can only say one thing. Being a new member here and looking over the history of the presentation that was made today, anybody who is left in the room who was part of that delegation, and there is at least one party still here — I don't think that person would want to leave the room thinking this government is not looking to take action on this. Some of the opinions I'm hearing on the other side suggest that might be the case. I think we'll live up to a commitment to deal with the issue and take it to committee and take it back to our minister and express the concerns that were raised today. We have an opportunity to deal with it, we will deal with it, but I think we ought to do it in a responsible manner.

Mr Duncan: I certainly concur and I move a one-week deferral of consideration of this amendment.

The Chair: The motion is out of order. There's a motion on the floor right now.

Mr Len Wood: On the issue, there's nothing that's happened here on the spur of the moment, there's nothing that is being rammed down anybody's throat. We're talking about a lot of thought that went into building up Mike Harris to make that promise 10 months ago. I'm sure he thought about that in all the Common Sense Revolution booklets that he was making. There were a number of editions of them. Then he finally came to the point that it doesn't make any sense to allow the bus industry to drive right by disabled people in this province. "I will change that," or "If I don't change it, I will resign."

There's nothing that's happened here on the spur of the moment. A lot of thought has gone into the decision-making leading up to making sure that the disabled community is not being discriminated against in this province, and I don't accept the argument that somebody is trying to ram something down somebody's throat. Mike Harris spoke it. He put it in writing 10 months ago. He had probably thought about it for a couple of years before he did it, so you're talking about a long process here.

Now all of a sudden we have the Tory caucus sitting on the other side saying: "Something happened here on the spur of the moment. The disabled community came in and made a presentation under Transportation Action Now. They want an amendment and the Liberals and the NDP are supporting it. We can't support it, even though we campaigned on it, we talked about it during the election campaign. Mike Harris made a promise on it, but we're not going to support the disabled community. We're going to push them out through the door and we'll tell them, 'Somewhere down the road, trust us.'"

The welfare people, the women, the children are still saying, "We trusted Mike Harris; we trusted them that they wouldn't make us starve in this province."

There are a lot of things that you have been able to do over the last year, and now it's very simple that we're saying, stand up and be counted. I made comments in the Legislature. I get concerned when people act like what happened in Jonestown. They all say: "We've got to follow the leader. Exactly what the leader says, we're going to follow." Now you have an opportunity to follow what your leader says — and you won't die as a result of it. Support him, support us. He's saying the same thing as we're saying. We're saying, "Support it; don't leave the disabled community dangling out there that somewhere down the road we'll take a look at it." It doesn't make any sense at all.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I'll put the question.

All those in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Mr Len Wood: Recorded vote.

Mr Duncan: Recorded vote.

The Chair: The vote has been called. Sorry, it takes unanimous consent. I'll ask the question. Is there unanimous consent for a recorded vote? I'm supposed to hear yes or no.

Mr Duncan: What are you afraid of?

Interjection.

The Chair: Once I've put the question, Mr Wood. The clerk is telling me yes. Once the vote has started — your hands were already up.

All those opposed? I declare the motion failed.

Mr Duncan: I move deferral of clause-by-clause consideration until next week for the purpose of reconsidering this matter.

The Chair: That motion is not, strictly speaking, in order, but with unanimous consent we could defer further debate on that section. Is there unanimous consent to defer? No. Sorry.

I'll therefore put the question on section 24 itself.

Mr Duncan: I'd like a recorded vote on this as well.

The Chair: Very good.

Ayes

Boushy, Carroll, DeFaria, Fisher, Maves, Ouellette, Tascona.

Nays

Colle, Duncan, Lalonde, Martel, Len Wood.

The Chair: I declare that section carried.

Seeing no amendments, I ask if there are any comments, questions or suggestions for sections 25 through 40. Seeing none, I'll put the question.

All those in favour that sections 25 through 40 carry? Opposed? Sections 25 through 40 carry.

Shall section 41, the short title of the bill, carry? All those in favour? Those opposed? Section 41 is carried.

Shall the long title of the bill carry? All those in favour? Contrary? The long title of the bill carries.

Shall Bill 39 carry? Those opposed? Bill 39 carries.

Shall Bill 39 be reported to the House? All those in favour? Contrary? Bill 39 shall be reported back to the House.

Thank you, committee members. This committee stands adjourned.

The committee adjourned at 2011.

DES NORMES D'EMPLOI

Consideration of Bill 49, An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act / Projet de loi 49, Loi visant à améliorer la Loi sur les normes d'emploi.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Good morning. This is the first day of hearings on Bill 49. The first order of business this morning will be the report of the subcommittee on committee business. I believe every member has a copy in front of them. I'd ask someone to move the adoption of the subcommittee report. Mr O'Toole. Any comments? Additions? Seeing none, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the subcommittee report being adopted? Contrary? That motion carries.

We'll start the proceedings this morning with a 20-minute statement by the minister and then 20-minute responses by each of the two opposition parties. Good morning, minister.

MINISTER OF LABOUR

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Minister of Labour): Thank you very much, Mr Chair, members of the committee. I'm pleased to be here this morning at the opening of public hearings into Bill 49. Our goal is legislation that makes the act's administration and enforcement more efficient and cost-effective, makes it more relevant —

The Chair: Excuse me. I must direct all those people in the room that the same rules about using props apply here that apply in the House. I'm going to ask you once only to please take your posters down and refrain from using them again or leave the room. Mr Clerk, would you take the appropriate steps to have those people removed from the room.

Sorry for the interruption, Minister. Please proceed.

Hon Mrs Witmer: As I indicated, our goal is legislation that's going to make the act's administration and enforcement more efficient and cost-effective. It's going to make it more relevant to today's workplace, it's going to encourage self-reliance and it's actually going to focus the ministry's resources on Ontario's most vulnerable workers.

Bill 49 will be followed by a complete review of the Employment Standards Act this fall in order to address the dramatic changes we are seeing in the nature of the labour market and the workplace. It is critical that our employment regulations be responsive to these changes as we endeavour to provide appropriate protection for employees.

Some of the key labour market changes that we are seeing are:

The dramatic growth of computer-based technological change.

The decline in the share of employment accounted for by the traditional manufacturing industries, accompanied by the growth of the service sector.

Changes in the distribution of the patterns of work time.

Non-standard employment arrangements of all types are becoming more prevalent, and about one third of all workers are now in these jobs. This includes home workers, part-time workers and other temporary employment relationships.

We are seeing changes in the composition of the labour force, as we see the growth in the percentage of families with both parents working outside of the home and an aging workforce.

We are also seeing the globalization of competition, resulting in the need for business to ensure that productivity in the workplace is maximized.

We must ensure that our act is relevant to the changing workplace and meets the needs of employers and employees. We also need to make sure that we administer the act efficiently and effectively to provide the best value for the taxpayers.

What I envision emerging from our work to reform the act is an Ontario with workplaces where the rights and responsibilities of employees and employers are balanced, fair and easily understood by both parties, and support the growth of the economy upon which, ultimately, the wellbeing of the worker depends.

To achieve these outcomes, we need to ensure that employees have the protection they need while balancing their rights and responsibilities; encourage self-reliance by the workplace parties; enhance flexibility; help the workplace parties comply with the law by making it easier to understand and apply; and ensure effective enforcement.

We also need to eliminate unnecessary regulation. The Carr-Gordon report to the government's Red Tape Review Commission recently concluded that many employers, especially those that are small and medium businesses, see Ministry of Labour laws and regulations as an obstacle to growth and job creation. This reflects the fact that Ontario's approach to workplace regulation has not kept pace with the massive changes in the labour market that we have seen in the past 15 to 20 years.

In the case of the Employment Standards Act, as amendments have continued to be added, the act has become increasingly complex and very confusing for employers and employees. Patching up here and there, as previous governments have done since 1974, will no longer suffice. We need a full-scale, comprehensive debate about what type of Employment Standards Act will best serve the people of this province into the next century. Who should be covered and what standards should we have are two of the questions we need to answer. So we are going forward. Bill 49 is the first step, and then the full review and the release of a discussion paper in the fall.

Let us take a look at Bill 49. Bill 49 is primarily about improving the administration and enforcement of the act. It will also help us focus our resources where they are most needed; that is, to help the most vulnerable. The changes will result in fewer complaints, reduced duplication and increased flexibility in the resolution of complaints, and will promote self-reliance for the workplace parties to resolve their disputes. I believe that when people resolve their own differences and find solutions, they are more inclined to make the outcome work, and people will have a chance to do that.

One of the key elements of Bill 49 is our proposal to replace the current two-year limitation period for filing a claim with a six-month limitation. This new period is in line with other provinces such as Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. In fact, almost 90% of claims today are already filed within six months. Change is necessary, because it is difficult to investigate claims that are brought forward long after the alleged violations occurred. Evidence is more difficult to obtain, witnesses become more unreliable and the effort expended to resolve these cases is out of proportion to the benefits received by the claimants in the end. Filing a claim within six months will result in speedier resolution of complaints and allow employees to receive the money owed to them more quickly. It will also improve compliance, since in many situations employers do not know that they are violating the act.

Bill 49 will also place a $10,000 ceiling on the value of orders that can be issued by an employment standards officer on behalf of an individual claimant. Employees who wish to make a claim for more than $10,000 will now be required to do so through the courts. However, this provision would not prevent them from pursuing claims for more than $10,000 through the employment standards branch, although the order would only be issued for up to $10,000. The bill does make an exception for large claims that arise out of violations where reinstatement is a remedy, since the courts will not usually provide for reinstatement.

Employees can be reinstated for violations of such standards as pregnancy and parental leave or the right to refuse Sunday work in the retail industry. Since the courts are reluctant to grant reinstatement, I believe it is important to allow such cases to continue to be pursued through the employment standards program.

I would remind committee members that until 1991 there was a $4,000 cap on claims, excluding termination and severance pay. I also think you need to know that the percentage of individual claims that exceed $10,000 is about 4% and usually involves individuals in executive positions. Unfortunately, removal of the limit on claim in 1991 had the effect of encouraging employees with large claims to file a complaint with the ministry as well as pursuing civil action. This is an unnecessary duplication of effort and waste of taxpayer money. Moreover, the 4% of the individual cases above the $10,000 limit have taken up a disproportionate amount of the ministry resources because they are often very complex. We believe our resources should be devoted to helping those with smaller claims where an alternative remedy is not practical.

Another key feature of the bill is that employees will have to decide at the outset whether they wish to file an employment standards claim or take the matter to court. There will be a two-week grace period for all applicants to obtain legal advice and consider their options. In the past an employee may have tried to address a claim through both the ministry and the courts at the same time or in consecutive fashion. This meant that the taxpayers paid twice for these costly processes. This is consistent with other provinces where employees must also choose whether to pursue claims through the government process or the courts. Although the legislation enables us to set a minimum claim amount, I want to stress that we have no plans to do so.

Another key change involves giving our employment standards officers the power to mediate and resolve complaints upon the mutual agreement of the parties before conducting a time-consuming full-scale investigation. The authority to settle complaints at the outset is going to expedite dispute resolution and it's going to reduce costs and help the parties establish a stronger employment relationship and encourage self-reliance.

Bill 49 is also going to lengthen the period in which claimants or employers can appeal decisions on employment standards claims from 15 to 45 days. Both parties will benefit from the longer period of time to consult with legal counsel to consider whether an appeal is warranted. We get many requests presently for additional time.

We are also clarifying certain limitation periods to ensure greater certainty for employers and employees and to enhance compliance.

To eliminate the confusion associated with launching a proceeding or a prosecution under the ESA, the act will be changed to specify clearly that an employment standards officer must issue or refuse to issue an order to an employer to pay within two years of complaint. Where an investigation of a claim brings to light the violations affecting employees other than the complainant, an officer will be able to issue an order up to two years after these other violations are discovered.

We're also clarifying the need for launching a prosecution. The two-year time limit will remain.

Finally, we are ensuring that as a result of a successful prosecution a court can order the payment of money owed to an employee even if the time limitation has expired by the time the decision is made.

Bill 49 also clarifies employer rights under the pregnancy and parental leave provisions. The intent of these provisions was to ensure that any entitlement based upon length of service, such as vacation, termination and severance, would continue to accrue during pregnancy and parental leave. However, based upon the wording in the current act, adjudicators have interpreted these sections more narrowly. We want to make sure these provisions read as they are intended to, and this is going to reduce claims and litigation in this area.

In addition, the bill will change the act so that the parties to a collective agreement will be expected to manage the resolution of all of their disputes in the same manner; that is, they will be asked to resolve disputes through the grievance procedure set out in their collective agreement. Most employment standards complaints in unionized workplaces today already use that method. That is going to allow the ministry staff to devote more time to dealing with claims that are made by non-union employees who do not have access to formal grievance procedures and will help us provide better and faster service.

We are also proposing to utilize private collection agencies to recover money owed to employees by employers. This is a very time-consuming and expensive service which can be better provided through the specialized services available in the private sector. This will result in employees receiving money owed to them more often and more quickly. Currently, about two thirds of orders to pay are never collected. We expect that the more rigorous collection of orders will put more money into the hands of workers and result in increased employer compliance with the act and the orders to pay.

What this will do is allow our employment standards officers to concentrate on the work of enforcement. Unfortunately, since 1993, when the previous government disbanded the ministry's collection unit and discharged 10 employees, our ESOs have been expected to add collections to their workload.

We are also making a number of changes to modernize the system to provide for better enforcement of standards. Employees will be able to file their complaints with us by fax, investigating officers will have access to electronic records and the ministry will be able to serve notice on the parties by any form of verified delivery.

Other Bill 49 amendments clean up language in the act, simplifying some sections and making it easier to understand.

Lastly, members will recall that Bill 49 includes a provision intended to increase the flexibility of unions and management to negotiate certain employment standards as part of their collective agreements. We believe that freely negotiated terms and conditions of employment not only reflect the needs of the changing workplace and employer-employee relationship but that they encourage greater compliance with the act. Our proposal would therefore allow the workplace parties to negotiate a package of standards for hours of work, overtime pay, paid vacation, public holidays and severance pay so long as the overall package exceeds the standards set by the act.

We remain committed to providing this flexibility to the workplace parties and we have been asked for that flexibility. However, given that we are going to have a fuller discussion about the framework of employment standards during the upcoming fall review of the act, we believe this provision should be considered in the context of the future discussions and I am proposing to move that provision out of Bill 49 and into the comprehensive review.

That concludes my presentation on the content of Bill 49. However, I want to make a few comments regarding some of the criticism that I know is going to be levelled within the next few weeks. First of all, I want you to know that I agree with many of the problems that have been identified by the critics of the Employment Standards Act. They are not new problems. They have lingered without the attention of previous governments for years.

This government has decided that we are going to attempt a complete review of the act and we are going to change that. In fact, we have been vigorously dealing with the backlog, and I want you to know that the backlog is the smallest it has been in five years. Last year we had a backlog of 4,000. This year our backlog is down to 2,600.

We are concerned about employment standards. We are concerned about protection. We know the legislation is out of date; we know it cannot be properly enforced; we know it's been that way for years. As I said before, previous governments have not attempted to make any changes. They have simply amended it. They've made it more complex. We want to change that.

Unfortunately, the Employment Standards Act has stood still while the workforce and work itself have changed dramatically. That's why the act does not provide adequate protection for some emerging jobs, such as telemarketing, and the changing structure of work in the garment industry. The comprehensive review of the act that we are proposing to do is going to address those problems.

The purpose of the Employment Standards Act is to establish appropriate minimum standards for vulnerable employees and I intend to do exactly that. I intend to do it in a meaningful and an understandable way, and I'm going to do it in consultation with the employers, the employees and the trade unions.

This bill does not take minimum standards away from vulnerable employees. On the contrary, what Bill 49 is going to do is to allow for more effective enforcement and it's going to help us to focus our resources where they can be most helpful. So we, for the first time since 1974, are going to address the problems that the critics of the Employment Standards Act have identified for years. This is an opportunity for all of the critics to work with us, help us to understand how we can make the act better, how we can ensure that we have the basic protection that is necessary for employees and who should be covered by the act.

I welcome your input now on Bill 49. I look forward to your input as we review the entire act. When we are finished, Ontario's employers and employees will have an act which balances the rights and responsibilities of the workplace parties and which much better protects Ontario's most vulnerable employees. It will be an act that responds to the changing labour market, the changing workplace and employee-employer relationship. Ultimately, it is going to contribute to the economic growth of our province and mean more jobs for our people.

I look forward to your deliberations. I look forward to your constructive advice in order to help us make the act better and I thank you for your participation in the public hearings.

The Chair: Thank you, Minister.

Interruption.

The Chair: Sir, you're out of order.

Interruption.

The Chair: Take your seat, please, sir.

Interruption.

The Chair: Take your seat or leave the room, please, sir. Clerk, would you please direct security to remove the person. Mr Duncan.

Interruption.

The Chair: Sir, there was an advertisement —

Interruption.

The Chair: The sort of disrespect you're showing today, sir, certainly won't further your case.

Mr Duncan, 20 minutes for the official opposition.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): We in the official opposition welcome the opportunity to discuss the Employment Standards Act and discuss the reform of the Employment Standards Act. We believe, and I said in the House and a number of my colleagues have said, that the Employment Standards Act indeed merits a full and thorough review, both in terms of workplace conditions as well as recognizing the broad changes that are sweeping through the economy today.

The history of the Employment Standards Act in this province goes back well before the early 1970s to the mid-1930s, when it was introduced and originally designed to keep unions out of Ontario and to provide an opportunity for governments to hamper the efforts of the unorganized to organize themselves and those who were vulnerable in workplaces to be protected.

When the minister speaks of reform and suggests to us that the government's intention is to protect vulnerable workers, I don't think we should be surprised when people come to hearings and speak publicly in communities that they're angry and they don't believe it. The facts belie the minister's undertakings.

First, this bill is a major piece of legislation whose first priority, I think, is to implement the cuts in funding that the government has taken to the employment practices branch of the ministry. The minister did not mention in her remarks that her government has cut the money available for enforcement by 26.6%, or $16 million. The minister did not note that the number of officers available to enforce the act has been reduced by 45. We are all cognizant of the backlogs and the difficulty government has in enforcing statutes like the Employment Standards Act.

For a government that is intent on public hearings and public consultations, I guess in light of your record, Minister — Bill 7 I remember vividly. A huge statute that amended every aspect of labour-employer relationships in this province was passed and became law without public hearings, without discussion to even look at the broad number of amendments your government brought forward at the last minute. I submit that this government has created a climate of labour market instability, one which ultimately will cost not only those vulnerable workers whom you have abandoned but the employer community through days lost to strikes, to work actions, to less productivity and less efficient workplaces.

I submit that if the government was serious in its approach to amendments to the Employment Standards Act — the minister suggests on the one hand that we've had an ad hoc approach over the past 23 years. I would submit if it was the minister's intention to deal systematically with the act, she would not bring forward her changes in a piecemeal fashion. I would submit, as my colleagues opposite have said, that if we were intent on looking at modern workplaces and adopting our workplace protection legislation to reflect modern reality and also do it recognizing the financial constraints that any government would be placed under, we would be doing it all at once. We would be dealing with the real issues.

One of the reasons the Employment Standards Act hasn't been amended in a systematic and comprehensive fashion, quite frankly, is that the statute touches on more workplaces and employees than any other piece of legislation that we will deal with. Historically, the minister will be aware, both employers and workers get very nervous indeed whenever you put this statute on the table for discussion. That is not to suggest for one minute that we ought not to, because I concur with the minister that we ought to be paying a lot of attention to this statute today. But I would submit that if the government were serious in its approach to reforming how we protect workers in this province and how we enforce minimum standards and how we cope with employment practices in this province, the government would have held a royal commission on the Employment Standards Act prior to bringing forward legislation. They would have done their full discussion paper prior to cutting $16 million from the budget of the employment practices branch of the ministry.

I would submit further that the reality of the amendments contained in Bill 49 belie the minister's statement that this is not an assault on the minimum standards that employees in this province have enjoyed. The minister argues that the changes in some of what she would term more administrative issues to provide better enforcement really don't affect 90%. The problem, Minister, is that the Employment Standards Act is present to protect the 10%.

All of us in this room, I think, would acknowledge that the vast majority of employers in this province are good employers and all of us would acknowledge that the intent of government or the intent of an Employment Standards Act ought not be to penalize employers. But we also acknowledge and we have seen as recently as this spring, literally a week before you introduced your bill, that sweatshops still exist and people feel vulnerable.

I would submit, Minister, that this legislation puts the province on the slippery slope to a right-to-work jurisdiction. That doesn't surprise me, because the minister's actions to date and the statements of her colleagues in the House indicate unequivocally that that wouldn't be such a bad thing from their perspective.

When you provide an opportunity in a collective bargaining situation for certain minimum standards to be bargained away, as you have done in this legislation, in exchange for some undefined, comprehensive minimum standard, what you do is set up a condition whereby if ABC widget manufacturer that's unionized negotiates an agreement like that here, then XYZ widget manufacturer, who's not organized, will want the same flexibility. I would submit that this type of approach is wrong and that in fact the bill and the government's agenda with respect to employment standards have a lot more to do with saving money than protecting workers. The government's approach has not been balanced and has not been fair, I say with respect to the minister.

If the government were being balanced and attempting to be fair, we would have a comprehensive review of the statute now. We wouldn't be dealing with it in an ad hoc fashion as the minister is doing. The minister takes great pride in saying, "We're going to deal with it," and criticizing previous governments for dealing with the statute in an ad hoc fashion, and yet her first move in the area of employment standards is to bring in ad hoc amendments to the legislation.

We regret the course that the government has taken on this bill because it's going to further poison the ability to have a discussion around modernizing employment standards. We won't be able to discuss, I think, down the road issues around corporate responsibility. We won't be able to discuss, without the poison that's been put into this climate, the difficulties that both employers and employees have in the modern economy.

We would welcome a full-scale, comprehensive debate. We would like to talk about the statute in terms of its entirety, but we believe the government is continuing to pursue an agenda that is unbalanced and unfair and does not address the needs of all workplace parties. It is our view that the labour market instability that's been created by this government, first through Bill 7, through its WCB reforms, through its proposals with respect to occupational health and safety, will be further enhanced by this legislation.

While we recognize Ontario's place in a global economy, we don't believe Ontario ought to be a lowest-common-denominator province. We believe Ontario should lead. We believe our competitive advantages are in areas of high technology with a highly skilled, highly trained workforce, and we also believe that Ontario ought to be better than other jurisdictions. We ought to afford protections that aren't available in other jurisdictions. We believe the productivity gains that we've seen in our workforce in the last 15 years ought to be recognized with better wages and better protection for the most vulnerable.

We think the government's approach on employment standards looks backwards, shows no vision and is designed not to protect workers, not to provide more efficient enforcement of minimum standards, but rather to save money. That's not a bad thing in and of itself. I don't think anybody in this room would disagree, if we can do more for less, that we ought to, but we think that those savings and where we make our choices and where we set our priorities speak volumes about what the real intention is, both in this legislation and in other statutes and other initiatives the government has undertaken.

So we too welcome the opportunity to listen to what the people here and across the province have said. I have had the opportunity to meet with, as the minister and the critic for the third party have said, literally hundreds of people in the course of the last few months, and we welcome the opportunity to hear what people have to say, employers and employees.

I say to the minister, we would welcome and we would support her if she withdrew this bill and took its most controversial provisions and put it into the full discussion of the Employment Standards Act, which is going to start in four months in any event. But we know that this bill is not about protecting workers and about efficiencies.

Interjection.

Mr Duncan: Are you agreeing to it?

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): She did. Didn't you listen to her opening remarks?

Mr Duncan: You're prepared to withdraw the bill and —

Interjection.

Mr Duncan: I would like you to withdraw the bill and put it all into one set of hearings and discussions and we could proceed. But the government's agenda here has nothing to do with employment standards. It has nothing to do with protecting injured workers. It has everything to do with cutting and with implementing the budget cuts that they talked about.

To conclude, while we would like to find a way to do more with less and we're prepared to listen to ideas that people have around enforcement, we don't think you begin by stripping minimum rights from vulnerable workers.

We look forward to the discussions that are going to go on over the next four weeks and we look forward to the minister joining us in those discussions as we travel Ontario.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Duncan. We'll now have 20 minutes from the third party.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): The Employment Standards Act in the province of Ontario is very much the only real workers' bill of rights that exists, and Bill 49, entitled the Employment Standards Improvement Act, is an insult to the workers of this province and an insult to the bill of rights that they now have.

This government brought forward a bill into the House, having met with Ontario labour leaders, and said: "These are minor changes. They are of a housekeeping nature only. There's nothing here that anyone should be concerned about." Many of Ontario's labour leaders went off to a national labour conference. When the bill was dropped on the floor of the House, we saw very clearly that there were major changes here, that many rights that workers now have — there's no improvement here. These are rights that are being taken away from workers and it was very clear in the legislation.

The only reason we're having these hearings is because the New Democrats stood up and said, "You're not going to get away with taking away these rights without at least giving the people of Ontario an opportunity to be heard."

That's the only reason we're here today and everybody knows it.

I would say to you that given the fact that you're pulling back one of the more controversial issues, which is the flexible standards, you're already starting to cave in because you have no credibility on this issue. You said this was minor housekeeping and you've already said, "There's one in here that's so controversial, we're going to pull it back." We're going to suggest to you over the course of the next four weeks that there are a lot of changes in here that are major in nature and take away major rights, and this is only the beginning.

You've already said that you want to take a year to look at a major overhaul of the Employment Standards Act. Then why on earth would you bring forward a document, having told people these are minor changes, and say that you're going to take another year to look at the rest of the bill?

There's only one reason for that. You need to make these changes so that you can lay off the people in the Ministry of Labour who are necessary for you to reach your target figures for fiscal reduction, to slash the budget of the Ministry of Labour. The way you do that is by making sure there aren't rights to be enforced. If you take away the rights in the law that need to be enforced, you don't need as many people to enforce them. So you can lay those workers off, lay off those enforcement officers. That's how you're going to save your money. You're going to save money, as you have in every ministry in this government, on the backs of the most vulnerable people in our society, and this is no different.

We've said from the beginning that every time you suggest a change to labour laws in this province, you need at the very least to have public hearings. Minister, you talk about the fact that your government cares about workers and you care about injured workers and you care about what people have to say and you care about listening. Where were you listening on Bill 7?

Bill 7 went well beyond the mandate that you ran on. I grant you, you ran on a platform of revoking Bill 40, and when you brought in Bill 7, it went well beyond that. You took away and changed measures in that law that you did not talk about in the election campaign. They're not contained in the Common Sense Revolution. You tabled that document and you rammed it through the House without one day of hearings. Then you have the gall to say to the people of Ontario that you care about what they have to say about things.

It's an insult, Minister. It's an insult when you take a look at your track record. On top of Bill 7, we've already had Bill 15, where you took away workers' rights to have an equal say on the running of the Workers' Compensation Board. You've already done that. We've got Cam Jackson's report floating around, which is an attack on benefits to injured workers, when you ran on a platform of saying you would never do anything to hurt injured Ontarians; disabled Ontarians need not fear this government. Yet your intent on WCB reform is clearly to take away benefits and rights that injured workers deserve. That's your agenda. You've already killed the Workplace Health and Safety Agency; again, a proven entity that gave results and gave workers an equal say in planning and training around occupational workplace health and safety. You've killed it.

You've slashed the minimum training necessary for members of joint health and safety committees. People are active in plants and offices. You've already slashed the minimum required time for training there.

You're gutting your own ministry. There's not a chance in hell that you can take out the kind of money that you're going to take out of this ministry and lay off the number of workers in that ministry without affecting the ability of the most vulnerable workers in Ontario to have their rights protected.

You've stated that you're going to open up the Occupational Health and Safety Act. Nobody believes that you're going in there to make that better for workers. Oh, you'll probably put a title on it, as you did this. You'll probably say, "An improvement to the Occupational Health and Safety Act." More Orwellian doublespeak. And then inside the bill you'll take away one right after another right after another right, and when you add it up, this government has a track record that's there to be seen.

It's not rhetoric. Go look at the record. You have set out to change the balance of power in this province from one of saying that there needs to be fairness and balance, to one of saying, "Workers and their powerful unions have far too much power and we've got to take some of that away and give it back to the employers because that's how we're going to be competitive with Mexico and other Third World nations." That's what your vision and future of this province is all about. This bill is a part of that. But it's only the beginning.

We know that when you take away the shorter complaint period — you can throw all the stuff you want, Minister, on the floor as to why you're doing it, but the reality is there is no improvement in saying to workers: "You no longer have two years to file a claim. You only have six months." Even the Tories can't twist that enough to make it sound like an improvement.

You're lowering the maximum claim available from one right now that says, "Whatever you're owed, you're legally and legitimately entitled to go after, and our ministry will ensure that those rights that you have to go after that money are in place." You've said now there's a cap of $10,000. How on earth do you expect any worker to believe that this somehow benefits them? Before you had this bill, they could go for whatever they were owed. Now they can only go for $10,000. No matter what the circumstance, they can only go for $10,000. How is that an improvement?

Oh, you're going to talk about exceptions and I can hear John Baird, the wheels turning in his head already. All these arguments are going to come out. But the fact of the matter is, if you cared so much about making sure workers could collect that money, you wouldn't bring in the cap in the first place. You must think the people of Ontario are stupid, and that's what's so insulting, Minister, that you don't even have the decency to say, "Yes, we're going to slash the benefits and rights that workers have because we think that's the best way to go to help our business friends and because that's the vision we have of Ontario." At least then you'd be upfront and honest about what you're doing.

You're now going to bring in a minimum claim. In the bill you said there will be the allowance, enabling legislation to allow your cabinet to bring in a minimum level that one can go after. We don't know what that is right now. Unless you're prepared to tell us today what that is, we don't know. Quite frankly, whatever it is that you announce when the spotlight is on can be changed through another decision of cabinet at the very next cabinet meeting. So the fact is, you've decided that at some point, whether it's $250 or $150, those amounts aren't important enough for workers to have the right to go after. There can be no other explanation. You've decided that's not important. Well, that kind of money may not matter much to you and a lot of your very rich and powerful friends, but that means an awful lot to the most vulnerable people in our society. You remember them — the poor people, the working poor, the ones who are paying the price for your 30% tax cut, because people making $250,000 a year aren't paying for your tax cut.

You haven't done anything to the people who already have in this province. There's no fairness in this agenda. It's all about taking from those who don't have and giving to those who already have. It is that simple. It's not that different from what Ralph Klein is doing out in the west; it's not that different from what Newt Gingrich and Bob Dole are talking about in the States. This must have been a big week for you, listening to all that hard, right-wing nonsense coming out of the States. All of you must have been huddled around your TVs drooling, listening to the message coming out of there, because that's what you want Ontario to be.

You're going to privatize the collection agency. If there's an argument to be made that there's a better way to do it, you would have a lot more credibility and have a lot more people willing to listen to you if you didn't have a constant mantra that says, "If it moves, privatize it." No matter what, you just so fundamentally believe that whatever it is, it's got to be better if it's privatized. So you have no credibility on this issue.

When we look at the procedures that are being put in place, you're denying workers options that they now legally have. Remember, the whole purpose of the bill is to help workers, protect workers. It's not supposed to be to go after them and punish them. They are the wronged party in these cases. That's why the ministry is there; that's why the enforcement branch is there. When you put in procedures that deny options to workers as to whether they can go through a civil suit or go through the ministry or go through a grievance procedure, you eliminate some of those procedures, you're denying workers options that allow them to maximize their rights, because all they're asking for in most cases is money that they're owed.

You're saying to them now in this bill: "We're no longer in the business in the Ministry of Labour of protecting your rights and going after the bad bosses. That's no longer our business. Maybe what you need to do is to go off to the courts." Again, courts cost money. Most of the people who need the Employment Standards Act are people who don't have good collective agreements, because in most cases good collective agreements go well beyond the basic, fundamental bill of rights.

You don't seem to have a concept of who's affected. These are workers. Many of them are immigrant workers. Many of them are women. Many of them are on the borderline of poverty. They can't just call up their buddy the lawyer or run up whatever a legal bill costs, because in most cases they don't have that kind of money, and perhaps the amount of money involved doesn't warrant it. In many cases, as a result of this bill money that workers are legitimately owed will be denied to them. Why doesn't that seem to bother you? Why do you feel so comfortable protecting the most powerful and giving the back of your hand to the most vulnerable?

You've already told us this is only the beginning. Doesn't that make everybody in the province feel good? More of this is to come. We still haven't seen the final review. Your discussion paper's not out yet. You've said you're going to open up the Occupational Health and Safety Act. We know you're going after injured workers under WCB. God knows what else you're dreaming up in the background that you're going to ram through while you still have power in this province.

I want to close my comments by again reinforcing the message that I opened with, and that is that the only reason we're having these hearings is because the NDP led the fight to force you to have public hearings. It's a minor victory that you're at least pulling the issue of flexible standards off the table. I think it's because you know that with that you have no credibility, no ability to say that these are only minor and housekeeping.

Let me say this: If you also think even for a moment that by pulling that clause out — which in this case is the one that affects organized labour, unions the most, because not all but most of the other clauses in this bill relate to non-union employees — the labour movement is going to back away because you've taken away one of the more controversial issues around it, you've got a surprise coming, because organized labour is linked with the unorganized in this province, community groups, legal clinics, organizations that are helping immigrant workers, all those most vulnerable, and there's a coalition developing around this. I assure you that the Ontario Federation of Labour and the rest of the organized labour movement are not going to back away because you've thrown some bone out here today. They're going to stay on you, stay on this issue and stay on this government all the way through these hearings. Every time you go after workers, they're going to be there defending the most vulnerable, because this government sure isn't.

ONTARIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: We'll now have our first presentation of the day, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce. We're right on schedule. Good morning.

Mr Ian Cunningham: Good morning, Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Ian Cunningham. I'm the director of policy on the staff at the Ontario Chamber of Commerce. With me this morning is Jennifer Wootton-Regan, a member of our employer-employee relations committee. Jennifer is a lawyer who practises exclusively in the area of employment matters. She met with employers, other employer groups and many of her colleagues to facilitate the chamber's brief this morning, so I'll turn it over to Jennifer.

Ms Jennifer Wootton-Regan: Good morning. Let me just start by advising you that the Ontario Chamber of Commerce represents over 200 community chambers and boards and over 65,000 employers in this province. Our members include both large and small enterprises in all sectors of the economy. We welcome this opportunity to meet with you today and to address Bill 49, the proposed employment standards improvement legislation.

We wish to state at the outset that the Ontario Chamber of Commerce applauds the government's action in undertaking a two-stage reform of the Employment Standards Act, and we support Bill 49 as the first step in that process. The Employment Standards Act itself has become outdated, particularly in light of the ever-changing nature of work. It fails to take into account the realities of an evolving workplace. It also does not afford employers and employees the necessary flexibility that would benefit all workplace parties. Indeed, as legislation added to over the years without a complete inquiry into its underlying framework, the act has become cumbersome and distinctly non-user-friendly. With respect to the plethora of exemptions under the act, the 1987 Donner report stated, "The complete picture of exemptions is difficult to piece together from the act itself, since the exemptions appear in so many different sections." To these ends, the chamber enthusiastically awaits the second phase of reform and supports the stated goals of promoting greater self-reliance and flexibility among the workplace parties.

The government has stated, and the minister has reiterated today, that Bill 49 has three goals: to allow the Ministry of Labour to administer the Employment Standards Act more resource-efficiently; to promote self-reliance and flexibility among the workplace parties; and to simplify and improve some of the act's language. The chamber not only supports these goals but believes that Bill 49 meets them. In so doing, the bill continues to protect minimum employment standards for workers. Any claims that Bill 49 lowers minimum standards are not justifiable. On the contrary, for example, section 12 of the bill, dealing with the accrual of rights during pregnancy or parental leave, is an enhancement of the generally accepted interpretation of the current right in the act.

Now we'd like to comment on some particular provisions of Bill 49 which the chamber supports. The chamber is very supportive of those provisions which eliminate duplicate claims, limit recovery of money to a six-month period and extend the appeal period.

Employers are increasingly faced with defending claims of the same nature, or for the same remedy, in multiple forums. The problem is not restricted to employment standards complaints. It also spans a variety of employment-related statutes. However, in dealing strictly with the Employment Standards Act, non-unionized employees are able to have their employment standards disputes dealt with by the courts in wrongful dismissal actions as well as by the employment standards branch.

Unionized employees are able to file grievances under a collective agreement to be dealt with in the grievance and arbitration process and may also file complaints with the employment standards branch. Employers are often left vulnerable to defending the same dispute in multiple forums and must bear the associated costs. The public purse is often also unfairly burdened. In the case of multiple claims in the courts and to the employment standards branch, duplicative public resources are spent. These resources would be more efficiently utilized in a single forum. Given these facts, the chamber supports those provisions of Bill 49 that would eliminate the ability to pursue duplicative claims in multiple forums.

The chamber is also very supportive of the proposed provision of Bill 49 which would limit the entitlement to recover money under the act to six months instead of the current two years. The proposed provision places, quite properly, an onus on employees to make complaints in a timely manner. Delays in making complaints often create an unfairness to the employer in providing a defence. In addition, the older the complaint, the longer and more difficult will be the investigation with its consequentially greater costs.

The chamber is also very supportive of the proposed change to increase the time limit to appeal employment standards officer orders from 15 to 45 days. The chamber believes that the increased appeal period provides a more reasonable time in which to do several things: allow the parties to negotiate a settlement in lieu of proceeding with an appeal; fully consider the merits of filing an appeal; and, given that the Employment Standards Act requires the employer to pay the amount of the order plus administration costs to the director in order to even apply for an appeal, make the payment. In many cases the current 15-day period causes a hardship to employers.

Notwithstanding the chamber's support of Bill 49, we believe there are some provisions of the bill that require some clarification and further thought. To that end, we're going to propose a series of questions, primarily dealing with section 20 of the bill regarding enforcement of the act through the grievance and arbitration procedure.

First, is it appropriate to grant arbitrators the power to make any order that an employment standards officer is able to make? Under the act, employment standards officers have the power to investigate complaints, require production of documents for inspection and make inquiries of any person relevant to the investigation. It is unclear from the proposed amendments whether arbitrators are also to be given these powers. The chamber believes that the arbitrators should not be taking on this role, as any arbitration hearing will only take place after the various steps of the grievance procedure. The arbitrators' authority should extend only to adjudicating the complaint, with the grievance procedure taking the place of the investigation.

We also ask whether it's appropriate to grant arbitrators the jurisdiction to enforce all provisions of the Employment Standards Act. The proposed amendments grant arbitrators the jurisdiction to enforce the entire act, and the chamber believes there are some provisions which should not be enforceable by an arbitrator under a collective agreement between an employer and a union.

For example, under the proposed amendments an arbitrator would have the jurisdiction to make a related employer declaration. This would unnecessarily complicate and lengthen any hearing. The chamber believes that the related employer provisions of the act are unclear and need to be amended in any event.

We also ask, what is the process to appeal or review an arbitration decision enforcing the act? The bill is unclear about whether an arbitration decision may be appealed or if it is to be final and binding and therefore may only be judicially reviewed. The proposed provisions state that an arbitrator may make any order of an employment standards officer. Under the act, the officer's orders can be appealed to an adjudicator or referee. It is therefore arguable that an arbitrator's decision could be appealed to an adjudicator or referee. Whether or not the government intended that an arbitrator's ruling be an extra step in the employment standards adjudicative process or replace the referee/adjudicator decision is unclear.

We also ask whether the time lines in the Employment Standards Act or the collective agreement are to prevail. All collective agreements set out time lines in which grievances must be filed and processed. In many cases these time lines will be different from the act's. These facts necessarily raise the question of which time lines are to prevail. For example, most collective agreements require that grievances be filed within a particular time period following the events giving rise to the grievance. That time period is sometimes in the neighbourhood of five to 10 days. Under the bill, however, complaints may be filed in a six-month period. The chamber believes that collective agreement time lines should prevail in order to ensure consistency. Indeed, grievances will be filed which will allege both violations of the Employment Standards Act and violations of the collective agreement. In such cases, consistent time limits would be very important.

It is also unclear from the proposed amendments whether an arbitrator's ability to award damages will be restricted by the six-month recovery limit. The bill is not clear in this regard. However, the chamber believes that the remedial jurisdiction of arbitrators should also be restricted in order to provide equal rights to all employees.

The final question we ask is whether expedited arbitration pursuant to the Labour Relations Act is available for grievances seeking to enforce the Employment Standards Act. Again, the proposed amendments are unclear in this regard. However, the chamber would support the availability of expedited arbitration.

Finally, the chamber supports the minister's proposal this morning which would see the provisions of Bill 49, specifically section 3, that allow for a greater right or benefit assessment as a package to be moved to the second phase of reform. The chamber strongly believes that allowing a greater right or benefit as a package is a fundamentally important component of allowing workplace parties the freedom to mutually agree to arrangements which, if viewed separately, would not be in compliance with the act. As we've stated, the chamber supports the goal of promoting self-reliance and flexibility, and the ability to assess greater right or benefit as a package would help to achieve such a goal. The chamber believes that the current section 3 of the bill does require some clarification and expansion and raises concerns regarding the practical implementation. We support the proposal that it be moved to phase 2 and we would be enthusiastic to see this theme re-emerge in the second phase of reform.

In conclusion, the chamber supports the two-stage Employment Standards Act reform process and supports Bill 49 as the first step in the process. Notwithstanding this support, we would urge consideration of the various questions we've spoken about today in order to clarify certain of the proposed amendments.

We thank you for this opportunity to make our submission and welcome any questions you may have.

The Chair: Thank you both. Your timing is bang on, almost to the second. Thank you both for taking the time to make your presentation, a very detailed submission.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF LABOUR

The Chair: Our next presentation will be the Ontario Federation of Labour. Good morning, gentlemen. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit. Divide it for your presentation. I recognize two people and not the third. For the benefit of Hansard I wonder if you'd introduce him too.

Mr Gordon Wilson: I have with me today Mr Ken Signoretti, executive vice-president of the federation, and Mr Chris Schenk, a research director of the Ontario Federation of Labour. My name is Gordon Wilson. I'm the president.

I thank the committee for the opportunity to make a presentation. In saying so, I want to register at the outset our disappointment that we only have 15 minutes. I understand that this change was made because of the overwhelming number of persons who have applied to make presentations before the committee, but obviously a fairer way to do things would have been to extend the hearings rather than cut the time on this extremely important issue, unless of course people don't consider it to be important. But I want to tell you that the majority of people this will impact certainly do.

We have submitted a brief which sets out our position. We commend it to your scrutiny and ask you to review it. Let me say at the outset that what is clear about this issue is that the government's intent, I think, can be found in the minister's statement this morning in which she said that the main thrust of the bill was to allow Ontario's workplaces to become more competitive.

What I find difficult about that statement is that intellectually, if you really want to make Ontario's workplaces competitive and you want to adopt the whole free market strategy, why don't we then impose legislation in this province or the lack of legislation one would find in countries like Indonesia or Guatemala or the maquiladora zones in Mexico? Why not like we have in the United States, where 1% of the population now controls 42% of the work?

I think the difficulty here is that the government is attempting to pretend to be doing one thing, and the reality on the other side is that it is not. You will find during the course of these hearings that on one side clearly will be employers, employer associations, members of the government in defence of these changes; and on the other side will be members of the opposition, workers, unions, community organizations, all those people who will be ravaged or impacted negatively by this legislation.

We ought not to kid ourselves about what the issue is here today. The issue is making changes that will strengthen the employer's ability to demand further concessions from workers who are in the workplace. This will simply erode the minimum standards that other societies and governments have understood to be necessary to protect the most vulnerable people in Ontario's workplaces. That vulnerability is vastly increased under the bill the government is currently proposing.

We are pleased, of course, to see the minister retreat from her position of putting the issue of flexibility in the bill. We would ask the minister, through Mr Baird, her parliamentary assistant, not to put it in the other bill that they're coming forward with. That will simply clog up the collective bargaining process. It will create a climate of more hostility and put another problem on the bargaining table. The law is the law. Put it in place, and let's not further compromise and make more difficult the collective bargaining process in a very difficult period of time.

The main thrust that's wrong with this bill, in our view, and we would urge the government simply to withdraw it except for a couple of parts I want to allude to, is that it makes a very basic assumption that is flawed. It assumes that employers in this province, when you remove certain basic rights, are going to put the interests of workers ahead of their own personal interests or those of their business when times get tough. The reality is that there are a lot of laws out there that protect employers now. Employers have all sorts of entitlements under common law. What workers have is enshrined basically as a minimum in the Employment Standards Act and of course some other pieces of legislation. To assume, as the government blithely seems to assume, that employers will now comply with the interests of the workers in the absence of some process — the law — which says that they have to comply, is a practice in naïveté.

Our hotline — some government members may cringe about this; opposition members may think it's important — the reality is that the hotline we've had at the federation the last few weeks has just been overloaded. Why? Because employers out there are taking advantage of the people who are most vulnerable: those at the low end. They're just saying that their employers are blatantly disobeying the law because they know the enforcement has been removed from the process, by and large, and that employers out there who want to be — I don't include all employers in that category, but there is certainly a number of unscrupulous employers who are taking it off the hides of their workers.

This bill ignores the history of this province and the need for a law in the first place. We tried to make that case in the first part of our brief.

Second, I think another major flaw is that it assumes the relationship between employers and workers is somehow equal. I want to tell you it isn't. The chamber of commerce, which spoke before us, obviously applauds this bill because they see it as once again strengthening the position of their membership, their employers, as they move towards implementing what will be those parts of the law that have been removed. Let me, if I can, just give you a couple of examples.

The law under section 20 of the bill, section 64.5 of the act, says that unionized employees have considerable access now. They have access to considerable investigative and enforcement powers in the Ministry of Labour. The government passes the law, therefore it's assumed the government's responsibility is to enforce the law.

What Bill 49 is going to do, however, is eliminate recourse by unionized employees to this avenue, and workers will be forced to use the grievance procedure. Well, that's quite interesting. What if you are a number of workers in a small local union in an isolated community, there are 20, 30, 50 of you, and your employer happens to be a branch of a large multinational corporation and says: "We know how to put the grievance procedure under the ground. We'll just clog it up. We'll create all these violations under the now non-existent requirements of the Employment Standards Act, and if you don't like it you can take this to arbitration"? If you're 50 people, you probably have a bank account in a local union of about $1,000, and that would be worth about 20 minutes of an arbitrator's time in today's real world out there.

Second, the ministry is proposing to end any enforcement in situations where it considers violations may be resolved by other means, namely, the courts. You tell me what workers on minimum wage can go out there and afford to hire a lawyer to take forth their case to get some justice. There is such an imbalance of power between workers and employers here, it just boggles the mind. How do workers possibly compete with employers who have as their resources considerable power and finances?

The max of $10,000 is really quite curious to us. I always thought that a buck that's owed is a buck that's owed and somehow it should be collected. Is the government coming forth — I'd like to see it — with some other legislation which says we can now cap the bank's profits or ability to collect when somebody fails to make a mortgage payment? Are you doing anything about tuition fees? What about bus fares? Are you going to cap that so that people out there can get a break? What about capping child care costs so that people get a break? Why just workers? Why are you capping the ability of workers to collect what's owed them and yet blithely turning the eye in the other direction when there are areas where workers should be collecting?

Finally, the observation we make is around the privatization and collection function of the Minister of Labour's employment practices branch. This is simply government divesting itself of its responsibility. On the one hand government is going to say it has the right and the empowerment in which to pass legislation, but on the other hand it says, "However, having done that, we're going to farm that stuff out to other people to take care of."

Let me make a couple of other comments in the short time — far too short, in my estimation — we have available to us this morning.

I want to put on record that the federation is not totally negative about this whole process. On pages 14 and 15 of our brief — and I haven't got time to go into it — we do support the minister's efforts around vacation entitlements and certainly those provisions under pregnancy and parental leave. They are positive steps that a government can take in recognition of what people are facing out there.

It is absolute naïveté to assume that employers are going to act in any interest other than their own, and when you strip away basic — and that's what we're talking about here. We're talking about basic minimum standards. This is not about two parties haggling over whether the lawyer's fee is going to be $150,000 or $110,000; we're talking about people who are currently out there trying to make a minimum wage because there isn't anything else they can make. I can tell you that if those of you who can read and have read the paper around our friend in Belleville and Port Hope and the Screaming Tale, he's indicative of far more employers out there than some people in this room would want to admit.

So we're asking, in the time that's available to us this morning, for this government to recognize the folly of attacking the most vulnerable. If you want to reduce the minimum wage, then why don't you have the courage of your convictions and come out and say you're going to reduce the minimum wage to $2 or $3 or $4 an hour, whatever it is you think it ought to be, because you can't pretend that you're protecting the interests of working people out there and then give employers the opportunity to circumvent, because of lack of enforcement and other reasons, that very basic minimum standard.

So at least be honest with us, at least say you think a worker out there is worth $3 an hour and that's what you're going to do in law. Don't come through the side door by saying that we're going to have a law which says they're entitled to $6.85 or $5.95 an hour and then strip away the enforcement that allows the employer to circumvent the legislation and do whatever the heck they want to do out there.

I notice my friend Mr Baird is smiling, but if he was a minimum wage worker maybe he wouldn't be smiling at that kind of a conclusion that I'm drawing here today, because I live in the real world, John. I know what people face out there because they come to me every day, and I can tell you, we've got hundreds and hundreds of calls in the last three weeks on our hotline where people are arguing that their employer is putting it to them.

So, two things: one, increase the current enforcement practices of the employment standards branch to allow it to police the 300,000 workplaces in the province of Ontario; and two, withdraw this legislation that's designed simply to assist employers into beating the heck out of the working people, with the exception of the two clarifications that are minor but important nevertheless that I mentioned earlier.

Mr Ken Signoretti: I'd just like to make a comment if I might. First of all, and I'm speaking to the parliamentary assistant, I would like for him to convey for me my sentiments. The minister is gone. I believe the minister to be a very decent and honourable person. I can recall when we came through these hearings many, many months ago, whether it was Bill 208 or Bill 165, her basic argument as the labour critic at the time was, "You don't represent all the workers out there; you just represent a small majority of people." She said, "We're concerned about unorganized workers."

If you're concerned about unorganized workers, I'm telling you, you're really sticking it to them. You'd better understand that. That's what you're doing, this change that you've made with respect to the bill with respect to trade unions, and we're going to show our mettle that in fact we do support these people out there and we're going to be out there tough for them. Gord is absolutely right. Get off the crap about being nice. If you want these people to work for $2 an hour, say it. Be honest about it, not flower this up about a whole bunch of things.

John, once again, I just close by saying to the minister, I expect her to do the honourable and decent thing as an honourable and decent person and withdraw the legislation.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen. We have three minutes remaining. We'll start with the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: Mr Wilson, just a brief question. At the conclusion of your document you indicate the two areas of the act, the amendments that you're prepared to support. Would it be the view of the federation that if there were to be a royal commission on the Employment Standards Act you would participate in that, if we were to look at the whole act in terms of trying to find areas that we could improve on or make work better?

Mr Wilson: I'm not going to hedge. Obviously a royal commission we would approach from the basis of attempting to find a way to improve the lot of those people who are being hammered out there. No question, what's happening in our society is that people are being ratcheted down further, and when you erode the minimum standards such as this, all you're doing is looking at a piece of it that assists those employers who want to ratchet it down even further.

A broader question — we haven't had any full discussions around that question because that wasn't part of the equation — but obviously if that were to happen, we would approach that with a view to increasing the protection of people at the low end. We're not talking about people who are doing well in our society. We're talking about people who are decent, hardworking folks who are trying hard to keep their families afloat, keep whatever they can on the table. It just turns my stomach to think that a government in the province of Ontario would want to make us look like Alabama. I just get absolutely incensed at that.

Mr Duncan: Just a quick supplementary. Would you say, then — it's obvious that you haven't said this — that this is the first step towards a right-to-work jurisdiction?

Mr Wilson: It's certainly the first step to making our economy far more competitive with some of those countries I mentioned earlier. If you really want to have a competitive, free-market economy, then get rid of all the regulation that protects working people. That's what they do in those countries. Let me make an example: You have Ford Motor Co which took some steps in Mexico in the maquiladora zone when workers struck there a few years ago, which had the army come in and kill some of those workers in that workplace. This is the same Ford Motor Co that's down the road in Oakville. What's the difference? The political and economic environment. That's what's different.

Mr Christopherson: Gord, the minister has characterized this bill as minor housekeeping. I think it's important that the people of Ontario hear on the record today the response from the president of the Ontario Federation of Labour to that characterization.

Mr Wilson: When you set the stage to erode already minimum standards for working people, as this bill will clearly do, then you're not acting in the interests of those people it will impact upon on the one hand, which is the workers. That's why I said at the beginning, Mr Christopherson, when you look at the people who will come before this committee in these public hearings, you will have employers, employer trade associations, chambers of commerce, boards of trade, all saying, "Hurray, hurray, hurray, we're glad you did this. We support the government," and on the other hand, those people who will be negatively impacted will say, "We don't want it." So you can't sit there in government and say, "We're taking an impartial act." The reality is, this is a partial act on behalf of the employers and they're going to be the winners.

Mr Signoretti: If I could just make one comment to that. We've always viewed the Employment Standards Act as a charter of rights for workers, where there are basic minimum standards, where there's a floor. When you erode that floor, you're basically eroding their charter of rights. Gord is absolutely correct. The fact of the matter is, once you do that, where is the floor? There is no more floor and it keeps going down and down and down and down.

Mr Christopherson: My supplementary, since you gave the official opposition one, would be, in what way do you see this as further polarizing society in Ontario?

Mr Wilson: The same way that you're seeing cuts to compensation, undermining the ability of people to protect themselves in the workplace, the ability of people to bargain freely. All of those things are undermining what can be a placid environment and turning it into something much more ugly. I'm not suggesting this is going to happen in Ontario, but if one looks at the news at what happened in Australia in the last day or so, it makes you wonder and you get quite concerned. A number of people stormed the federal government building there and it wasn't pretty. I hope that never comes to that here. I would work, as everyone in this room would work, to avoid that, but you don't avoid that by creating divisions and continuing to widen the gap between the haves and the have-nots. The people at the low end are the have-nots.

The Chair: Mr Baird.

Mr Wilson: So nice to talk to someone from the ministry.

Mr Baird: I want to thank you for coming personally. I should point out though, with respect, you mentioned in your opening comments the case of the Screaming Tale.

Mr Wilson: Yes.

Mr Baird: I think one of the first, if not the first complaint we received at the Ministry of Labour came from the member for Scarborough East, who is sitting to my right, on that issue. So it's something I think we were particularly concerned with.

I had just a quick question with respect to collections. The previous government disbanded the collections branch of the Ministry of Labour and discharged 10 employees. Do you support the idea of going to private collections, and in that answer, what would you think is an acceptable level for the amount of dollars that are ordered to be paid that should be paid?

Mr Wilson: I think, Mr Baird, there's a considerable difference between a lateral transfer of work from one area to the other and that of simply saying, "We're contracting it all out holus-bolus."

I have some difficulties with private collection agencies, which will act again, because they are in business, to the best hand that they can deal themselves, given the situation, as opposed to a government that I think every citizen has the right to assume acts in a dispassionate, unbiased fashion in trying to represent the interests of everyone. So what's the distinction? When you get into private collection, you're going to get the same kind of situation; people refer to them as ambulance chasers in other professions. You're going to get people who own those collection agencies taking the best haul.

By the way, the first time the Screaming Tale came to my attention was the two workers who had complaints in the labour council. I'm sorry I didn't read Mr Gilchrist's name in the Toronto Star, but maybe he doesn't buy it. I don't know.

Mr Baird: Just as a supplementary, I just think from government, our motivation is very much to see workers get more of their money, and today, only 25 cents on the dollar is being collected. Once someone has actually complained, an investigation substantiates the claim and an order is issued, only 25 cents on the dollar is ordered. It wasn't a lateral move under the previous government, though, with respect. They discharged 10 employees and put the responsibility on to employment standards officers, who were already overworked as it was. But I guess —

Mr Wilson: But not overpaid.

Mr Baird: I guess the idea behind this is to see more workers get more of their money. If the collection agencies have a motive, it's to earn their fee, which will be paid for by the delinquent employer, so that in the end, more workers would get more of their money. That's how they would make money, by delivering for workers who are owed money. They don't make any money if they don't get the worker the money.

Mr Wilson: But John, what we found out in the last three weeks through the hotline is there are all sorts of workers out there who find themselves in an imbalance of power. To assume the employer and the employee have an equality of power is an erroneous assumption.

It's a bad starting point. It leads you to the wrong conclusion.

Mr Baird: Somebody's got to —

Mr Wilson: Let me finish my point. So what's happening out there is you're going to have fewer complaints, no doubt, because workers will be told, as they are in other jurisdictions, "You want to complain?" — shoom. And in today's economy, with the unemployment level we have out there today, it's not hard to replace workers and so you're going to have employers, those who are unscrupulous, and as I said before that's not all but it is a significant number, who are going to say, "These are the rules that I am imposing."

We had one call that came in and a woman who said, "I'm making $6.85 an hour," or whatever it was; she was 10 cents under what she should have been paid to start with, "My employer has just told me my wages are $4 an hour, and he's a heavy-hitter in a small community and I know if I open my mouth, I'm gone." Well, that's the imbalance that exists in a lot of workplaces in the province of Ontario. When you strip the minimum standard away from people and when you strip the enforcement that enforces that standard, then you gravitate to that kind of situation I've just described to you. That's what's wrong with Bill 49.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen; we appreciate it. I gave you a few extra seconds there and then some.

INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY ASSOCIATION OF CANADA FOR ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next group up this morning is the Information Technology Association of Canada, Ontario branch. We have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and question and answer. I wonder if I might get you to introduce yourselves for the benefit of Hansard, please.

Mr Bill Petrie: My name is Bill Petrie. I'm the president of Information Technology Association of Canada, Ontario. With me today is Laurie Harley of IBM. We're delighted to be here to express our views on Bill 49. We've prepared a written brief, so I'll limit my discussion to a few key points.

The Employment Standards Act is very important to ITAC Ontario. We represent the information technology industry in this province, hardware/software firms, telecommunications firms. We employ about a quarter-million people. We're growing at about 15% a year. We're adding jobs so fast, in fact, that P.J. Ward, one of our members, announced that there's actually a shortage of 20,000 skilled workers in the Metro Toronto area alone.

Our sector is a sector which everyone is talking about. It's the new economy sector. It's brutally competitive. We're talking about a sector racked by change. Our product life-cycle in our sector is about six months. I just heard that Chevrolet was discontinuing the Lumina, which hasn't changed in 12 years. When you introduce a new product in our sector, it's got a life of about six months. Thousands of companies in Ontario are successful, we're competing successfully internationally, but we're competing in an environment which is so dynamic that we measure years in terms of web years, which is three months.

What this means is that we employ highly skilled workers. We pay them very well. These workers are very mobile. These workers actually have skills which have a lifespan of about 24 months. That is, what you know today has to be completely replaced every two years.

What this means is that in our workplaces the hierarchical structures are gone. What we have are empowered employers and employees, dynamic teams working together. Skills are highly specialized. They're highly valued in the marketplace. Continuous learning has become a way of life. Our employees work hours that are flexible to meet the needs of customers. Work location is flexible so that we can work at home, on the road, or in our offices. Finally, organizational cultures are moving to high performance models where measurements and rewards are linked to overall results in the business and personal results.

There's a huge culture gap between the reality of our workplace and the rules in the Ontario Employment Standards Act, and that culture gap appears to be widening.

I'm going to ask Laurie now to comment more specifically on the Employment Standards Act and Bill 49.

Ms Laurie Harley: Thank you, Bill. As Bill points out, the rules of the Employment Standards Act clearly weren't designed with the information technology industry in mind and that's clearly understandable when, if you follow the roots of some of the provisions such as the hours of work, they really do go back to 1884 and the Factories Act and clearly to the Hours of Work and Vacation Pay Act of 1944. If you go back to 1944, just very briefly, when the eight-hour-a-day maximum was brought in, even in those days only half of the workplace actually worked those hours. So what you found was that in order to not create a significant problem for the vast majority of people in the workplace, the law introduced special treatments and those special treatments really became a way of putting flexibility into the act. But it was a complex set of exclusions, exemptions for some or for all parts of the provisions, special overtime provisions, and a very elaborate permit system. It may have worked then but it most clearly does not work today. It's the combination of these outdated standards and the complex special treatment provisions that are really a major irritant for our sector.

To illustrate how long these issues have been with us and to provide you some more specifics, in our written submission we've attached a brief that our company prepared for the Ontario Task Force on Hours of Work and Overtime which was commissioned back in 1986 by the Honourable William Wrye, who was then the Minister of Labour. It really expresses our concerns as well as we could express them today. The issues are exactly the same. The difference is that 10 years have gone by and the need for action has become even more urgent.

The report of that task force, which was tabled in 1987, found that the working hours regime in Ontario was complicated to the point of bewildering, and so complicated, and let me just make one quick quote, "that its totality is likely understood only by a handful of persons."

I don't know if any of the members of this committee have looked at the current guide to the Employment Standards Act but I brought it along. It's this little purple book and it's known affectionately as the purple peril. If you haven't read it, I recommend it as mandatory reading because I think if you read through that you will agree that the task force's description back in 1987 is as valid today as it was then.

Merely updating these rules isn't enough. We need a pragmatic analysis of the regulations that really gets back to basic questions. What's the objective of the regulation? What's the cost of compliance? And perhaps more importantly, are there other ways of achieving the same objectives but with some more innovative approaches? To us, if you go through that process and that pragmatic analysis, you'll come out with an Employment Standards Act that is transformed and to us must meet five goals.

The first of those is that minimum standards must be there. We are not advocating scrapping minimum standards or safety net provisions. They must give protection but they must also have flexibility. It must be plain language legislation that everyone can understand and work with. We'd like the application and the enforcement of the act targeted to those in need of protection. We're going to hear a lot about those, I'm sure, over the course of the hearings. Their issues are valid and they need to be addressed. We would like streamlined administrative systems that reduce costs and improve effectiveness, and perhaps the final goal is innovative alternative approaches that recognize and promote self-reliance in the workplace.

Let me just turn very briefly to Bill 49. The government has said it's step 1 and it's there to make the act more effective in terms of administration. If I keep that in mind, I'd just like to walk very quickly through those five goals and compare them to the current Bill 49 as proposed.

The first one is: Does Bill 49 change any minimum standards? To be honest, we look at the bill and to us the answer to that is categorically no. We think the debate on minimum standards, how they should be updated, is a phase 2 debate, and we obviously look forward to that. What it does do is try to introduce some improved flexibility in unionized workplaces in order to negotiate a greater right or benefit. However, that to us falls far short of the flexibility we would like to see and we would like to see that flexibility ideally built into the standards themselves. Given that, we would certainly support the minister's announcement this morning to move that into the phase 2 debate. We think it makes more sense in that context.

Does Bill 49 make it easier to understand the Employment Standards Act? We'd say yes, at least as far as clarifying some of the maternity and parental leave provisions, but again much, much more to be done. Plain language legislation to us is just essential. If you can't communicate it, you can't expect workers to understand their rights and you have a hard time, I think, expecting employers across the province to be able to comply with it.

Third and fourth goals: Does it help target enforcement and streamline administrative systems? I guess to us this is where it makes its major contribution and we do support the directions that are outlined in the bill that would use private collection agencies, that would require timely filing of claims and allow certainly electronic filing. That's one we can certainly endorse.

Finally, does it promote innovative approaches to self-reliance? Again we think yes, in the sense that it does introduce the concept of using internal systems, the grievance process in unionized workplaces to deal with the SA complaints, but again we think this is far short of what we need to do in the phase 2 debate because there are non-unionized workplaces in the province that have their own internal processes that allow effective resolution of complaints. We think that they should also be examined in terms of models of self-reliance.

So very quickly in summary, we think the Employment Standards Act is in desperate need of reform. We think it is particularly out of date for firms in our sector. We think Bill 49 represents a positive first step, but perhaps the most important thing it does is it launches the debate and we look forward to that phase 2 debate. We would urge the committee to focus on the facts that are in Bill 49 and to recognize that the critical issues are still ahead of us.

We would also remind you that change is never easy and that change to legislation that tries to provide basic protections is even more difficult than most. However, we think the greatest threat to an effective safety net in the workplace in our province is not Bill 49 but our inability to reinvent a regulatory environment that will work today and will stay us through to the 21st century.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us with five minutes of questioning. I think by consensus after that last round we agreed if it's five minutes or less, we'll divide it just into two questions and then we'll continue the rotation with subsequent groups. So we'll start this time for two and a half minutes with the official opposition, Mr Duncan.

Mr Duncan: Thank you very much for your presentation. Let me ask you this because, like you, I think our party's view is that the Employment Standards Act is due for a major overhaul, particularly in light of the changing economy and new industries that have come about.

Would it be the view of your association that given the complexity of employment standards and given frankly some of the divisions I've seen in the business community, you often see a division between smaller employers and larger employers around these questions, and given the sensitivity around the Employment Standards Act not only to vulnerable workers but to employers, would it be your view that prior to any kind of wholesale change to the act — you referenced the Donner task force, for instance — that the proper process to defining the new legislation would be through a series of public consultations, either in the form of a royal commission or a white paper prior to introduction, or would you be of the view that the government ought to proceed with legislation in the absence of those hearings before any kind of consultation would occur?

Ms Harley: The first comment I'd make, with all due respect to royal commissions, is I think we all know the problems with the act. I think what we need to do is put our heads around some innovative solutions to those problems. To me, that royal commission process sounds like a very lengthy one and I don't know that we've got the time to do that any longer.

In terms of the act, I think it's critical that we get on with phase 2. I guess what we see in Bill 49 is a message that says: Look. The act needs to be reformed. We've got some ideas on how we could try to make it more efficient in the next 12 to 18 months until those changes actually come about, and if that will save some money, if that will make the enforcement of the current act better, then I think we'd say fine, let's get on with that too, but let's keep our main focus on the comprehensive review. I do believe there should be, and will be is my understanding, consultations around that with all the stakeholders.

The Chair: That's your two and a half minutes.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. I'll ask the question directly. I think you commented on it, but I'd like to be clear. Do you think that the changes proposed are minor housekeeping?

Ms Harley: I think what we look for is minimum standard updates and, to be honest, I don't see anything in this bill that addresses minimum standards. We see some process changes. I think some of the issues that dealt with flexibility and the greater right or benefit, we're touching more on those, Mr Christopherson. So I do think they probably belong and will be more effective in a phase 2 debate. But to be honest, we have real difficulty understanding the concern about this bill as gutting minimum standards. We just don't see it.

Mr Christopherson: That's interesting. I was going to go on down a different road, but maybe I'll go down this one with you because I —

Ms Harley: Maybe you should tell me where you would have gone before. That might have been a better one for me.

Mr Christopherson: You would have liked the other one. If you've given me the answer I wanted on the first one, I think you would have enjoyed it. It would have been in areas of part-time work, contracting, teleworkers in terms of things that the law doesn't adequately address and things that it needs to, but I would obviously take exception and perhaps the difference is the type of work that you're in. It would seem like there aren't major changes, but I would just offer to you that for people who represent workers, either at legal clinics, in non-union shops or collective bargaining environments, the changes are significant and do make a big difference to them.

However, I think I will go down that second road simply because I do think it's important to hear from you what sorts of things — I'd like to hear a couple of examples of what kind of minimum standards. If you accept that the Employment Standards Act is basically a workers' minimum bill of rights, it really is the only thing that says when you go out and offer up yourself for wages, here are the minimum conditions that someone can subject you to.

In terms of the new world of work that I think you're talking about, what way do you offer up the flexibility you need, but keeping in place the idea that there are minimum standards?

Ms Harley: Let me give you one example, and Bill might want to add to it. The eight-hour-a-day standard is the one that comes to mind most readily. I think we would all agree that prolonged long hours have relevance to health and safety. I don't know that there's particularly strong empirical evidence on that, but I think just logically everyone in this room knows that when you work a long time and long hours, you feel tired and you need a break.

It seems to us that if you take perhaps what's even already in the act today and broaden it so that it's a monthly cap or in some cases even an annual cap where people actually can balance that they work for certain periods, perhaps for prolonged hours, more than eight hours a day because you've got an urgent customer situation you have to deal with, but then you may take compensatory time off. So it's a balancing, but you take that narrow window of one day and you broaden that out to provide greater flexibility.

That's the kind of direction we're talking about in terms of standards that still keep, if you like, teeth in them in terms of the protecting of workers, but at the same time bring in some flexibility.

Mr Christopherson: Are there jurisdictions in the world that have those —

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, will you make it very, very brief?

Mr Christopherson: Oh, sorry. Are there jurisdictions in the world right now that have been able to do that?

Ms Harley: I think the eight-hour day one is one that a lot of jurisdictions have broadened to weekly, for example, but to us Ontario has an opportunity here to lead the way. We agree we want to be leaders. We agree that if we can come up with an innovative program of standards, we will have a jurisdiction that will say to all employers, "This is fair and balanced, but it's flexible and allows you to get on with your business."

Mr Christopherson: My concern would be it's so easily open to abuse. You'd have to have very imaginative-type legislation wording crafted to make sure that it's not abused because it could be subject to such easy abuse.

Ms Harley: I'd say today it's pretty abused and I think that we've got enough talent and skills in this province to come up with some innovative ideas.

The Chair: Thank you both. I appreciate your time, coming and making your presentation here this morning.

PARKDALE COMMUNITY LEGAL SERVICES

The Chair: Our next group up is Parkdale Community Legal Services, Gail Sax. Ms Sax, it's my understanding you have another individual who wishes to appear under a pseudonym; is that correct?

Ms Gail Sax: Yes. I have with me a client of mine who would like to testify before the committee anonymously and also with us is a Tamil interpreter.

The Chair: Thank you. It's been discussed within the subcommittee. Are there any concerns by any of the members? Seeing none, just for the witness's protection and just a clarification, there was a short statement that was prepared for eventualities such as this, a sort of good news-bad news, that "while members themselves enjoy parliamentary privileges and certain protection pursuant to the Legislative Assembly Act, it's unclear whether or not these privileges and protections extend to witnesses who appear before committees."

For example, it may very well be that the testimony you give or are about to give could be used against you. I caution you to take this into consideration in making your comments. However, on the other side there is parliamentary precedence that if anyone does anything arising, in this case, from testimony before a committee — if an employer were to react — that would be considered contempt of Parliament, and the committee would have the power to deal against the employer.

Mr Christopherson: On a point of order: With great respect, there has been no disagreement. Nobody has a problem. I think you're attempting to make this bigger than it is. Can we just get on with it?

The Chair: That's your considered opinion, Mr Christopherson, but I think it is somewhat precedent-setting to allow people to come to a public hearing and not use their names, so I want to make sure they have the full benefit of knowledge of how things work in this process.

None of that time has come out of your 15 minutes, Ms Sax.

Ms Sax: I'm Gail Sax, a staff lawyer responsible for workers' rights at Parkdale Community Legal Services. With me are a client of mine and Shyamala Shanmuganathan, a Tamil interpreter.

Parkdale Community Legal Services welcomes the opportunity to appear before the resources development committee on the review of Bill 49. Parkdale Community Legal Services is a community-based legal clinic in the southwest section of Toronto. Parkdale is a low-income, racially and ethnically diverse community. I am a staff lawyer at the clinic responsible for workers' rights.

The Employment Standards Act is the critical cornerstone of workers' rights in Ontario. It sets the minimum floor for workers' basic rights in Ontario. The importance of the act cannot be understated and, as our submissions will show, rather than amending the act to lower that floor, the government should be improving working conditions by raising that floor: the Employment Standards Act.

The workers' rights division at Parkdale Community Legal Services represents and works with unorganized or non-union workers. We represent workers on cases involving unemployment insurance, workers' compensation, human rights, Canada pension plan and employment standards. Employment standards cases represent approximately 50% of our caseload. Our clients reflect the community we work with. They come from the many employment sectors which are characterized by low wages and poor working conditions: manufacturing such as garments and textiles; warehouses; foodservices; cleaning; clerical work, including office work with temporary agencies; telemarketers; retail workers; domestic workers; and home workers. A large proportion of our clients is women and visible-minority workers.

Our employment standards caseload is high. In the past year and a half we have represented over 175 clients of employment standards matters alone. We have regular contact with over 2,500 workers a year through our public education work in the city of Toronto. The predominant issues faced by these workers are unpaid wages and vacation pay, overtime, termination pay and severance pay.

Based on our extensive experience, our submission outlines typical employment standards cases taken directly from our caseload and the impact of Bill 49 on these cases.

Workers protected by the ESA are vulnerable. They need the protection of the act. They are poor or working-class. They are often not aware of the protections of the act, and even when they are aware of their rights as workers, they may not be able to attempt to enforce those rights for fear of losing their livelihood and fear of the resulting poverty and the impact on their families.

From our experiences representing workers, Bill 49 is an assault on workers' rights. When Bill 49 was introduced in May, the Minister of Labour, Elizabeth Witmer, called the legislative changes simple administration and housekeeping. It is our position that the proposed amendments will have a significant negative impact on workers' substantive rights.

As the examples I will give shortly demonstrate, Bill 49 introduces very substantial changes. Bill 49 is a gift to employers who violate the Employment Standards Act. If enacted, employers will have an opportunity to routinely violate workers' rights and get away without paying workers what they are truly owed.

In the remaining time I will highlight our objections to the changes introduced in Bill 49. I will highlight a couple of cases of ours and the impact of Bill 49 on those cases, and we'll have [the witness] speak briefly about [the witness]'s particular case and at the end I will suggest some real improvements to the act.

Bill 49 introduces six major and significant changes to the act which are directly related to the enforcement of unorganized workers' rights. These are shorter limitation periods for filing a claim; a shorter investigation period; a new $10,000 cap on claims; a new, unannounced minimum; access to justice denied for low-income workers; and the privatization of the collection aspect.

With respect to the shorter limitation periods for filing a claim, currently workers have two years to file. Under Bill 49 this would be reduced to merely six months. Many workers stay in a job where their employment standards rights are being violated and endure great hardship just to have a job, any job. In periods of high unemployment, workers often need to be able to find a new job before they will make a claim against a former employer. They cannot risk the possible repercussions of a negative reference by an employer who has filed a claim against them. Workers need the two-year limitation period to safely file a claim. Bill 49 further pushes workers to choose between their rights and their jobs.

This is further impacted on by the shorter investigation period. The bill proposes that investigations can only go back six months of a worker's history from the time a claim is made. Where employers may have been violating the act for two years or more, they will only be accountable for the last six months of violations.

As a number of the case stories in our submissions illustrate, the $10,000 cap on claims will have a significant impact on many of the people we represent. The minister mentioned 4% as a figure with claims over $10,000; we find that number is much higher for our clients. Therefore, people with claims over $10,000 literally will be giving that money to their employer.

With respect to the issue of access denied to justice for low-income workers, currently workers may pursue their statutory entitlement under the act or civil remedies in the court system. Under Bill 49, workers will be told at the start of the investigation to use either the ministry or go to court. They will have to make this decision possibly before having had the opportunity to obtain independent legal advice. Of particular note, those workers with claims over $10,000 will be forced to go through the court system. The current government has already provided that legal aid certificates are not available for employment-related matters. This amendment will force low-income workers who are owed more than $10,000 to pursue claims through the Employment Standards Act and forgive the balance owed to them.

With respect to private collection agencies, I would just like to highlight something that I believe has not been mentioned: that collection agencies will be empowered to push for settlement once an order has already been made. The idea that collection agencies will be able to amend an order made by the employment standards branch of the ministry undermines the authority of both the act and the Ministry of Labour.

Our brief outlines the stories of six workers with employment standards claims. The total amount owed by employers to these six workers is $129,000. The total amount which Bill 49 would leave in the hands of employers at the expense of workers is $84,500. The workers would actually receive only $44,500.

Before I introduce [the witness], I would just like to tell you about two of my other clients. Mrs F is a cashier who worked in a major grocery store for 13 years, was terminated from her employment without cause and did not receive any notice of termination or termination pay in lieu of notice. She was entitled to over eight weeks of termination pay as well as severance pay. She filed an employment standards claim for approximately $5,000, which she was awarded and received. However, this worker filed her claim approximately one year after she was terminated. Under Bill 49 her claim would not have been allowed, as a six-month time limit for filing claims would have been imposed.

Ms X was a retail sales associate who worked for a retail clothing store for approximately two years. When she notified her employer that she was pregnant and would be taking maternity leave some six months later, her employer reduced her hours, her rate of commission and drastically changed her hours and duties. She tried to negotiate with her employer to return to her regular duties and wages. However, this was refused. The employment relationship had deteriorated to such a degree that reinstatement was not an option. She has filed an employment standards claim for compensation for the penalties imposed on her due to her intention to take maternity leave, including the loss of her job. The amount of her claim is over $35,000. This woman, under Bill 49, would not be able to pursue her claim for more than $10,000 or would be forced to pursue it through the courts without access to a legal aid certificate.

I would now like to introduce [the witness] to talk briefly about [the witness]'s story. [The witness] immigrated to Canada from Sri Lanka approximately eight years ago. [The witness] is a Canadian citizen. [The witness] does speak English; however, for the purposes of this hearing [the witness] feels more comfortable speaking through a Tamil interpreter.

Witness (Interpretation): I came to Canada eight years ago and I have been working in a firm for the past four years. I was not even given four days' notice and I was suddenly asked to leave my job. Because I was not given enough time or notice to look for another job, I found it very difficult and at the moment I am unemployed.

Even while working there, if I wanted just to take a day off I had to give one week's notice so that I could get one day's leave the following week.

They didn't give me any time or notice and suddenly they came to me and asked me to stop work.

In the beginning I was asked to work 56 hours a week. After a year they told me, "If you want this job to be permanent and if you want to continue, you have to put in 76 hours a week." Because I wanted this job very badly, I agreed to that and I put in 76 hours a week.

Without this new law and the enforcement itself, when the employer can be so harsh to me, once this new law has been in effect, can you imagine how it is going to affect employees like me?

It's important to develop the economy. Employers should also work and employers also should pay equally the employees' work. That's all.

Ms Sax: You'll find [the witness]'s story in our submissions. [The witness]'s claim is for over $40,000 in wages owed just for the last two years, which is the only portion of the four years [the witness] actually worked that is covered by the act presently.

To conclude, we submit that the changes proposed in Bill 49 are not merely housekeeping improvements but rather directly undermine and remove significant substantive rights for workers. We propose that in the alternative the act be amended so that it is a strong, efficient and effective piece of legislation.

We have two demands for change for a truly effective Employment Standards Act. You will find these detailed in our written submissions: first, a stronger enforcement of the law — tough, proactive enforcement of employment standards, including inspections and spot checks of company payrolls and audits; and real protection for workers against employer reprisals, including workers' anonymous complaints initiating a company audit.

Secondly, we would like to see new, improved working standards which meet the real demands of the changes in the workplace. We need stronger laws, not weaker ones. An example would be removing exemptions so that every worker is entitled to the same employment rights and protection, no matter their job or their age.

Those are our submissions. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Sax. Actually, I don't think any of my colleagues could ask a question in 30 seconds and ask you to do it justice, so for all intents and purposes we'll say it was 15 minutes. Thank you very much. We appreciate your coming in and telling us about your case as well.

Mr Christopherson: A point of privilege, Mr Chair: In the 15 seconds left, can I take a part of that and just say one thing?

The Chair: The rotation would have been to the government members. If the government members wish to ask a question in those few seconds, it —

Mr Christopherson: If I'd gotten the point of privilege then I would have acknowledged the courage it took for [this witness] to come here today, but since I don't have time I won't say it.

The Chair: Thank you. That's in fact what you interrupted the Chair in saying. Thank you again for coming in and making your presentation to us today.

Ms Sax: Thank you.

COMMUNIST PARTY OF CANADA (ONTARIO)

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Communist Party of Canada, Ontario branch. Is it Mr Rigby?

Mr David Rigby: Should I come up there?

The Chair: Yes, please come forward and just sit at the table there. Any of those seats at the end. Thank you for coming this morning. We have 15 minutes for your presentation, for you to divide as you see fit between a presentation or question-and-answer period. I wonder if I might get you both to introduce yourselves for the benefit of Hansard.

Mr Rigby: My name is David Rigby, of the Communist Party of Canada, and my partner is Liz Rowley, Communist Party of Canada.

Thank you for this opportunity to present our views on the proposed changes to the Employment Standards Act contained in Bill 49. Because of the profound and negative impact that these amendments will have on labour and democratic rights in the province, we begin by urging the committee to extend these hearings to ensure that all those who wish to be heard are heard and their views given due consideration before the bill proceeds further. Full public discussion and input is a requirement in any event, but it is also vital, given that this particular piece of legislation will directly affect the wages, standards and working conditions of every worker in Ontario, with the potential to impact on workers across Canada.

We are here to express our opposition to Bill 49 and to join with others in the labour movement and democratic movement who will urge its rejection in the arena of public opinion and its defeat in the Legislature. In our view, Bill 49 is not amendable. The single useful proposal to include maternity leave in the calculation of seniority and length of employment is far outweighed by Bill 49's dangerous ballast, which is to eliminate the minimum rights and standards won by working people in struggle and then enshrined by governments in law over the course of the last 60 years. These rights and standards include collective and individual rights to a legislated minimum wage, the rights to legislated maximum hours of work per day and per week, the rights to statutory holidays and vacations with pay, the rights to refuse overtime or to work at legislated rates for fixed amounts of overtime, the rights to severance pay, all of which are negated under the new subsection 4(2), becoming negotiable "when those matters are assessed together" in a contract of employment.

Long-standing legal rights to access and exercise all forms of redress deemed by a worker or workers to be collectively or individually necessary, without restriction, are sharply curtailed under the new subsections 64.3 and 64.4. These sections oblige a worker to choose between a complaint under the Employment Standards Act and a civil action in a court of law, notwithstanding that the complainant may wish to seek damages in a civil suit as well as recover lost wages or severance etc under the act and notwithstanding that the complainant may be facing financial hardship and may be thus forced by circumstance to file a complaint under the act rather than initiate a civil action, despite the fact that the new subsection 65(1) of the act will cap every payout at a maximum $10,000, while a civil action could pay out considerably more and is completely uncapped by legislation.

Further, the new section 64.5 prohibits trade unions and any union member who is covered by a collective agreement from laying a complaint under the act against an employer who is covered by the same collective agreement. By deeming the act "enforceable against the employer...as if it were part of the collective agreement," Bill 49 makes enforcement of the act itself negotiable. In other words, the only enforcement mechanism is might and muscle, which makes the legislation itself confrontational. This will no doubt concern Moody's and others who regard fractious labour relations as a bad climate for investment.

In this respect, the proposal in the new sections 73.0.1, 73.0.2 and 73.0.3 to privatize law enforcement and contract out the ministry's collection functions is anathema to the public interest and is widely seen to be so in our view. The public expect the government to enforce the laws of the land directly through public enforcement agencies and not to hand over enforcement to private, for-profit corporations, whose main interest is the bottom line, not the public interest.

Moreover, contracting collection agencies to negotiate, for a fee, "a compromise or settlement" between employers and employees is like letting the fox loose in the hen-house. Collection agencies are employed by corporations year-round to recover moneys owed them, primarily by people who have lost their jobs or lost their income. Collecting bad debts for corporations is the daily bread of collection agencies. It is simply not credible to propose that this symbiotic relationship between corporations and collection agencies should or could be ignored by a ministry that is charged to defend and enforce the law, most often the individual and collective rights of workers who have been cheated by employers, many of whom use these same collection agencies.

Workers' rights are also sharply curtailed under the new sections 82, 82.1 and 82.3, which reduce a worker's ability to recoup wages or other moneys owed to him or her by an employer by limiting the period of employer liability from two years to only six months prior to the laying of a complaint under the act. At the same time, the investigation time is extended to two years, with prosecution extended a further two years. In other words, workers can only claim a maximum of six months, while employers are not obliged to pay even that until four years later.

It is no surprise that employers are lauding this bill. It will go a long way to deregulate the workplace, removing many of the legal barriers that for decades have prevented employers in Canada from driving wages, working conditions and unions into the ground in the way that employers in the United States were able to do, to the detriment of living standards and labour and democratic rights, in the same period and in the absence of equivalent restraining labour legislation.

The enactment of Bill 49 would constitute a giant step in the harmonization and Americanization of Canada's employment standards laws, negatively affecting the largest proportion of unionized and non-union workers in the industrial and manufacturing sectors of the economy, including steel and auto, which is widely recognized as the engine of the Canadian economy. Workers in primary resource industries, including mining, forestry and hydro-electric, in construction, in the retail and food service sectors, in the public sector, including education, health and social services, among many others, will all be negatively affected by the harmonization and Americanization of labour laws implicit in Bill 49.

Canada will not be strengthened by ripping up our minimum wage laws. The American Sunbelt states, which have done that, are some of the poorest, most backward parts of the USA. They also have some of the highest rates of unemployment and social chaos and disorder, largely caused by the race to the bottom. The USA is no model for Canada, and levelling down is not the way to go.

The kind of improvements to the Employment Standards Act that would benefit Ontario, creating jobs and spurring consumer spending throughout Canada's industrial heartland and beyond, would include cutting the hours of work to 32 hours per week, with no loss in take-home pay; expanding statutory vacations to four weeks annually, matching the minimums in Europe already; abolishing overtime and workfare; reducing the retirement age to 60; raising the minimum wage to $12 an hour; requiring companies to give two years' notice of layoff and to show just cause before a public tribunal in the event of shutdowns and closures, and strict enforcement by ministry staff. Together with a bill of rights for labour guaranteeing the unfettered right to strike, organize and picket, these are amendments that are urgently needed to Ontario's labour legislation.

Combined with policies to put Ontario back to work, raise living standards, redistribute wealth through tax reform based on ability to pay and, not least, redeem Canadian sovereignty and independence by withdrawing from NAFTA and the Canada-US free trade deal, these are the measures that will help Canada and Ontario to pull out of a deep economic and political crisis and into a real recovery based on job creation and security, increased purchasing power, expanded labour and democratic rights and a full employment policy that recognizes the right of every human being to a secure and meaningful job at decent rates of pay with decent standards and working conditions.

These proposals are respectfully submitted for your consideration. Thank you for your attention.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Rigby. That leaves us one and a half minutes. Again, following the convention we've started, the questioning this time will start with the government.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Simcoe Centre): Thank you for your presentation. I just want to address the issue of collection. The fact is that two thirds of the orders to pay that are issued against employers are never collected. That is obviously a problem with respect to maintaining the standards and rights of employees out there. What would you suggest the government can do to try to redress this problem, because it's just basically a problem of employers not willing to pay or not able to pay and disappearing? How do we address this?

Ms Elizabeth Rowley: It seems to me the problem you've identified is the same problem that we've identified: the lack of teeth in the legislation that would allow the government to pursue —

Mr Tascona: I'm looking for a solution. We've all identified the problem. What's the solution?

Ms Rowley: Strict enforcement. Not contracting out enforcement but for the government to strictly enforce.

Mr Tascona: But even if we enforce it, we're enforcing it by putting an order to pay out there. The problem is that it's not getting collected because employers, for whatever reasons, aren't there to pay it. We've enforced the act but we can't collect. What's the solution?

Ms Rowley: The solution is that if you put teeth in the legislation that would put big fines against employers that do this kind of thing, including jail terms, and if you refuse to allow them to close their operations without first settling their debts with the employees and other creditors, then you wouldn't have this problem. The problem lies with the government. In short, that's my answer.

Mr Tascona: I would say the problem is that the company may not exist and the directors out there are the ones who may have to be looked at. Would you agree that if the company doesn't exist, how can we collect, so whom should we go after if we haven't got the company to collect from?

Ms Rowley: I would suggest that other changes in labour legislation need to be made that would allow workers not to be last on the list when it comes to companies being responsible for paying their debts. Everybody is a secured creditor except employees.

Mr Tascona: That's bankruptcy law and that's in the hands of our federal friends. We don't have any responsibility for bankruptcy.

Ms Rowley: Most of the cases that are before the Employment Standards Act don't have to do with bankrupt employers; they have to do with employers who refuse to pay. You can enforce that and you should enforce, in our view.

Mr Tascona: They are being enforced. The problem is to get the money.

Ms Rowley: I thought you said that they were not enforceable, that you were unable to secure payment.

Mr Tascona: No, I didn't say that. I say they were being enforced but you can't get the money. I'm asking you for a solution.

Ms Rowley: Is this government so powerless? It seems to me that on other occasions the government has shown that it's very powerful, particularly when it comes to workers trying to express their views in this House.

Mr Tascona: We're looking for solutions. That's why you're here.

The Chair: With that, I'll have to cut this dialogue off. We're over our 15 minutes. Thank you both for coming to make a presentation before us here today. We appreciate your taking the time.

Mr Rigby: I apologize. We didn't have more than four copies of our presentation to pass out. We'll send the other copies on.

The Chair: That won't be necessary. The clerk has already photocopied them. Thank you very much.

CENTRE FOR SPANISH SPEAKING PEOPLES

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Centre for Spanish Speaking Peoples, Miss Consuelo Rubio. Good morning. There are 15 minutes for you to divide between your presentation and question-and-answer time.

Ms Consuelo Rubio: Thank you very much. I'm a community legal worker at the Centre for Spanish Speaking Peoples, which is a community organization providing services to the Spanish-speaking population in Metro Toronto and surrounding areas. We have a variety of programs for our community, including the service I provide, which is representing people who have employment-related problems. We also do a variety of educational programs with our community.

We don't have a written brief to give you today. My community has very few resources, and instead of preparing a brief with a lot of legal analyses we are endorsing a brief that will be submitted to you this afternoon by Professor Fudge. This morning I'll talk a little bit about the impact the changes will have on my community and give you some examples of people we've represented and what would happen to them if these changes were to pass.

A number of people we represent are domestic workers. Domestic workers, as you might know, are admitted to Canada without permanent resident status. They come to Canada on the condition that they will work for a number of months, and after that time has elapsed, if they have a good record, they're given permanent resident status.

The six-month limitation period to file a claim concerns us greatly. I will give you examples of two cases in which we've acted on behalf of our domestic employees, one where the domestic was unlawfully confined by the employer for 16 months. That meant she couldn't go anywhere; she couldn't contact anybody. She was 18 years old and spoke no English, and the final order for her was about $23,000. It was paid out of the wage protection fund when the employer disappeared.

We had another domestic, as an example — and these are not exceptions; these seem to be the rule, particularly with domestics because of how vulnerable they are — where we went to the branch to get some overtime for this woman. The original claim was for $13,000, and we ended up settling it for about $8,000. When we went to the branch for enforcement, the branch said to us, "Oh not this guy again." So this guy does it again and again.

We have right now a man who approached us recently. He came to Canada as a refugee brought in by the Canadian government and worked in a recycling plant for one and a half years. His employer only paid overtime after 50 hours. My client is not landed yet, so he hasn't done anything about this. We figure he's owed probably close to $20,000 in overtime.

The minister said it's only executives who have these big claims. Far be it from me to accuse her of lying to this committee, but you know she's only been the minister for one year. I've been a legal worker in this area for 17 years and I can tell you that is not my experience at all. In fact, it's a lot of these workers who wait until they have a more secure position in Canada to file these complaints whom we often file huge claims for.

The word I have heard most often this morning is "flexibility," and it really irks me, to tell you the truth, because my community has absolutely no flexibility. What flexibility did these workers I mentioned to you have in their employment? The only flexibility they have is, if they don't like it, "You leave, you go away," which is what happens.

I'm also concerned about the minimum. We don't know what it's going to be yet. Many of you in government were elected or are supporters of big law-and-order platforms. I wonder whether you're going to do the same thing with theft. Are you going to press for changes in the law so that theft charges are only laid when someone steals over $500, over $2,000? What's a minimum? I really feel it is important to keep in perspective that $500, for instance, is the monthly entitlement someone who is on welfare gets, and $500 may seem like a petty little amount to many of us, but it's not for the people we represent who have incomes. I can tell you, between $14,000 and $18,000 for a family of four.

I heard a number of people, particularly government members in the committee, ask questions about collection, what the government could do in terms of improving collection and actually assisting those vulnerable workers. I think I have an answer.

Under the previous government, when the wage protection fund was created, we recommended that it be employer-funded and that there be experience ratings. Basically what we're saying is, let's be proactive about it. Let's not forget that many investigations end up with employers being found in default; they haven't paid what they should. I as a taxpayer object to having to foot the bill for negligent employers, for their blatant breach of the law. I would prefer a system that is funded by them and supported by them since they're the ones who are breaching the law.

I heard the minister this morning — I'll go to her comments now — talk about how taxpayers have to pay twice because employees choose both routes, the administrative route and civil court route. That's not the way I analyse this. We have to pay twice because employers have shown a reckless disregard for the law and that is why we're paying. I'm suggesting you do something with the employers. They're the ones at fault.

What I would like to do now is make just a few comments about the minister's comments this morning. Then maybe we'll have a little time for questions. Other than her comments about flexibility, the minister mentioned that the act is very confusing, that nobody understands it etc. Again, for years we've been telling the ministry, "If you think the problem is that employers don't understand the act, why don't you have some education for the employers?" That's pretty easy. If it's ignorance only, that can be solved. We have education for our community. Let me tell you that when I say "we," I mean "I," because I'm the one dealing with this problem. We don't have a lot of resources and still manage to disseminate some information and answer some questions.

The minister also talked a little about certain administrative procedures and how the two-year limitation period is too cumbersome since 9% of all claims are filed within six months. But that leaves 91% that are not. If that is the way the ministry is going to streamline the process, I have a big problem with that.

The minister also said that the two-year period is being reduced to six months because witnesses are not as reliable if you wait too long. In the 17 years I've been involved with employment standards, most of the cases were resolved by looking at records. Very few times do you have to resort to witnesses. Employers are required by law to keep records. That is what the employment standards officer is going to be looking at when investigating a claim.

I just want to reiterate, before I end my remarks and wait for your questions, the impact this is going to have on our community that is very new in Canada, that has very few financial resources and that I think is second on the list of incomes in terms of poverty and resources. Many of you who come from the faith community, like Mr Shea, who's actually my rep, should really show some more concern about the most vulnerable in our society. I don't want to hear more about, "We care about the most vulnerable." I want to see some action from this government if they really mean it and are not trying to sell us another bag of goods that many of us aren't buying. Those are my remarks.

The Chair: Thank you. That leaves us five minutes, so we'll divide that between two parties.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): I enjoyed listening to your presentation. I was particularly interested in the claim amount that you talked about of $23,000. I was going to ask you some questions about that but you answered them for me as you went on. This person is not an executive at all. Would they be earning under $10 an hour?

Ms Rubio: No. We calculated that this money was based on the minimum wage. I don't think it was $6.85 at the time; it was less than $6.85. That was about a year and a half ago. This was considering overtime, and this woman literally worked day and night for her employers. The employers ran a restaurant, and she was also taken to the restaurant and brought home at 1:30, 2 in the morning. She had to get up at 6 to get the kids ready for school and so on. They didn't pay her a penny for the 16 months. They told her they were sending the money back home, but they weren't. She was a domestic, basically.

Mr Hoy: Would it be difficult for this person to pursue this through the courts with the resources that they have?

Ms Rubio: This is something I didn't touch. I mentioned that most families with four members have incomes of between $14,000 and $18,000. You can really appreciate that people do not have any pennies for frills like litigation. Doing it cheaply, we're talking $200 an hour for any lawyer. It's unrealistic to expect that these people will have the resources and energy to take this thing through the courts. It's just sweeping them out of sight, basically, if you expect people to pursue civil remedies for employment standards claims.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. I'm particularly pleased that you're here on the opening day. In my own community, the riding of Hamilton Centre, one of the fastest-growing populations in downtown Hamilton is Spanish-speaking. We in the NDP have suggested, not only with this legislation but in virtually everything this government has done, that the most vulnerable, those who are either in poverty or close to poverty in many cases — visible minorities, new Canadians, women — are affected the most. I suggest to government members that what they're hearing today and will hear over the next three weeks is further evidence that this is the case. To give you the benefit of the doubt, if it's just that you didn't know, then you're hearing from people who represent the very Ontarians we've been talking on behalf of.

I was struck by the fact that you said you've been doing this for 17 years. I suggest then that you're very well placed to give expert testimony as to whether or not this is just minor housekeeping, which the government is suggesting.

Ms Rubio: No, this is not minor housekeeping. I've read the bill in some detail and I can tell you that particularly the six-month limitation period is a major, huge change that will affect a lot of people. Most people, in my community at least, the community I can speak with more authority about, wait before making the decision. There are a number of considerations. In my community a lot of people have come to Canada as refugees from oppressive countries and they have a certain fear of the government, which I must say I've seen reinforced in the last few months. I get a lot of calls from people who have problems at work. I see more and more reluctance to enforce their rights. That is something that concerns me greatly.

We've had some experience with collection agencies at the federal level, and I'm not impressed. All they want is a deal and out of sight, out of mind. "If I close this file I get some payment." That's really our concern. This is again talking about what kind of power the people in my community actually have to negotiate and bargain with these guys who will say: "Okay, take 200 bucks and run. You can get them right now." These people are making very little money. That is of great concern to us. This isn't minor housekeeping.

Mr Baird: On a point of order, Mr Chair: It was suggested that the Minister of Labour lied to the committee, saying that all individual claims that exceed $10,000 involve executive positions. What she said was "often." I think that should be reflected in Hansard. She did not say "all" under any circumstances. She said "often," not "all," because certainly we know that not to be the case.

Ms Rubio: I actually said, "Far be it from me to suggest that she was lying."

Mr Baird: That's fine, but your intent was clear. Your intent was very clear.

Ms Rubio: No, but that's not what I said.

The Chair: Okay, thank you. Mr Baird, you've clarified it for the record.

Ms Rubio: And it's too bad she didn't stay. She claims she wants to hear what we have to say. Well, we've requested meetings with her. We haven't heard from her. She's not here this morning. So she says one thing and does something else.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Rubio, for taking the time to make your presentation here this morning. We appreciate it.

Ms Rubio: Thank you.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, DISTRICT 6

The Chair: Our next presenters, they haven't introduced themselves. The Vaughan Chamber of Commerce is not here. So the United Steelworkers of America, District 6. Good morning, folks. I take it you're Mr Hynd. We have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between a presentation and question-and-answer period. We appreciate you coming to see us here this morning.

Mr Henry Hynd: Thank you for the 15 minutes, which is, quite frankly, a very short time to really have an analysis of these small housekeeping amendments that in fact will create a great deal of concern and injustice in our province of Ontario. My brief outlines something about my union, the size and the diversity of our membership, but that can be read at any time.

I would like to begin, and I will only touch on several parts of my brief and hope that the committee members will take time to read it. We feel that it points out many of the legal implications of this bill.

We believe that Bill 49 will seriously jeopardize the rights of workers to basic employment protection in Ontario. Premier Harris and Labour Minister Elizabeth

Witmer have publicly proclaimed Bill 49 amendments to be "minor changes" which amount to mere "housekeeping." That is so sad, that the government of the day would consider this to be housekeeping if they really analysed the implications of this bill.

This bill will strip unionized workers of legislated minimum workplace standards which resulted from hard fought struggles of the Steelworkers as well as many other trade unions, and privatizing the government's responsibility for arbitrating, regulating and enforcing minimum workplace standards, thereby placing this burden on the backs of workers.

These amendments will make it easier for employers to deny their employees the minimum wages and benefits set out in the Employment Standards Act. More simply put, Bill 49 is a gift to unscrupulous Ontario employers who will view the amendments as an opportunity to gut minimum workplace standards. Employers will realize that the costs and pressures of self-regulation of this new system will force employees to agree to a settlement or compromise of an outstanding claim against the employer even where the employer has clearly and unconscionably violated this act.

The United Steelworkers asks this government to consider the effects of Bill 49 on working people and the labour relations environment in this province. We urge this government to have regard to the implications of Bill 49 and withdraw this proposed legislation.

Section 3 of the bill allows employers to negotiate lower standards for hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays and paid vacation in organized workplaces. Until now these basic standards were untouchable. Furthermore, no other jurisdiction in Canada allows employers to contract out of legislated minimum standards protections afforded to workers. This amendment is enough to make the USWA stand in opposition to the bill as a whole.

The intent of the act has always been to impose minimum workplace rules and standards which society deems necessary for all of its members. While parties are free to contract for higher benefits than those contained in the legislation, they are not able to undercut the statutory minima, often referred to as the floor of rights. This amendment will eliminate the floor. There is no justification for the elimination of basic standards for working people in a society which values the universality of at least minimum basic rights.

We believe that the introduction of this legislation will create greater conflicts in the workplace where in fact employees are fortunate enough to have a union that will help them carry through to ensure that employers pay the minimum standards and whatever is due employees, whatever wages have been denied to employees, vacation pay, whatever, and this is something that we feel is an onus on unions that need not be there. It will create heightened tensions in the workplace and certainly won't be a conducive element to adding any harmony in the workplace.

The proposed amendment requires unions, employers and arbitrators to undertake the difficult task of comparing apples and oranges and determining whether collective agreements comply with subsection 4(3) of the amended act and provides greater rights in total for hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays, vacation with pay and severance pay when assessed together. This accounting mess is compounded as the parties are being asked to value and compare purely monetary rights (overtime pay, severance pay), non-monetary rights (hours of work) and mixed rights (vacation pay and public holidays).

The fact that there has been no attempt in Bill 49 to address how a negotiated package is to be evaluated suggests that the purpose of this provision is to allow employers to waive minimum standards rather than negotiate greater flexibility in achieving minimum standards.

This government is abdicating the historic function of government in enforcing the act and forcing it on the shoulders of organized labour. Bill 49 eliminates recourse by workers to the considerable investigative and enforcement powers of the Ministry of Labour. Bill 49 contemplates that an arbitrator, whose costs will be shared by the union and the employer, will have all the powers now exercised by employment standards officers, referees and adjudicators. This places an undue hardship, a financial hardship, a legal hardship, on human resources' burden of managing every employment standards complaint. We consider this as staggering.

The change from an individual to a union-driven procedure poses a tremendous hardship on unions, which will now bear the burden of investigation and enforcement and their accompanying costs. As well, Bill 49 will require unions to become familiar with the pre-existing and complex jurisprudence under the act, because unions and not individual complainants will be responsible for determining whether to proceed with a complaint.

There is also some ambiguity about when unions will first begin to assume responsibility for administering employment standards complaints. As the proposed legislation presently stands, a union is responsible for enforcing the act after certification and the issuance of notice to bargain a first collective agreement if an employer subsequently enters into a collective agreement. How is it possible for the union, without a collective agreement grievance procedure and arbitration provision in place, to process an employment standards complaint?

It is possible that these complaints will need to be held in abeyance until a first collective agreement is achieved. If a first collective agreement is never achieved and complaints that had been held in abeyance are subsequently referred to the employment standards branch, the delay in filing the complaint with the branch may result in an employee being unable to recover money due to the proposed six-month limitation period for filing complaints.

The government's minor changes to the act allow it to unfairly pass off the obligation and associated liability involved with administering a public statute on to employees and their unions when it is the employers who have violated its provisions.

The absence of an investigation stage will be extremely problematic in dealing with successor employer and common employer complaints under the act where pre-hearing production is essential. The information necessary to succeed on such a claim is often solely within the knowledge of the employer. Unions will be forced to file and then proceed to litigate these complaints before an arbitrator in order to compel production and disclosure. Disclosure at this stage may result in the union finding that there was little basis for the complaint. Surely it makes sense for the employer who has violated the law to provide the necessary materials to the union, and yet we will be forced to go to arbitration to receive this.

Bill 49 is a bad act for all workers, and especially for unorganized workers in terms of its limitations, the time limits that are imposed on workers who may have few resources, little knowledge, little access to information. What will really grow as a result of this in the unorganized field is the number of people who will become complainants, and they will take cases forward in the private sector and make claims for employees and look for a settlement of the claim, because a settlement of the claim will usually result in their payment. They won't pursue the claim in the same way that any justified system would proceed. How they will proceed is on the basis of receiving some of their money, and therefore this ensures that unorganized workers will never, ever be able to collect what is due them under the law.

This is a sad comment on this government and its housecleaning. This will cause major problems in the workplace. Most unorganized workers will just be denied justice. This is an attempt, in my view, to allow unscrupulous employers to get off the hook, not to pay moneys that workers are entitled to, and I can't understand how any government would consider this to be mere house-keeping changes.

I ask you to look at this brief in detail, as I said at the beginning. It points out some of the legal implications for both organized and unorganized workers and the heavy burden it will place on workers and their representatives to pursue what should be their right under law.

The Chair: Thank you. That leaves us with just under two and a half minutes, so there'll be only one question in the rotation this time. A government question, Mr O'Toole.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham East): Thank you, Mr Hynd. Just a quick question. I hear from my constituents who have concerns with the employment standards that the current system, although there may be judgements, doesn't work. That's a pretty broad statement. Without particular reference to this, do you think it's time to review the legislation?

Mr Hynd: I can only tell you, Mr O'Toole, that in our experience we have been able to bring justice to workers even although it has taken some considerable time. We have judgements against employers who have decided to run away from their employees and from their obligations to their employees, who have virtually stolen money from their employees, and we've ensured that these employees have received that money. I can only say to you that the employment standards branch was a very effective tool for workers. I can't imagine the difficulty that unorganized workers would have without the help of the employment standards branch. I can only say to you that the new system may be very expedient. What will happen is nobody will make a claim or claims will be settled fast for 10 cents on the buck, and workers will be denied what they really should get. Employers who are stealing money from employees are being let off the hook by this system, by the introduction of these so-called house-keeping changes.

Mr O'Toole: I guess I would suggest, in any changes that may be necessary, do you endorse the idea of more self-reliance, specifically in collective bargaining where there is a prevailing, negotiated-between-the-parties —

Mr Hynd: Actually, there is a very simple way for this government to expedite claims. If the government really wished to bring about speedy justice, all it has to do is move workers — who have worked for their money and have been denied payment — to the top of the list instead of the banks and the rest of the creditors. Workers are at the end of the list. They have actually put in physical labour and they are owed the money. The owner has taken that money away from them, money they were entitled to. The banks and creditors, when they make loans, make them taking a risk. They're investing in a business. Workers don't invest in a business; they work for their employer. So if you want an expeditious system, there's a simple solution. And it's not a simple house-keeping matter. We'd still need employment standards and we'd need the branch.

Mr O'Toole: I repeat the same question: Do you believe that amendments of that magnitude need to be discussed and that the minister is doing the right thing by giving you and others, and us, the opportunity to listen and to amend the act so that it addresses those vulnerable workers?

Mr Hynd: For the minister to take away minimum rights —

Mr O'Toole: She isn't, though.

Mr Hynd: I think she is. What the minister is doing is denying the fact that minimum rights should be protected by government. What they're saying is they expect the employers to self-police, and we know how many employers self-police. There's a litany of employers who have denied employees their wages that they have already worked for, their vacation pay that they have already earned, their severance pay that they paid for. Their employer denies them that. I can only say to you that that's certainly no way to straighten things out for employees. That's not housekeeping; that's a destruction of the minimum standards in this province.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr O'Toole. I'm afraid we've exceeded our time. Thank you both for coming before us here this morning. We appreciate your taking the time to make your submission.

That concludes our morning session. The committee stands recessed until 1:15 this afternoon back in this room.

The committee recessed from 1158 to 1315.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS — CANADA

The Chair: I call the meeting back to order for our afternoon session. Our first group making a presentation this afternoon will be the Canadian Auto Workers. Good afternoon, gentlemen. I wonder if you might introduce yourself for Hansard, and of course, just to remind everyone, we have 15 minutes for each group today and it's up to you to divide as you see fit between presentation time and question and answer.

Mr Jim O'Neil: My name is Jim O'Neil. I'm the national secretary-treasurer of the CAW. On my far right is Jim Stanford, who is an economist with the CAW, and Lewis Gotthel, who is the director of our legal department.

For those who don't know about our union, we are the largest private sector union in the country. We represent some 210,000 members — 143,000 are here in Ontario — in a broad range of different services and industries. As you notice, we have a brief submission that's before you, but I'm going to go from the one page highlighting some of the issues within that brief and I would hope that at a later date you would go through the brief as it's been put together.

While the CAW — Canada welcomes the opportunity to appear before the committee to address our very serious concerns about Bill 49, we underline our clear opposition to the manner in which the current provincial government continues its regressive rewrite of labour laws such as the Employment Standards Act without consulting the trade unions and workers of Ontario. Providing a very limited number of persons and/or organizations 15 or 20 minutes to debate the purported merits of another attack on workers' rights is unacceptable and a shameful mockery of the democratic process.

The brief of the CAW — Canada submits:

The strong opposition of Canada's largest and leading private sector trade union to Bill 49;

That all workers in Ontario have an interest in improving, not diminishing, the workplace standards found in the Employment Standards Act by reducing the acceptable work week to a maximum of 40 hours, increasing minimum vacations with pay, the minimum hourly wage and intensifying the prosecution of delinquent employers;

That Bill 49 seriously limits and in some circumstances denies worker access to justice and the proper enforcement of the standards in the statute by imposing a minimum floor and maximum ceiling for an acceptable claim to the Ministry of Labour, reducing the time period during which a worker may make a claim to six months, and privatizing the collection of outstanding wages in a way which will coerce workers to take less than 100 cents on the dollar with respect to their minimum legal entitlement;

That Bill 49 privatizes for a third of Ontario's workforce the entire administration and enforcement of the Employment Standards Act and makes workers pay half of the cost of the arbitrator who will hear claims under the Employment Standards Act. Corporations don't have to pay for a judge's time when a case pursuant to the Ontario Business Corporations Act is heard in the Ontario Court. Why should workers or unions have to pay the cost with respect to an arbitrator's time regarding a claim under a public statute like the Employment Standards Act?

It is and has been widely recognized that the purpose and intent of the Employment Standards Act is to protect workers who are in a radically unequal bargaining position in relation to their employers. Workers are not calling for the amendments found in Bill 49. The only voice supporting these changes is the voice of corporate Ontario, and one thing is certain about their agenda: It is not about the protection of workers and their communities.

With that, I'll turn it over to Lewis Gottheil for some comments.

Mr Lewis Gottheil: The brief goes into some detail with respect to the points listed here and I would ask you to consider that brief carefully. We're particularly concerned at this time about the proposals in the bill that deal with a minimum floor and maximum ceiling with respect to claims.

With respect to a minimum floor, as we state in the brief, if the bill passes as proposed, workers will be disinclined, discouraged and even intimidated in a sense from pursuing their claims, the reason being that the only forum they will have to pursue a claim under the minimum floor is the Small Claims Court of Ontario. In our view, it would simply be counter-productive for the worker involved, for the community at large, to oblige workers to go to the Small Claims Court to pursue a claim that falls under the minimum floor. You will be using up Small Claims Court time, which is also funded by the taxpayers of Ontario. You'll be forcing workers to engage in procedures which are technical and with which many workers, particularly vulnerable workers with unfortunately limited educational opportunities, are simply not familiar with. They will be discouraged, if not intimidated, from using that procedure. It's simply counter-productive and we, as we state in the brief, see no savings to the public purse in that respect.

With respect to claims over the maximum ceiling, which we understand is proposed in the amount of $10,000, the first point I would make in that regard is that many workers, including many members of the CAW, will have down the road, and have had in the past, claims in excess of $10,000.

So while you may think, while considering this bill, that you're not affecting a great number of workers, if that proposal passes, you will affect a great number of workers. For example, members of our union will make $400, $500 a week, will have between 10 and 20 years of service when a plant closes. If you include in that severance pay calculation vacation pay owing, quite soon you'll find you're over the $10,000 mark. It's simply unacceptable in our submission that one would force an individual worker, again, to engage in court proceedings to recover that which is guaranteed by the Employment Standards Act.

The purpose of the act is to protect workers. Historically, governments of all stripes have recognized that purpose. Furthermore, the purpose of the act is to give a worker a simple means of recovering his or her entitlement. That's been a purpose of the act for many years and should remain a purpose of the act. As well, the act has recognized that workers, particularly vulnerable workers, either by way of limited educational opportunity or by way of not having English as their first language, and any other worker, should have the assistance of the Ministry of Labour in pursuing a claim. That's why including all claims of whatever amount of money, all entitlements for whatever amount of money, should be handled within the Ministry of Labour enforcement procedures and framework. Employment standards officers have the power to inspect documents, interview witnesses, collect the information to assert a claim, and the workers of Ontario rely on that procedure to assist them in getting their entitlement.

So while we understand the minister this morning announced a withdrawal of the provision regarding contracting out of workplace standards, we are not confident and we are not assured that this government won't introduce that again. We take from the minister's withdrawal a decision that the government will not proceed with that particular proposal down the road and we trust that the government will make that clear in the days to come, that that's what the withdrawal of that particular proposal means.

There are unfortunately so many other ramifications dealing with other issues pertaining to, for example, the collection proposals, privatizing collections etc. Regrettably, we have a limited amount of time and it really is an unfortunate and wrong decision of the government to limit our time because of the enormous impact this has on workers, not only in organized industries but in unorganized industries.

I'll stop there because we hope you may have some questions that we can answer with respect to your concerns.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen. We do indeed have two and a half minutes per caucus, and questioning will start with the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: The notion that this is the first step towards a right-to-work jurisdiction, would you concur and would that be your overall view, that this is a slippery slope in terms of where we go as a province in terms of workplace regulation?

Mr O'Neil: The Employment Standards Act didn't evolve overnight. It evolved over issues that workers and unions believed were something that had to be put in place to make the improvements. For the minister now to say she's going to take one section out and review it, I would suggest that the whole Employment Standards Act is so important, it all should be reviewed and these hearings should stop immediately. There is no question in my mind that what this government's driving for is lower standards for workers.

Mr Duncan: That was my next question. You would not be opposed to a complete review of the act itself, provided there was fair opportunity to debate it publicly?

Mr O'Neil: We're not opposed to debating any issue, if there's fair debate and there's some kind of a forum where you can — again, the Employment Standards Act is the minimum where you can improve workers' rights and working conditions within this province.

Mr Gottheil: If I might add one brief point to that. In our brief we make reference to a case decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, called Machtinger and HOJ Industries, and it's in there to say one particular point: that there's been a consensus in the community and a consensus reflected in the Supreme Court of Canada that the purpose and intent and spirit of the Employment Standards Act of Ontario has been to protect workers, to advance those who are in a vulnerable bargaining position. So, yes, we would encourage a review of the act with respect to updating the act, improving the act, dealing with issues such as teleworkers, workers who are forced to work at home, dealing with issues pertaining to hours of work and the increased polarization of hours, those working too much overtime, those who don't have any work.

Mr Duncan: To make sure I understood you, you would prefer that these hearings cease and that we wait until we have a more complete understanding of what the government's entire agenda is before we have public hearings?

Mr O'Neil: Again, as Lewis just said and I repeat it, if you're going to have hearings and the government is going to say to us they want to review it, then they should review it, not ram it down our throats.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for the presentation. A couple of questions: One is, at the outset of Bill 49 being dropped on the floor of the Legislature, the government characterized these changes as minor housekeeping. Do you agree with the minister that's what this is, and if not, why not?

Mr O'Neil: No, I don't agree that they're minor housekeeping. I haven't seen anything that's been dropped that is looking at making improvements towards the workers' rights and vacations and pay or anything else. It just seems to me that they're going in the opposite direction.

Mr Gottheil: And it can't be qualified as minor housekeeping when you in effect, as we say in the brief, privatize the enforcement of a public statute by putting the entire load and cost burden on trade unions. It can't be qualified as minor housekeeping when the government reveals an intent to have a minimum floor and a maximum ceiling with respect to access to the public enforcement of a very crucial statute. These are not minor housekeeping issues. These are justice issues and workers are being denied access to justice in an important way.

Mr Christopherson: One last question. The minister announced this morning the withdrawal out of 49 of the flexible standards portion. We know that this government, both now and when they were in opposition, believes that trade unions only represent a very small part of the workforce and have a very narrow interest only in themselves and they constantly project that image when they speak about the labour movement.

I'd like to ask you very directly, as I did Gord Wilson this morning: What is your intent vis-à-vis Bill 49 in terms of your seeing this as an important issue and what you plan to do about it, even though arguably the largest piece that affects organized labour has been set aside for the time being? How do you see the rest of this in terms of a justice issue?

Mr O'Neil: It's not a justice issue — I mean, there's no question. We're in bargaining right now that'll have a major impact on this province and if anybody doesn't understand that, they don't understand the importance of GM, Ford and Chrysler to not only Ontario but to this country. We're not going to leave the bargaining table until we fix within the agreement what this government is trying to take away. Whether it's the Employment Standards Act, whether it's changes to the health and safety legislation, we are going to fix it at the bargaining table. That's going to, I suggest to you, wreak havoc within this province. If that means a strike with GM, Ford or Chrysler until we get what we believe is at least the minimum that we have, we're not walking away from the bargaining table. So it's going to create havoc and that's with the big employers. With the smaller employers, it'll be much tougher, but that same fight's going to go on.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Just one quick question before I pass it off to Mr Shea. Thank you for your presentation. I'm a little bit confused in that your summary, the second bullet there, states that you want a 40-hour work week maximum. Yet constituents who come into my office from Local 222 tell me that you had bargained for a 48-hour work week and the reason they're coming in now is they're concerned that you're currently going to be bargaining for a 56-hour work week. I wonder if you might be able to explain this. First of all, is it true? I haven't seen your contract, so I don't know. You negotiated for a 48-hour work week during your last negotiations?

Mr O'Neil: No, 48 hours is a requirement under the Employment Standards Act. Then the employers we bargain with use 48 hours as the yardstick.

Mr Ouellette: Okay. And then the 56, there's no truth to the 56 at all.

Mr O'Neil: Fifty-six what?

Mr Ouellette: A 56-hour workweek.

Mr O'Neil: If you give GM the right, the corporation the right, they want the right to unlimited overtime. It's not coming from the workers; it's coming from the corporations that are lobbying this government to increase 48 to 52 to 56.

Mr Ouellette: But this is something that you have the ability to bargain for, the number of hours you're able to work within the plants?

Mr O'Neil: We have the right to bargain, but if you know GM, if people are coming into your workplace and those are your constituents, you know how tough GM is going to be on the issue. We're not going away from 48 hours. You can be assured of that.

Mr Derwyn Shea (High Park-Swansea): Before I pass this over to Mr Tascona, just a quick question which picks up on a question raised earlier this morning by another member of the committee. It deals with the issue of bankruptcy and the protection of employee rights and so forth. In the last several years, at least, has the auto workers' union done any deputization with the federal government in terms of the Bankruptcy Act?

Mr O'Neil: Yes, I believe it was when the federal government under Mr Mulroney was taking a look at the revisions to the Bankruptcy Act, which ultimately occurred, that the union made very strong representations with respect to a fund or program akin to what the NDP passed in Bill 70. That was a way of satisfying first, among a variety of listed persons, unpaid claims, be it in terms of severance, termination or otherwise. Unfortunately the Progressive Conservative government at that time didn't see fit to pass what would have been a very progressive and forward-looking amendment, and the workers were left out in the cold. It took the NDP government to pass that bill. Unfortunately this government has seen fit to leave workers out in the cold by gutting that program under Bill 70.

Mr Shea: Instead of mixing up levels of government, could you perhaps just carry on? Since the change of federal government, what has happened with the current federal government to redress what you would perceive as grievances?

Mr O'Neil: My understanding is that revisions to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act are not at the top of the federal government's agenda right now.

Mr Shea: Not even yet?

Mr O'Neil: We don't have any active efforts right now in making representations to the government. If it appears that bill will be on the agenda we'll certainly be there pushing the issue for workers.

Mr Shea: So you've made no effort to have it changed in the last four years?

Mr O'Neil: We continue to present our views with respect to the need for a program to help workers. The first place to go, however, is under provincial jurisdiction. We've made our views very clear on Bill 70 and the revisions to Bill 70. That's the first place. The backup place is to the federal government, and we've made our views very clear on that. The thing is, the federal government hasn't put forward a bill in the last little while dealing with that issue so that we can concretely grab a hold of a proposed statute and work with it.

The Chair: I'm afraid we've exceeded our time. Thank you, gentlemen. We appreciate your taking the time to come before us this afternoon and make your presentation.

ALLIANCE OF MANUFACTURERS AND EXPORTERS CANADA, ONTARIO DIVISION

The Chair: Our next group up is the Alliance of Manufacturers and Exporters Canada. Good afternoon. We have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation, questions and answers. I wonder if you might introduce yourselves for Hansard.

Mr Ian Howcroft: Sure, glad to. My name is Ian Howcroft and I'm director of human resources policy with the Alliance of Manufacturers and Exporters Canada, Ontario division. With me this afternoon is Susan Houston. Susan is manager, employment issues, with Dow Chemical and a long-standing member of our human resources committee. We appreciate the opportunity to provide our comments and recommendations on Bill 49, the Employment Standards Improvement Act, to the standing committee.

Before we provide substantive comments with regard to Bill 49, I'd like to highlight a few aspects about the alliance. The Alliance of Manufacturers and Exporters Canada was created earlier this year between a merger of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Exporters' Association. We are a national voluntary organization and we have offices in all provinces. The alliance's member companies produce approximately 75% of Ontario's and Canada's manufactured output. Exports and manufacturing have driven economic growth in Canada over the last four years. Manufacturing directly accounts for 18.5% of the country's GDP. If one takes into account the indirect contribution to economic activity, the value generated by manufacturers and our suppliers is about 55% of the GDP. The value of our national exports amounts to more than 40% of GDP. These figures clearly indicate the clout and importance our members have in the economy of both Ontario and Canada.

In today's global marketplace the government must do all it can to ensure that Ontario is as competitive as possible. We must all work towards cutting costs, removing inefficiencies and creating an environment that allows our economy to grow in order to promote and support our social programs.

The alliance has been, and currently is, supportive of this government's direction and its efforts to reduce overall regulatory burdens in order to create that competitive environment that will attract investment and ultimately lead to job growth.

Consequently we support the direction of Bill 49. This bill recognizes that the role, functions and activities of government must change and take into account current economic realities. Bill 49 reduces the role of government while at the same time it protects the rights and interests of those who need the services of the employment practices branch. Overall, Bill 49 will allow the government to more effectively utilize its limited resources.

We are very pleased that the government has recognized that broader reform and a more fulsome review of the Employment Standards Act is necessary. Our members have long dealt with the problems, frustrations and waste of resources that result from the current Employment Standards Act. We therefore look forward to participating in the phase 2 review of the act which we expect will commence this fall. Bill 49 is a positive first step, but it is only a first step.

The current Employment Standards Act is extremely rigid and affords neither employers nor employees the necessary flexibility. While intended to set basic standards, the Employment Standards Act is often a disincentive to attracting investment. There is a need to reduce the onerous regulatory burdens that exist within the current act. To illustrate this, I would cite the complicated and onerous permit system that pertains to hours of work and overtime. It's clear that the current system is in need of dramatic change and reform. The current act does not take the realities of an evolving workplace into account.

There are very few people within the Ministry of Labour who understand the complete permit system and who would be able to explain it with any degree of confidence or competence. It's little wonder that the majority of employers and employees are unsure as to the specifics of the hours-of-work and overtime permit system. It would therefore be advantageous to Ontario's competitive position if the archaic, cumbersome and arcane permit system was removed. There is a great need and a great opportunity to simplify and improve the system. It is time for the Employment Standards Act and the regulations to be significantly amended to make them more relevant to today's workplace. The alliance will be providing the government ongoing input into how to positively improve our employment standards and the other workplace legislation and regulatory systems. We have provided more detail to this point in our appendix to the written submission.

At this point I'd like to provide some specific comments on the substantive aspects of Bill 49. While we are supportive of the overall direction and intent of the act, we will highlight some of our concerns and recommend that some changes be made.

The alliance supports the changes that will simplify some of the administrative aspects of the Employment Standards Act. For example, we support changes that would allow service by regular mail and those that would allow for the electronic filing of claims. In fact, we would like to have seen another administrative change included in this bill that would allow for wages to be paid or transferred by way of direct deposit into an employee's bank account. Section 7 of the current Employment Standards Act requires that an employer pay wages to an employee in cash or by cheque. The act should be amended to reflect the reality that a great number of employees receive their wages this way.

We also support the decision to use private collection agencies to pursue moneys that are due under the Employment Standards Act. Collection agencies are in the business of collecting unpaid moneys, whereas this is not a core business of the government. We support letting a private organization do what it can do better than government. Let the government do what it can do best.

We are also pleased to see that the government has taken a positive first step in reducing the possibility of a multiplicity of proceedings or duplicate proceedings taking place on the same issue or facts. Consequently, we support the proposed section that will require an individual to select whether he or she proceeds under the Employment Standards Act. It is unfair for an employer to face an employment standards claim and then face a civil action on the same facts. Also, this will reduce the number of complaints the employment practices branch has to deal with, thereby freeing up its limited resources.

On a related topic, we also support the $10,000 cap or limit on the amount that an employment standards officer can award. It is our understanding that very few claims exceed $10,000. Those that do exceed $10,000 require or involve an inordinate amount of the employment practices branch resource time. Again, this will allow for the most effective use of their limited resources. We also note that until 1991 there was a cap of $4,000 within the Employment Standards Act, excluding severance pay.

At this point I'd like to ask Susan Houston to provide some additional comments.

Ms Susan Houston: As was stated above, the alliance supports the government's direction and that of Bill 49 to increase flexibility and promote self-reliance. We do, however, have some concerns with the practical implementation of section 3 of the bill. We're pleased to hear that this morning it's been announced this will be deferred until the full review of the act. We want to emphasize our support for increasing flexibility. However, we feel this aspect can best be addressed within the context of the overall review of the Employment Standards Act. This will allow more time to ensure that all dimensions of this issue have been fully canvassed and addressed. It's quite a complex issue.

The alliance would also like to raise some questions and concerns with respect to section 20 of Bill 49. While this section encourages and promotes self-reliance, we note that there could be unintended results without changes to this area. For example, we have concerns that an arbitrator, under this provision of the Employment Standards Act, could have greater powers than an arbitrator would have traditionally to apply and interpret legislation. These powers are broader than they need to be to ensure that the requirements of the act are available to those covered by collective agreements. It should be clear in the legislation that an arbitrator has no investigative powers. He or she could only have the ability to apply the Employment Standards Act provisions and adjudicate the complaint.

Furthermore, we have concerns with regard to how an arbitrator's decision would or could be appealed and as to the standard that would be necessary in order to allow an appeal. Under arbitral jurisprudence, the decision must be appealed by way of judicial review and the standard to successfully overturn a decision requires the decision be "patently unreasonable." The judicial review process is extremely expensive and the burden is extremely onerous to meet. It may be beneficial if there were some other more accessible and affordable appeal mechanism in place for these situations. Also, the decision should be one of correctness. The standard should not be that the decision is "patently unreasonable."

It's also important to ensure that this section does not result in abuses of the act or uses of the act to pursue other agendas. Arbitrators should only be allowed to deal with substantive standards such as vacation pay, public holidays, termination pay, severance pay, pregnancy or parental leaves, minimum wage, hours of work and overtime. Excluded from this section should be such things as benefit plans, sale of a business, related employers and policy issues, as these add a dimension or complexity that could lead to unexpected results. If limits are not provided for, this section could be used to further a bargaining agenda which is not the intent of the Employment Standards Act. Consequently, we strongly recommend that changes be made in this area.

The alliance supports the changes with regard to the general time limits. We concur that the two-year time limit is too long, and a six-month limit would be a great improvement. It will allow the employment practices branch to deal expeditiously with claims filed in a timely manner, again allowing it to better focus its limited resources. We note the director will maintain discretion to extend time limits in cases where necessary conditions and circumstances warrant an extension.

We also support the extension of the time limit to apply for a review from 15 to 45 days. However, we're concerned with the limited discretion that would be afforded the director in these cases. We suggest that the director be given wider discretion, similar to that which currently exists, ie, special conditions. There have been cases involving large sums of money where it has been advantageous to allow the parties to negotiate and hopefully resolve the issue on their own. The negotiations continued with the knowledge that if they were unsuccessful, the director could use his or her discretion to extend the time. This reduced discretion may force one of the parties to quickly apply for a review, which would negatively impact the ongoing negotiations.

To summarize, the alliance supports the direction and intent of Bill 49. We feel that Bill 49 will remove some of the regulatory and administrative problems from the current Employments Standards Act. It recognizes that with declining resources the government must do all it can to effectively handle claims and ensure that those who most need the services of the employment practices branch receive that assistance. Bill 49 will allow for such allocation of resources by removing aspects that can be better dealt with in other ways. While we fully support the intent of increasing flexibility and promoting self-reliance, we feel that the provisions dealing with the greater right or benefit aspects are best deferred for full review. Bill 49 is a good first step.

This concludes the formal presentation, and we'd be pleased to answer any questions you might have.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We have just over two minutes per caucus each. We'll start with the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: Thank you for your presentation. Just one question. The minister has withdrawn section 3 of the bill, probably one of the more controversial parts of the bill, and you have indicated that you have a number of concerns that you would like to see addressed and other things that you would like to see deferred to the major study and review of the bill.

Given your comments about limited resources that governments have today, and given what the minister did this morning, do you think it's really a prudent use of taxpayers' money to go through this exercise now and start it up again in January?

Mr Howcroft: To understand your question, you mean start the second phase of the review in January?

Mr Duncan: Your organization expressed concern about making the best use of our resources. A major part of the bill was withdrawn today. You have advocated that the changes that the government has proposed are not all that significant from your perspective in terms of employment standards. Do you not think, given your comments about limited government resources, that maybe we ought to do this all at once and maybe we ought to consider the entire agenda instead of going through this exercise twice?

Mr Howcroft: We supported the government's initiative to deal with this in two phases, the first phase to deal with the more technical administrative aspects and the second phase to deal with the substantive issues where we felt flexibility could be better addressed. So we don't see this as a waste of resources at all. We're still seeing the administrative and technical aspects dealt with at this time while giving us more time and a full opportunity —

Mr Duncan: So you advocate two rounds of full public hearings and spending the money to do that when we're going to be back at this again in January? You're going to use taxpayers' —

Mr Howcroft: What we're advocating is enough time to fully consider and discuss the full dimensions of the substantive reform of the Employment Standards Act and that's going to take more time —

Mr Duncan: That's what I'm saying is because you put it on the table —

Mr Shea: Let him answer.

Mr Duncan: No, he's not answering, with all due respect.

Mr Shea: Let him finish the words.

Mr Duncan: He's not answering. You said — I didn't put this on the table — you're concerned about the use of taxpayers' dollars.

Mr Howcroft: That is a main concern, yes.

Mr Duncan: Given what you've said in your own presentation around the nature of the amendments, that they're purely administrative, that they don't affect workplace standards — which we don't agree with, by the way — and given what you said about the appropriate use of taxpayers' dollars, do you think this is an appropriate use of significant public resources, given that you yourself and your organization have now advocated that the amendments that are there are only administrative in nature?

Mr Howcroft: These administrative and technical aspects will enable the government to save more money more quickly. It will allow the government to focus resources now as opposed to waiting for some time in 1997. So yes, we view that as an effective use of resources. Allowing employment standards or employment practices officers to best focus on implementing these administrative changes, yes, I think that is an effective use of resources.

Mr Tascona: Would you be in favour of the electronic filing of appeals or electronic payment of orders?

Mr Howcroft: We haven't given that full consideration, but I think that's a direction that should be considered to see if it could work. I think technology is providing a lot of opportunities to save resources and moneys and we should be exploring new ways of doing things. So yes, I think that's something we should be looking at and will be looking at perhaps under phase 2.

Mr Tascona: Up until 1991, there was a $4,000 limitation that existed on employment standards claims and that excluded severance pay. Do you feel the limiting of ministry-investigated claims to a maximum of $10,000 to be a reasonable reform given that the previous limit and the fact that people now have to make a choice to go to court and not use government resources?

I'll give you the example of an individual, we'll say a non-union employee, a manager who receives a severance payment and termination payment that would exceed $10,000 and this legislation would require them to make a decision for the $10,000 or opt to go to court. Do you think that that's reasonable?

Mr Howcroft: I think you have to have a balance in the system and you have to have a cutoff at some point. Ten thousand dollars would address 96% to 97% of the claims currently filed. You're only dealing with very few numbers of claims over that $10,000 limit. Many of those that are already part of a civil action will be dealt with. So just ensuring that the employment practices branch can best use its limited resources to help those who perhaps need the most assistance, this $10,000 cap will assist in that regard.

The Chair: A brief supplementary, any government member? Mr Shea.

Mr Shea: Just a very quick one. In terms of questions raised earlier about the collection agencies, and you referred to this as you went by, saying you favoured the privatization, there was some concern raised earlier today in the hearings, and you may want to respond to it, about the possibility that by privatizing the collection agencies it would in fact put into place a mechanism that might put excessive pressure upon employees to settle prematurely. Have you any comment in that regard?

Mr Howcroft: Not really. I think it's best left to those who professionally go after moneys to let them do that. I saw this from the inside. I was an employment standards officer at one point and I saw cases where people didn't get anything because the ministry wasn't able to effectively go after those resources. They were not able to work quickly enough and follow the moneys around. Collection agencies would be able to provide for that kind of coverage.

The Chair: With that, thank you. We've reached our 15 minutes. Thank you both for taking the time to come and make a presentation before us here today.

Ms Houston: Thank you for your time.

JUDY FUDGE

The Chair: The next presentation will come from Ms Judy Fudge. Good afternoon. You've heard my litany about the 15 minutes, so I won't repeat myself. You've been with us so far for the whole day.

Ms Judy Fudge: I'm pleased to be able to present, though as a law professor, speaking for only 15 minutes is very difficult to do. Since 1987, I've been teaching at Osgoode Hall Law School at York University and my area of specialty is labour law. I've concentrated a lot of my research on employment standards and I was quite interested to see changes to the Employment Standards Act.

I'm particularly pleased to see Bill 49 called An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act because I've been long advocating improvements in the Employment Standards Act. But being a lawyer I looked through the fine print and I think it's false advertising to call it An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act. I think it also may be false advertising to talk about flexibility as if flexibility means the same thing to everyone. People should be flexible. It's good for their bones; they live longer.

What employers seem to mean when they say flexibility is that people should work whenever they want them to for whatever wages they want them to. When workers want flexibility, they want working times that meet their needs, they want family responsibility leaves and they want wages that they can live on. It seems to me that when we are talking about flexibility in this context, we mean that we're helping business to procure labour cheaper and to make workers work harder.

Today, I want to concentrate my remarks on the unorganized. The union movement is very good at representing its members, so I'm going to focus on that.

The Employment Standards Act in its various manifestations has a long history in Ontario. In 1920, we got our first minimum wages for women workers. We had maximum hours of work, vacation pays in the 1940s. In 1968, we got our first omnibus employment standards legislation.

The Employment Standards Act provides basic rights to all workers. It provides basic floors of maximum hours of work, overtime, minimum wages, pregnancy, parental leaves. It's particularly important for the most vulnerable workers, workers who work in the tertiary sector, in the service sectors, unorganized workers, new Canadians, women workers, but in fact it's a basic floor for all workers and the union movement has long been at the forefront of demanding basic floors because where you start helps to set off where you can end. So if you lower the floors, of course, we all get lowered off.

When I was looking through this legislation, one of the things I did was to look at the press release accompanying Bill 49. According to Labour Minister Witmer, these changes embodied in Bill 49 represent the first of a two-phase reform of the act that will cut through years of accumulated red tape, encourage the workplace parties to be more self-reliant in resolving disputes and make the act more relevant to the needs of today's workplace. They will also focus attention on helping the most vulnerable workers.

If any of my students had described this bill in this way, I would have said it was negligent misrepresentation and advised them that they would be potentially running a suit. It's not going to protect the most vulnerable workers. What this act will do is make it harder for people to enforce their rights. There's no point in talking about improving standards if people can't enjoy the basic standards that already exist. Right now we would all agree that the enforcement record of the Minister of Labour, under all the different governments, has been appalling, under Liberals, under New Democrats and under Tories. This legislation will not help these workers to get their rights and enjoy their rights; what it will do is create deterrence and barriers to seeking to enforce them.

It's easy enough to cut down claims if you make it really hard for people to pursue them, but how that can be considered as helping vulnerable people I don't really understand. So we're looking at improving the act through placing limitation periods for claims, proceedings, prosecutions and appeals. This will not improve.

I want to look at three basic areas: the time limitation periods, the monetary cap and the privatization of collections. Currently, people have two years from when the violation arose to make a claim. The minister claims that by moving it down to six months that brings it in line with other jurisdictions. That is not accurate. In British Columbia, you have six months from the termination of your employment to bring a claim, not from the fact of violation, and you have up to two years of money that you can claim. So this statement today was perhaps misleading. So she should talk to her staff about getting proper training to read legislation in other jurisdictions. It's simply untrue.

What this is, a six-month limitation period, is the lowest in Canada. In certain jurisdictions, there's no limitation period. In the federal jurisdiction, there's three years; in BC, there's two years; in Ontario, there's been two years.

The reason why a two-year period is an absolute, necessary minimum is that if you're working for an employer, the employer is not supposed to retaliate against you if you bring a claim. But we know that 90% of all claims are brought by employees who have left their place of employment. That's because they don't believe if they bring a claim that they're not going to be retaliated against. So you're forcing workers — it seems the government wants people to work and not to rely on social assistance — to decide to either bring a claim and suffer retaliation while still employed, because they've only got the six-month period, or they could wait, deal with the violation, accept it, which is really unacceptable, and then bring a claim once they've found another job. You're forcing them, by lowering this limitation period, to either decide to forgo it or suffer retaliation. Six months is simply too short. People need two years.

The $10,000 claim: Everyone points to the fact that up until 1991 there was a $4,000 max on claims, excluding severance and termination pay. That had been universally condemned by every independent commentator who ever wrote about this stuff. So we're saying, "Well, $10,000 is better than the $4,000," but the $4,000 was really, really bad. The only jurisdiction that has a monetary maximum is Prince Edward Island, at $5,000.

Why should people have to bring an action in court? Now, this is very good for my law students; several of them are unemployed. But why would you say to someone — and it may be a domestic worker, because you can have up to $20,000 or $30,000 worth of claims owing as a domestic worker — "You have two weeks. You must seek legal advice. You can make your decision. Now, if you decide to go through the Employment Standards Act, if you're owed more than $10,000, kiss the money goodbye. If you decide to go to your lawyer, seek your legal advice, pay your $150 or $200 an hour for your lawyer" — but maybe with the unemployment they'll be charging less, so who knows? Maybe it'll be cheaper if things continue on the way they are. Then you say to them, "Okay, you bring a claim."

Does anyone here know how long it takes to bring a civil action for wrongful dismissal for complainants? Six years. If someone has more than $10,000, they have to wait six years? It seems to me that's the old adage, "Justice delayed is justice denied," in this case.

If it's true that this system is so terribly backlogged and it's also true that only 4% of claims are for over $10,000, how is that going to deal with the problem? I just don't simply see how it figures out.

There is a problem of all sorts of different legal actions happening in multiple fora, but I think there's been a slight bit of misrepresentation of how the law actually works. If I bring a wrongful dismissal action for termination which is in excess of what I could get under the Employment Standards Act and an employment standards claim at the same time, the resolution of the dispute in the employment standards case is the resolution for the purposes of the court except for quantum. The courts have a very nice legal doctrine called issue estoppel that resolves this problem. How does it make sense to Ontario taxpayers to shift vulnerable workers, and maybe not so vulnerable workers, maybe people like you, to make them go to an expensive litigation mode and wait years when it costs more to go to court? It costs more for us to pay for judges. They seem to get paid more than employment standards officers and adjudicators. Why does that save money? I just don't understand. The air of unreality is hard to understand.

Privatizing collections: Something has to be done about collections because, as every academic commentator has ever said, the Employment Standards Act doesn't prevent violations; it doesn't stop people from abusing the law; it works as a collection agency — and a not very good collection agency. Two thirds of claims are not fully recovered. It's an appalling record.

Why would a private collection agency be any better than the government services when, according to the government's own internal reviews, the government's internal services are better at collecting debts owed to the government than private collection agencies? This is according to an article by Martin Mittelstaedt in the Globe and Mail, July 20, the two internal reviews.

On the basis of the only evidence we have, private collection agencies aren't as good as government services. It seems to me that if I'm a collection agency, what I want to do is to be able to make a profit. Under Bill 49, it's proposed that the collection agency could make a settlement as long as it had the written consent of the complainant, the employee who is complaining, and the settlement could be up to 75%.

Why wouldn't I just write to every employee and say, "Hey, I'll make a settlement," and then I go to the employer and I say: "Hey, I could pursue you for the full amount, and then I have to collect my fee and the government's 10% administrative charge, but if you don't give me any bother, I'll tell the employee, get his or her written consent, downgrade them to 75%. It'll cost you less, I'll get my money, we'll all be happier?"

The act specifically contemplates that this could happen, and it says that there shall be no coercion or fraud in the settlement. It specifically contemplates it but provides no mechanism of redress. You acknowledge the problem and then don't do anything to solve the problem.

It seems to me the most important thing around the Employment Standards Act is to stop the violations, not to improve collections. You're tolerating breaches of the law. I thought there were snitch lines to stop all sorts of welfare abuse; why aren't there snitch lines that you're running to stop all sorts of employer abuse?

Basically, if you are unscrupulous about abiding by the law and you're an employer who is prepared to make profits by breaching the law, you would be advised to breach this law. Your chances of a complaint are small. If there is a complaint, the chances of getting collection against an employer are small. Thirty-four per cent of the employers who do not pay up don't pay up because they refuse to — not because they're bankrupt, not because they don't have the money. They simply refuse.

It seems to me that you should be looking at ways of ensuring the effective enforcement of the legislation, and that could be done very, very easily: audits of company books to find out. In various industries and sectors where we know there are lots of violations, you go in and you do a sweep. In 1981, there used to be about 1,200 audits a year. Now there are only 21. What's happened? We know there are all sorts of violations, but there were only 27 prosecutions last year. The most penalty that you have to pay is 10%. Why would you adhere to this legislation? What's it doing for scrupulous employers to have all of these unscrupulous ones let off the hook? I'm not even so concerned about them. I'm concerned about the people who actually work. If I work for free, I like to do it for something I support, not because I don't have a government that will help me enforce my law.

It seems to me also that there should be posting in all workplaces of your basic rights and entitlements. We do that under the Occupational Health and Safety Act; we required it under pay equity. There should be aggressive prosecution and enforcement. We shouldn't think of collection and then we shouldn't shift collection to the courts and to the private collection services.

If I have any time, I'd be happy to answer any questions.

The Chair: Actually, you've timed it extraordinarily well. There are 14 seconds left in our 15 minutes. None of us around this table could give our name in that time. I think we'll beg off. Thank you very much for coming in and making a presentation and being part of our proceedings here today.

AJAX-PICKERING BOARD OF TRADE

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Ajax-Pickering Board of Trade. Good afternoon to you both. Just a reminder we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and question-and-answer. I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for Hansard.

Mr John Wiersma: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. My name is John Wiersma. I'm the president of the Ajax-Pickering Board of Trade. With me today is Lesley Whyte, our board administrator.

Our board represents some 400 businesses in the towns of Ajax and Pickering, and these businesses vary in size from approximately five employees to over 500. Our board also represents a broad cross-section of the business community, which includes the retail, the service and the manufacturing sectors.

We appreciate this opportunity to make our views known on Bill 49. Our members obviously have an intense interest in labour issues, especially the provisions contained in this bill, because they affect every employer in the province.

Let me start my comments by saying that we laud the government for its businesslike approach in trying to streamline the administration of the Employment Standards Act. The government, like the private sector, must be efficient and effective in the way it conducts its business. The provisions in Bill 49 go a long way towards making the administration of the act more user-friendly and more effective for both employers and employees.

We are also very supportive of the two-stage process with Bill 49 as the first stage devoted to the administrative issues.

In general, we are in agreement with the improvements in the limitation periods. Currently, some of these claims take too long to resolve and it is unfair to leave the employer with the uncertainty about a potential financial liability. For example, as it is now, it can take up to four years from the time of a potential violation of the act to the time an employment standards officers issues an order, and we feel that is too long, not only for employers but for employees as well, because unresolved disputes in the workplace of this nature create incredible moral problems in the workplace and they affect the entire employee group. The timely resolution of employment disputes is one of the key factors towards maintaining a healthy labour relations climate.

We endorse, therefore, the reduction in the claim notification period from two years to six months, but we continue to have some reservations concerning the two-year period reserved for ministry staff for making decisions with respect to issuing orders or refusing to issue orders. We suggest a one-year period would be much more appropriate. This would still leave up to one and a half years from the time the act may first have been violated to the issuance of an order.

Furthermore, we agree with the extension of the appeal period on orders from 15 days to 45 days. The 15-day period is too short and it does not provide the right amount of time for an employer to review the nature of an order and to prepare the case. Providing more time will likely result in better research and more appeals being withdrawn.

We endorse the maximum claim amount of $10,000 and the provision that claims over $10,000 be handled by the courts. We are encouraged by the process that provides for settling claims under $10,000 through the services of an employment standards officer prior to a full investigation. As an employer, I have firsthand experience with the professionalism that ministry staff bring to the dispute resolution process and I'm very impressed with this informal approach. This process saves both parties a great amount of time and costs. With regard to the $10,000 limit, it seems very reasonable. Claims over $10,000 are obviously more litigious in nature and they should be settled in court. There must, in my view, also be a minimum claim amount to eliminate the many small nuisance claims that could arise. This could be set by regulation, as proposed in the bill, and we suggest the minimum be set at something like $200.

We are very pleased with the provisions related to enforcement. For employees covered by bargaining units, the grievance process is an excellent vehicle for resolving these disputes. It is not clear to us from Bill 49, however, which time limitations ought to govern where a collective agreement is in place. Are the parties governed by the time limitations in the act or those in the grievance procedure? Clarification is required in this area. We suggest that the appropriate time limitations are those in the grievance process. These can normally be extended by the mutual consent of both parties if this is necessary.

We are also supportive of the provisions which prohibit contemporaneous actions under the act and in a civil court. We agree that the action should follow one process or the other, but not both. This measure eliminates duplication and reduces costs.

We endorse the contracting out of collections. Collections are better done by a collection agency that has experience in the field. In my view, it is a poor application of resources to have employment standards officers taking on this task. These are professionals and they should be dedicated to facilitating solutions between employers and employees. We agree that collection agencies need the freedom to negotiate settlements to no less than 75% of the claim if the employee consents. This flexibility will result in a greater number of claims being settled, and at a much earlier stage.

The streamlining of the current act by permitting electronic filing is going to improve the general processing of claims, and it brings the act into the 1990s. We endorse this initiative.

In conclusion, we are very supportive of this bill, with a few exceptions as noted. The bill will cause the parties to rely more on processes already in place in the workplace or, alternatively, to follow a simplified process with the help of an employment standards officer. It also avoids duplicate actions and the accompanying costs associated with the same.

Again, we thank the committee for the opportunity to participate in this hearing and we are available to answer your questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us with two minutes per caucus. We'll start with the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: I really don't have any questions, Mr Chair. The presentation is very clear.

The Chair: Mr Christopherson?

Mr Christopherson: I do. Thank you for your presentation. On the first page, you state that your members "obviously have an intense interest in labour issues, especially the provisions contained in this bill, because they affect every employer in the province." So do you think this is an important bill?

Mr Wiersma: I think it's a very important bill, yes.

Mr Christopherson: How do you think that squares with the minister, who said it's not a very important bill, that it's only minor housekeeping?

Mr Wiersma: In my view it affects every employer, as I've noted in my presentation, and I feel these issues are important.

Mr Shea: Who said it's not important?

Mr Christopherson: You'll get your chance. Go ahead, please.

Mr Wiersma: I feel that these issues affect every employer, or could potentially affect every employer; hopefully not. But I think they're important.

Mr Christopherson: I also found it interesting on page 4 where you said the minimum claim amount could be set at $200 to eliminate "small nuisance claims" that could arise. It was suggested earlier by another presenter, and I thought it was an excellent point: Does that mean you would also feel that if any employee stole from one of your members, if it was less than $200, one wouldn't pursue it in the courts or anywhere else, that it was just a nuisance matter? Because in effect, the employee has been stolen from.

Mr Wiersma: I'm not quite sure to what extent the government can expend resources on small claims. It's a matter of concern; I don't know how the government would handle that. To me, that would be done by setting a minimum amount. That's not to say that these are not important issues, but I don't know if it's a wise use of resources to spend a lot of time on a $200 claim.

Mr Christopherson: I would suggest to you that given the fact that the Employment Standards Act is the bill of rights for workers and affects those who don't have collective agreements even more than others, they're the people who need the $200 and could probably least afford any legal advice and assistance or afford to take time off work to get it through Small Claims Court, so in effect you're saying their $200 doesn't count.

Mr Wiersma: I didn't say that. I said for them it's important. I'm not sure if the government has the resources to commit itself to resolving those disputes.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much, John and Lesley, for your presentation and comments. Just a very quick reference: In your introductory remarks, you mention that your organization represents some 400 employers in the Ajax-Pickering area. I'm just curious. Would those employers be non-unionized, representing unionized workplaces or a mixture of both?

Mr Wiersma: Maybe I can ask Lesley to answer that question.

Ms Lesley Whyte: A unionized environment would probably be minimal. About 65% of our membership are small business. We target those as fewer than six employees. About 10% is large business, and that 10% would probably fall into a unionized environment.

Mr O'Toole: So the smaller businesses tend not to be organized?

Ms Whyte: No. Actually, they're quite organized, especially when we take issues like this to them. We do it through survey.

Mr O'Toole: In your humble opinion, do you see a fairness in the workplace today? There are a lot of entrepreneurs out there trying to create work and income for themselves and others. Do you see a fairness in the workplace among employers, the new employers? We're all told that the future for employment is small employers, that the large corporate entities of both unions and companies are kind of going the way of the history lesson. In your small businesses, do you see fairness in their relationship with their employees?

Mr Wiersma: Maybe I can try to address that. I personally am involved with a business of about 50 employees. We have a bargaining unit. I believe that among medium-sized employers, there really is an effort made to try to work with employees — they're our most important resource — and treat them fairly. I can't speak for the small businesses per se.

Mr O'Toole: The point I was trying to make is that the world of work itself indeed is changing and the world of the unorganized workplace is probably the highest growth area, and that represents a threat to the organization of labour itself. We're seeing downsizing and competition. Do you think this act or these small changes allow the small employer to deal with the Employment Standards Act itself, making it more workable in administrative ways?

Mr Wiersma: Absolutely. I believe it really streamlines it and makes it more understandable. I read through the act. I had no difficulty understanding it. The enforcement of it is going to be a lot of more successful if these amendments are approved.

Mr O'Toole: That's the intent of this government.

I want to correct a comment made earlier by one of my partners here. The minister certainly did not dismiss the importance. The whole focus of these provisions is to protect the most vulnerable — those are the words she uses repeatedly — and use of scarce resources, which is another thing that should be clarified.

The Chair: Thank you both. We appreciate your taking the time to come before us here today.

ONTARIO PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES UNION

The Chair: That leads us up to our next presentation, the Ontario Public Service Employees Union. Good afternoon, Ms Casselman.

Ms Leah Casselman: Non-frightened union people. Good afternoon. With me today is Robert Rae, who chairs our employee relations committee with the Ministry of Labour. You will be hearing from him tomorrow on the specifics of the impact of this oxymoronically termed document about improving employment standards.

OPSEU is participating in the review of Bill 49, representing the unionized women and men of the Ministry of Labour who enforce provisions under the act you're reviewing today. We also represent about 100,000 other members of the provincial public service, the community college system and about 300 units within the broader public sector, small groups that are seeking to be unionized.

We appreciate your invitation to appear and the fact that these hearings are even taking place. It is some evidence that, unlike the important contribution of public employees, the roles of opposition parties and public debate are not yet reviewed merely as red tape to be cut wherever possible.

We are vitally concerned about the future of the Employment Standards Act as one of the underpinnings of the basic rights of workers in this province — workers who are taxpayers, who contribute to the economy. We will comment briefly on key elements of this legislation and indicate why it should be set aside pending a full review of the act later this year.

First, we must indicate that it is most troubling to be pledged full consultation on employment standards, only to see Bill 49 introduced as "housekeeping" and set for quick passage. If passed in its present form, Bill 49 will result in much greater hardship, especially for the thousands of vulnerable and low-paid employees who continue to be victimized every year by illegal employment practices, including domestic workers, visible minority workers, women and those in the cleaning, food services and garment industries.

Bill 49 will also greatly ease the pressure on employers to comply with assessments for back wages and related entitlements. It will deprive Ontario workers of the protection of at least the minimal standards of hours of work, overtime pay, holidays, vacation and severance pay. Key amendments to the act in Bill 49 appear designed to undermine the concept of statutory standards to discourage employees from seeking redress and, through a reckless privatization scheme, offload the province's responsibility for enforcement.

We will briefly comment on some specific provisions of the proposed act.

Even though I understand the minister recanted on the removal of section 3 this morning, I would still like to comment on that, because as we've seen before, these things can come back in a different format.

Section 3 replaces 22 years of statutory minimal workplace standards with a contracting-out provision that permits negotiated collective agreements to override legislated standards on severance pay, overtime, public holidays, hours of work and vacation pay if, when assessed together, a greater right is conferred. While the section applies to organized workplaces only, it is evident from public statements by the minister and senior staff that the government hopes to soon extend this drastic change to unrepresented workplaces.

How is a "greater good" at section 3(3) of the bill to be determined? Negotiations will undoubtedly become more arduous and confrontational. Unions and employers will be forced to bargain over a broader range of matters and grapple with identifying equivalencies between different benefits and terms and conditions. Monetary benefits will get compared to non-monetary matters, and nebulous global packages will struggle to replace the statutory floor of minimum entitlements. What kind of smorgasbord of rights and entitlements will end up before arbitrators, leading to lengthy and expensive delays? Proposals at section 3 of the bill will prompt employers to table rollbacks of standard entitlements. What other conclusion can we draw in the absence of explicit legislative language on how a negotiated package is to be assessed?

Flexible standards, as promoted in section 3, will certainly not advance the ministry objective of workplace self-reliance. By permitting workplace parties to contract out of important minimum standards, the government assumes a balance of economic power is at play whereby fair tradeoffs will be achieved. But we anticipate many more harsh conflicts and diminishing working conditions, especially in smaller and newly organized workplaces.

The fact that up to a third of employers already have been found to be violating the Employment Standards Act is evidence enough. To paraphrase Tommy Douglas — you can explain to them who that is later — "'Let's have greater self-reliance,'" said the elephant as he danced among the chickens."

Obviously OPSEU is very concerned when vital public service work is contracted out to for-profit agencies; doubly so when that work defends the living standards of workers who suffer from illegal employment practices. This is the case in section 28, the privatization element of Bill 49. We urge committee members to ask hard questions about the gaps in accountability to both complainants and the public inherent in these amendments. Public employees report through the deputy minister to you, the legislators. The effectiveness of our work can be directly scrutinized. Employment standards officers and their co-workers do not have a direct personal financial interest in the percentage of an assessment for back wages collected from employers.

On the other hand, what incentive does a private operator have to make every effort to recoup the full rate of assessed wages owing to an employee? Why are there only passing references in the new subsection, 73.0.2(1), as to the conditions that the director can impose on private collectors and on "reasonable" fees and disbursements? Why are there no provisions setting out sanctions for private operators who collect assessments through fraud or coercion? Why the cavalier approach to spending public dollars when it involves privatization? Finally, why is it not evident that permission for private collectors to arrange compromised settlements raises the likelihood of abuse and further exploitation of workers?

These are among the reasons we label the Bill 49 approach to collections as reckless. If more evidence is required, as Judy Fudge was saying earlier, look at last year's study of the central collection services agency within your own Management Board of Cabinet. This review found the public service collections function to have a much better rate of return and a better cost-to-revenue ratio. The same review expressed concern about the cost of private sector agencies being used by that ministry. Fees averaged 23%. The tactics, language and practices of private collection agencies, including creaming more lucrative accounts, were found to be troublesome. A full review of the Employment Standards Act should precede any decisions about private collection.

OPSEU is fully aware of the weak rate of recovery of funds by the employment practices branch. Dedicated employment standards staff require more resources, not fewer, to prevent violations of rights in the first place, to conduct audits, to seriously fine and prosecute lawbreakers, and to protect complainants from reprisals. There are 40,000 formal complaints a year and five times as many general inquiries. This is no time to lay off over 400 ministry staff, 10% of those working in enforcement.

Professor Judy Fudge from Osgoode Hall has described in her study on employment standards how the meagre resources put towards recovering funds for cheated workers contrasts markedly with the spending spree to recoup alleged welfare fraud.

Section 20 of Bill 49 eliminates access by union members to the investigation and enforcement services of the Ministry of Labour. As with the privatization of collections, we seriously question amendments that put enforcement of a vital component of public legislation at the mercy of the private arbitration process. This should no more be permitted than should victims of crime be obliged to pay the local crown attorney to prosecute the abuser. How can arbitrators be expected to have the investigative resources and expertise of the Ministry of Labour in adjudicating increasing complex matters?

OPSEU is deeply troubled at sections 19 and 21 of the proposed act because they force non-unionized workers with complaints to make an either/or choice between access to the employment standards branch and a lengthy civil suit that few people can afford. Onerous time limits of just two weeks are also imposed on this unacceptable choice.

These new conditions on access to justice are exacerbated by the new maximum claim limit of $10,000 on recoverable moneys for back wages, vacation, severance and termination pay. Hundreds of awards under the act are being made every year in excess of this new cap. It is only reasonable to expect that the most modestly paid workers in the province are also the least likely to be able to pay legal fees or withstand a lengthy wait for a civil suit to be completed.

OPSEU members are workers drawn to public service. We frequently assist victims of rogue employers when they visit the legal clinics, social services or health care facilities that we staff. We urge you to safeguard open access to publicly funded ministry services where employment standards claims ought to be pursued without an imposition of a maximum.

By replacing the existing two-year limit on claims for back pay with one of just six months in section 32, Bill 49 fails to recognize the serious hardships that are bound to follow. Vulnerable workers take a much longer time to feel safe enough once they have moved to a new job or to become well informed enough to assert their rights. It is inappropriate to impose legislation that radically diminishes their ability to recover moneys owed to them. This restriction is particularly worrisome when coupled with the other limitation period changes at section 32 whereby prosecutions under the act may now take a total of four years.

Finally, we wish to point out that there are modest improvements in the act set out in Bill 49. They should remain in place when a full review of this act takes place this fall. These include the clarification in access to at least two weeks' vacation pay in section 8 and clarification of seniority credits for time on parental and pregnancy leave in section 12 of the bill.

To wrap up, OPSEU questions the rush to quickly pass drastic amendments to the Employment Standards Act in advance of a thorough review of the statute later this year. The proposed changes to the act, as set out in Bill 49, constitute a very unhealthy development for individual workers in Ontario, for the living standards of average and modest income families, and in turn for the provincial economy in general.

Truly flexible, self-reliant workplaces and greater productivity are derived not from deregulated working standards, longer hours, unpaid overtime, lower minimum vacation and severance pay or elusive contracted-out enforcement. These production advantages come from a commitment to superior training, fair wages and benefits, safe, healthy workplaces and enlightened management practices that embrace employees' contributions.

As long as Ontario employers fail by as much as one in three to abide by even minimum workplace regulations as currently set out in the Employment Standards Act, the requirement remains for a rigorous, well-resourced government commitment to uphold and enforce minimum working conditions for every worker in an effective and timely manner. The people of Ontario deserve no less.

The Chair: Ms Casselman, we've got one and one quarter minute, so there will only be one question and it will be the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: You would be of the view then, Ms Casselman, that prior to adopting a statute like Bill 49, we need to know the government's entire agenda and have a full debate around the Employment Standards Act amendments they'll eventually bring forward?

Ms Casselman: Clearly. I mean, you've got different arms of the government doing all kinds of things and making all kinds of different rules. The speaker before me talked about the waste of time for a government to go after claims of $200, and yet if you're a welfare worker, you are ordered by law to go after anything over $2. So where's the combination of any kind of consistency from this government?

We need to know what the whole plan is here. Even business columnists in newspapers are referring to their agendas as Alabamas of the north. That's not the way to build an economy to ensure there is a livelihood for everyone who is a member of that society.

The Chair: Thank you again for taking the time to come before us here this afternoon. We appreciate your presentation.

LABOUR BEHIND THE LABEL COALITION

The Chair: The next presentation will be the Labour Behind the Label Coalition. As you've undoubtedly heard me say to previous groups, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between a presentation and question-and-answer period. Would be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the benefit of Hansard.

Ms Shelly Gordon: I'm Shelly Gordon. I'm here representing a coalition of groups called the Labour Behind the Label Coalition. With me are Fanny Yuen from the home workers' association and Bob Jeffcott from the Jesuit Centre for Social Faith and Justice, who may help me with answering questions if I leave any time for that.

The Labour Behind the Label Coalition is a coalition of unions, social justice groups, immigrant women's groups, international solidarity groups, church groups and unions — I said that already — concerned with working conditions in the garment industry. So what I want to talk about today is employment standards in the garment industry, Bill 49 and the garment industry, because what our coalition has come together to do is to try and promote better working conditions in the garment industry both locally and internationally to sort of exert some counterpressure on the low wage competition in that industry and the kind of exploitation that it leads to both here and abroad.

What I want to talk about is the situation of garment workers in Ontario — most of them are in Toronto, but not all of them — the importance of vigorous enforcement of the Employment Standards Act for those workers, the effect that the changes proposed in Bill 49 might have on those workers, and then what our suggestions would be for improving enforcement of the act for those workers.

I think you all know that until the late 1980s, garment manufacturing was the single biggest industry in terms of employment in Metro Toronto, or maybe in the city of Toronto. A lot of factories have closed since then, about half the factories, but the industry is not dead. There are still at least 21,000 workers in that industry in Metro, and those are the ones that we can count. Those are not the ones who are home workers and those are not the ones who are in sweatshops that only operate a week or two and then move to some other location.

The way that garments are produced in Toronto has changed substantially since the late 1980s, with factories closing and with small sweatshops kind of taking their place and with contractors giving more and more work to home workers, people who sew these garments in their homes. I think members of the committee would be quite surprised to know what clothes are being sewn in people's homes. It's major retail chains in the malls, it's high-end designer stuff, it's a lot of women's clothes. You would be quite surprised. It sells for a good price in the store.

The whole move from factories to home workers and sweatshops, as I said, both here and abroad, is to try and lower the wage costs of production of garments. I guess our position is that people should be able to earn a decent living working both here and wherever else these clothes we are wearing are made, and that's what we're working towards.

I'd like to tell you one particular story. I think people are going to bring a lot of stories forward to you, but those of us who are bringing them spend our days working with both organized and unorganized workers who are having problems with their employers whose employment standards are being violated. You may not have spent a lot of time talking to people like that, so maybe we can bring the benefit of our experience to the committee.

Minister Witmer indicated this morning that she's familiar with the situation of garment workers, and she is and has indicated her support for our campaign in the past, so I hope we'll see it continuing.

I'm sure you know that people who work in their homes are covered by the Employment Standards Act for minimum wage and for other provisions of the act. So even though they're paid a piece rate, they're entitled to minimum wage. In fact, home workers, in the last three years I guess, are entitled to a 10% premium on minimum wage in recognition that they have to pay expenses for other costs of production like electricity and space and thread and their own sewing machines and stuff. So in Ontario now, industrial home workers are entitled to $7.54 an hour. Even though they're paid at a piece rate, contractors are expected to — well, in your own industry you know how long it takes to make so many something-or-others, so you set the piece rate at how many pieces you need to sew in an hour. So if a contractor drops off a bundle at somebody's house on Friday night, wants them back Monday morning, and says that will be 25 cents a sleeve, the expectation then has to be that a person can reasonably sew enough sleeves in an hour to make $7.54 an hour.

How the act has worked in the garment industry now — I just want to use one example but I guess what's unusual about this is that the garment worker has actually pursued it through the Employment Standards Act. That's the only unusual aspect of it. It happens to thousands of workers.

Mrs Y was a skilled sewer in the garment industry in Toronto most of her adult life. She worked in factories, and when they were closed, one of her employers offered her home sewing and she took it. She didn't get paid minimum wage for her work, and her permit with the ministry actually said she'd be paid even more than minimum wage for her work, quite a bit more. But she kept the work because in the industry there's not a whole bunch of contractors who are paying minimum wage and then a few bad apples. Almost nobody is paying minimum wage. So you don't throw away the contractors who don't pay you that in hopes that you can work for one of the two that does. Some contractors, it goes up and down. It depends on what the retailer is going to pay them. I won't go through the whole chain of what happens in the garment industry now, who is controlling the price points and how that affects wages. There's a whole lot to be said about it, but it takes too long.

So she worked for this contractor for about four years, and after four years she finally did speak up for herself. She thought: "I've got a lot of experience with this guy. I've done really good work for him. It's time that I said, hey, what about my" — it wasn't $7.54 then, but whatever the minimum wage was. She asked that question once and she never saw that guy again. She waited a few weeks and called him up and said, "When are you bringing something else over?" He said, "I'm not." That was it. He just basically terminated her for inquiring about the rate.

She filed a complaint for wages owing for two years, and vacation and termination pay. She filed that claim with the Ministry of Labour in December 1993. The claim, over two years, amounted to about $10,000. Here's another example where, isn't $10,000 a claim from some executive who was wrongly dismissed? Well, no. It's not necessarily the case at all. Maybe some of them are. We don't work with anybody like that, so other people will have to tell you that story.

The ministry took exactly two years to come to a conclusion about her case, and it's still in dispute. Hearing dates have been set all the way into 1997. So her case isn't settled yet and it may not be settled in her favour; I can't determine that. But for the purposes of our discussion, let's say that it is and that she was owed $10,000 for two years' work. That's about a full year's wages for her. She was making $12,000 to $14,000 in a really good year doing what she was doing. So she's owed a full year's wages and it's four and a half years since she started doing the work and she hasn't got that money yet.

Her case points out several problems with the way the Employment Standards Act has been enforced to date, and unfortunately we don't think Bill 49 addresses these. We understand Bill 49 is the act to address enforcement, not the content of the act.

I've already commented on the time lines. The ministry has four years to deal with a claim between the investigation and going after the money. Now Bill 49 proposes to limit the worker's access to six months, the investigation period to six months, and leave that four years at the ministry level intact. I would like to propose a reversal of that, that the ministry have six months to conduct an investigation and that workers retain their two-year time period.

The reason I want to do that is, I think nobody has said to you really clearly today that when you complain to an employer who is knowingly violating the Employment Standards Act that they are doing so, that is your last minute of work with that employer. I could just tell you story after story. If it's somebody who's doing it by mistake, they'll probably correct it, but in an industry based on getting the lowest possible wages, that's your last minute of work. People don't complain because they'll be fired.

What you're saying to people with a six-month limit is, "As soon as you find out, you go down to the ministry and you tell them." Like Professor Fudge said, that's a choice between your job and your rights. You have to make that choice before you go down to the ministry. What people do now is they wait until they find something else, reasonably enough. They want to work in order to make a living. That's how they want to make their living, working, so they do what they can. In an industry like the garment industry where everybody's trying to pay way less than minimum wage, everybody's paying as little as possible, you don't have a whole lot of options. "I'm going to drop this bad egg and go work for one of the good ones." It's a shrinking industry and it's a period of very high unemployment.

So this case, Mrs Y finds out the employer's not going to give her any more work, she's terminated. But she waited a few weeks: Is he coming back? Is he not coming back? Then she kind of explored what were her options under the law and made a decision and it was actually several months before she filed a case. She would have lost, then, her entire claim period. Fanny can talk about this some more.

Other home workers have said, "What happens to giving employers the benefit of the doubt for a couple of weeks?" You know, "I can't pay you today," or "The cheque bounced today," or "I can't pay this month; can you hang on?" Your claim period starts to tick. You've been reduced to six months anyway. What if you wait? You can't afford to wait any more if it gets reduced to six months. I really think the two-year limit is the one that's going to have the biggest impact.

People stay in bad jobs because they need bad jobs and they look for something else. If they know they're getting ripped off, they look for something else and as soon as they find it — they're owed that money. What we say to them now is, "You're owed that money and you don't give it up by keeping on working for a living for that person until you find somebody else." But the six-month time limit would change that.

There are other parts of Bill 49 that we think will have a negative impact on garment workers. It's both the minimum and maximum amounts that people have spoken to you about. The work's been done; people are owed the money. I don't see what's fair about saying to the worker, "Well, you got ripped off for too much or you got ripped off for too little; the ministry's not going to do anything about it." The work's been done. The money is owed under the act, and as far as I'm concerned it should just be payable. That some of it's too little and some of it's too much, I don't see the fairness in putting that forward at all.

The other proposal in Bill 49 we were worried about in the garment industry was the one the minister said this morning she would defer, around allowing unions and employers to contract out of some employment standards. There are very few unionized shops left in the garment industry and you can bet that if one negotiates no overtime until 56 hours, at all the non-union shops in the area the workers are not going to be able to say, "No, no, we get overtime pay after 44 hours; it's just the unionized shop that doesn't get overtime pay until 56 hours." It's just the whole ripple effect of, in the workplaces where workers are strongest, that they should take some lesser — you know that it's going to be rippling throughout the rest of the workforce.

People have talked as well about what it would mean for someone who earns $10,000, $12,000 or $14,000 a year to go to court. To go to court for $10,000, you have to hire a lawyer, so where in the family resources there would be money for a lawyer would not be clear. It just couldn't happen. People would just have to give up what they were owed.

I want to talk briefly about — oh, I'm giving up all our time — what we think would improve enforcement of the act. In the States, the Department of Labour, knowing that the garment industry is like this, has taken on doing sweeps of the industry. What we argue for is that — you know, there are certain industries which can be identified that are based on low wages — the ministry take a very proactive approach and do a lot of spot audits. When they get a complaint from one employee, take a quick look at the books when they're in there. Are the other employees getting ripped off too? There are a whole bunch of proactive things ministry staff could do to just make it — Judy talked a lot about you're not likely to get caught, and if you are likely to get caught, you'll only pay the one person. There are some easy ways to change that and to encourage compliance with the act through letting employers know they won't just get away with it forever.

One of the other things we've argued is that, to try to protect workers from losing their jobs, one of the ways is to, as a matter of course, take complaints from third-party representatives, legal clinics or lawyers or unions or such, where we know there's a widespread violation. It just protects the particular workers there.

I'd better speed up. Those are our recommendations for improved enforcement. We will be back to discuss the contents of the Employment Standards Act, and we really look forward to that, to try to bring changes to the act that will protect the new workforce, the changing workforce.

Minister Witmer in 1992 and 1993 supported the demand for stronger enforcement from the Coalition for Fair Wages and Working Conditions for Homeworkers and we really hope we can count on her continued support, both through Bill 49 and the review of the Employment Standards Act. We've enclosed some of the letters she wrote to our sister coalition then and hope she'll continue to support us. Thank you very much for your time.

The Chair: You're just over 15 minutes. Thank you very much for taking the time to come down and make your presentation for us today. We appreciate it.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES LIBRARY WORKERS COMMITTEE

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Canadian Union of Public Employees library workers committee. Good afternoon, and again we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and questions and answers. Mr Burdick, I take it?

Mr Steve Burdick: That's right, thank you. My name is Steve Burdick. I'm the chair of the library workers committee in CUPE. I'm not going to go through the brief which we've prepared for you and of which I've given copies to Mr Arnott to distribute to you all, as well as those of you who could not be here today. But I do want to highlight some of the important things and see if you'd like to ask some questions.

I guess by way of preliminary I should mention that it's not necessarily my expectation that all the members of this committee will be equally familiar with the library sector. It's an important sector in Ontario and one that's received a fair amount of attention from previous governments as well as the current government.

By way of introduction further, I should let you know that we, as the library workers committee, are one of the jurisdictional groups within Ontario's municipal employees' coordinating committee, which represents a little over a third of the 170,000 workers in CUPE Ontario. The library workers committee itself more directly represents about 4,500 workers: some 50 or so public libraries in Ontario, almost all of the large and middle-sized institutions in the province and a number of the smaller ones, as well as a few university and college-type libraries.

I should tell you a little bit about the sector before I talk about what seems to be going on with the Employment Standards Act and the changes the present government wishes to make to that act.

First of all, it's our contention, and I think it's a contention that the provincial government has to some extent accepted previously, that the library sector is a key sector in the economy of this province. We all know that Ontario, like the rest of the country, is deeply enmeshed in what's now called the information age. Public libraries are a key element in making sure the public has access and use of the proliferation of this information and some way of navigating through this enormous amount of information.

The information we have and make available to the public serves it economically, of course. Small and even large-sized businesses rely on us considerably for the assistance we can provide in getting them timely and comprehensive information. There's no question that the library sector continues to be, de facto, part of the educational structure of this province. A constriction of the resources available in the educational sector has really meant that students and their teachers point to the libraries of this province more and more to enhance, complete, do all the things that they need to do for which they don't now have the resources. The resources they have, they find to be dwindling.

At the same time, we have a lot of pressures. The first one is that the demographics of the province are changing rapidly, which basically means we have a lot of users now and we're increasingly having more such users, particularly in the large urban centres, whose first language is neither English nor French. Our collections have got to be changed to reflect that so they can have some use of this sector. The ways we provide service also have to be changed. This is a very real concern for us. This goes both to English as a second language but also to a whole host of other materials.

We also have an enormous amount of financial pressures. I won't recite all the figures — I'm sure you know them as well as I do — but the long and the short of it is that directly the library sector has suffered enormously over a two-year period in which we're now entering the end of the first year, and we suffered indirectly through the cuts in transfer payments to the municipalities on which most of our middle- and large-sized libraries particularly rely, as do many of our smaller libraries. Cuts in the program grants and the per-household grants have also been a problem, as well as in the direct reductions to the special service boards, and that goes to the OLS south and north and Metro Reference. So that's a big problem.

We're supposed to be providing the same, in fact better, service, with fewer resources. That's a problem.

At the same time, the technology itself is bringing many, many changes to us. The past government and the current government have retained this, to some extent have provided a lot of capital resources so that libraries can get hooked into information sharing and distribution. That's great. There's been some money made available for staff training, which is a key component of all of this, perhaps not enough, but at least that's been there. Basically the technology has meant a lot more pressures on our service as we try to cope with that and rejig our services.

While all of this is happening, how do you think library administrators are responding? They're responding by being very tough these days. The way they're being tough is showing up in collective bargaining, which has now resumed after the social contract has lapsed; and it's also showing up in an increased number of health and safety problems, particularly around workplace stress, RSIs and problems that have to do with the new technology and the increased work pressures. The work pressures are enormous in our sector right now.

This does translate into more discipline problems. It translates into more dismissal problems. It basically translates into more problems where workers are likely to have recourse to the Employment Standards Act or whatever legislation follows it. Now, it's true we represent most of the organized workers. The employers there, of course, are dealing with us in collective bargaining through their unions. But the small libraries in this province are largely still unorganized. Those workers are very vulnerable, and if they are dismissed or they're disciplined, they don't have a lot of resources to turn to, so our committee is very concerned about them, as well as everybody else.

I'm not going to go through in great detail some of the general concerns that are in the OFL and the CUPE Ontario submissions; I'm sure you've seen those already. They cover a whole host of items, chief of which have to do with the enforcement provisions, whether there is or is not a collective agreement, the maximum and minimum claims, the use of private collectors and the limitation periods. All of these things are touched upon in our brief and I refer you to that.

I think what most concerns our committee, however, is this whole notion of flexible standards, the changes that, I gather from the previous speaker, the minister is considering deferring at this time. In the event that she doesn't or in the event that's still up in the air, I want to get our two cents' worth in on it. Those of course are the changes at subsection 3(3) of the bill.

I guess our concern here is that, given the enormous pressures our sector is under, there's no question that employers are going to try to make some sense of this provision. I have to tell you, with the greatest of respect, that the provision itself is very unclear, because I think it's going to be very hard for employers or unions to figure out how to assess the varying value on a single scale of the various rights that are referred to at that section. For example, if we, under a collective agreement, have better rights for severance, but similar rights under vacation or our wages are better, how are we going to roll all these things together if the employer comes to us and says, "Well, we're proposing cutting something here below what's in the Employment Standards Act"? It's going to be very hard. That lack of clarity is certainly only going to add to the bitterness at the table. I assure you, there will be a lot of bitterness at the table, not just because of the substantive changes, but because it's going to be very hard interpreting this particular provision.

In the light of all the pressures that are already present in our sector, we know that employers are going to be difficult. The bargaining has begun in this province and we're seeing very difficult bargaining right now, particularly in the library sector, as in the municipal sector. I would urge you to give real serious consideration to not going ahead with the amendments that are in this bill.

Those are basically my remarks and I'd be only too happy to expand on them if you have some questions.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate your submission. Thank you. I noticed on page 7 you talked about the time restrictions — two years to six months. We've heard from a couple of business organizations — chambers and other associations — where they talk about the fairness to employers in terms of the timeliness of these sorts of things. Could you just expand a bit on why you see this being so unfair in the scheme of things in terms of balance between employers' rights and employees' rights?

Mr Burdick: My concern is that we're unaware that the existing provisions have been more of a problem for employers than they have been for employees. As the previous speaker was saying, for employees there's a real problem around reprisals. Let me assure you that reprisals are not only a fact in the non-unionized sector; they are also a fact in the organized sector. In many cases, employees will be reluctant to file claims as soon as they're aware that they've got a problem because they know that filing that complaint is only going to make them even less attractive to the employer.

In a non-organized situation, this may, as the previous speaker said, amount to the choice between a job and the application of one's rights. In an organized situation, it may not be quite so drastic a predicament, but it can be a very unpleasant predicament. The employee will be, in all likelihood, labelled as a problem employee — I've seen that happen — and one complaint is not the end of the issue. The employer doesn't say: "Oh well, we've got a problem. Let's just get on with life as usual." Other problems suddenly start appearing and one thing leads to another. That's why we don't think it's particularly appropriate to start changing these limitation periods. I hope that's helpful to you.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, very. You mentioned early in your comments the impact on information, any less information not being available to particularly those that don't have research departments and all kinds of staff to go and look things up in terms of one's rights and ability to defend them. In its extreme, how far could you see that going in terms of the lack of libraries being as efficient and as effective and accessible to the average working person, who has maybe no other means of getting that information, if things continue down the road they are? What's the tie-in between that and the Employment Standards Act and the rest, quite frankly, of the labour agenda of this government?

Mr Burdick: I obviously can't speak extensively on the rest of labour's agenda with respect to this act or this government. My concern is that the library sector is, on the one hand, a very key sector for this province; on the other hand, it's under enormous pressure right now. What I'm trying to say to you, perhaps not as clearly as I could, is that this act does nothing to abate those pressures. In fact, it's going to heighten those pressures, and those pressures will probably inevitably translate into worsened working relationships. They're going to translate into things that are going to make life in the workplace that much harder. They will probably therefore translate into a less efficient workplace and a workplace that's got fewer staff, and the information age is not going to exist properly without staff who help the public somehow navigate through the enormous amount of information. That's the very real problem, that things that make the workplaces less effective are not in the interests of this government, these workers or this public.

Mr Tascona: This act essentially deals with enforcement of the act, but there is one area that deals with the minimum standards, and that is dealing with pregnancy and parental leave. Do you feel that what the government has done to clarify the length of service and what service means for pregnant and parental leave employees — do you think the action we've taken there is satisfactory?

Mr Burdick: To the best of my recollection, that was one of the more positive aspects of the act. I don't recall having a problem with that, but I stand to have those comments reviewed in light of what's in the OFL or the CUPE briefs.

Mr Tascona: Certainly that's what they in fact do — they improve the rights of those individual employees — so I'm pleased to hear that.

With respect to reprisal for an individual employee who exerts their rights under the act and the limitation period, the facts really would show that if someone is disciplined or terminated because they exercise their rights under the act, certainly a six-month limitation period would be a sufficient period for someone to exercise their rights and say, "Hey, you terminated me because of what I did about a claim for overtime pay and I'm enforcing my rights," because the majority of the rights are exercised within that six-month time limitation. Were you saying that or do you mean something else?

Mr Burdick: No, I'm not unsaying that. Also, you should be mindful that many problems under the act have to do with continuing violations, and workers will be rightly concerned about that. In other words, it isn't just something that happens one time and it's over and done with; it may be a long-term situation that requires the employee waiting a little bit longer to make sure they've got everything in place. In terms of the reprisals, I'm sure you're aware, as I am, that it can be very difficult to show that an employee was disciplined or dismissed solely because the employer is taking action against them, solely because they used their rights. The employer, 99 times out of a 100, will get up and say: "That's not really what's at issue here. What's at issue is that this employee was a problem."

Mr Tascona: But nothing has changed under the act where the onus of proof is on the employer, and in fact there's no change with respect to the two-year time frame from when an officer has to receive the complaint to actually issue the order. There's nothing changed in terms of the investigation process, so that's another safeguard that's been put in place.

With regard to your general comments about the library workers in particular, and being a representative involved with CUPE, is the concern you have in the library sector with respect to the degree of professionalism or the level of human resources expertise that's a problem in the library field?

Mr Burdick: It's not so much a problem, in my view, with the level of expertise or the quality of the staff. The problem is all the pressures I indicated before are going in a particular direction, and the direction they're going in means that most of the time now staff are not able, because of operational pressures, to use the skills and training they have. The cases are endless where our people at a public reference desk cannot give the public the service that they have been trained to give, that they want to give. They have got to run people through far too quickly, and the reason for that, I'm sorry to say, is because much more attention has been paid to technology than has been paid to staff. Our employee populations are dwindling, our technology in most cases is increasing, but the technology is simply not filling the gap.

Mr Tascona: Maybe we should be reviewing the Public Libraries Act then.

Mr Burdick: I understand there's a lot of interest in that.

The Chair: We've run over our time here. Thank you, Mr Burdick. We appreciate your taking the time to come before us here today.

SUPER FITNESS TELESWORKERS SUPPORT GROUP

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Super Fitness Telesworkers Support Group. Good afternoon.

Ms Anne-Marie Foster: My name is Anne-Marie Foster and I work for Super Fitness doing telemarketing.

Ms Aileen Joy: My name is Aileen Joy. I also work for Super Fitness doing telemarketing.

Ms Foster: I have three children: 16, 12 and one soon to be four years old. To tell you a little about what led me up to Super Fitness, a bit of my brief background, four years ago I left an alcoholic, abusive man after 14 years of marriage, went to a shelter, went for counselling for a year and half, went into my own apartment with no furniture or clothing because he destroyed it. Struggling, being a single parent, when I did leave my ex-husband, I found out I was six or seven weeks' pregnant, which I did not abort because I'm against abortion.

I was struggling with three kids. The government — Harris — as you know, had cut $351 off my cheque per month, being a single mother on mother's allowance. It was very hard for me to be on the system because I've never been on it before and I worked, so I've learned to swallow my pride. When you have children to support, there's not much you can do.

After you did the cutback, I found myself very hard. I started going to food banks two times a month. I know Tsubouchi is saying tuna, but my kids don't like tuna, so what can you do? I'm sorry; I'm not trying to be sarcastic. I'm very annoyed at the way the government is handling people on the system. I know there are people who do abuse it and people and who don't, like me. Right now I'm taking stress and anti-depression pills to deal with all the problems.

As of a year and two months ago, my son, who was then two and half, my youngest one, I had enrolled him in day care for subsidy. I was still waiting after three years to get back on my feet, to get out in the workforce and get a job. I know there are single parents who have children who are not aware that one day you could wake up and your child could be very ill. Social services is telling me right now not to work full-time, to stay home and take care of my child. Meanwhile, I'm cut $351. Some of his medication is not covered. I have to find some means of making ends meet.

I did call different companies from home, because I couldn't afford TTC, to try to work part-time. There's no hiring, so there are no part-time jobs that I'm aware of, anyway. I tried to do my best. I found out about my son. I was hoping that he would get into day care so I could go back to school and go out in the workforce. He became ill with kidney problems. He just woke up one morning and he became sick. He's been in and out of Sick Kids Hospital for a year and two months now. I'm sorry; this is hard for me. I'm trying to make ends meet, to go back and forth to the hospital, and my drug card does not cover some of his medication. I'm trying now to get some of it covered, but I'm not getting any hope.

A girlfriend of mine told me about Super Fitness and this and that. She worked for a week and told me about the company. You could work from home doing $12 an hour and $10 per client you get involved into Super Fitness, becoming a member of their club. Of course I chose the $12 an hour, because I know that I have the ambition to work. I'm not one of these types that are going to just sit back and be on the system and abuse it. I really do want to work and I really mean that.

I put in 180 hours for this company, working for $12.50 an hour. They owe me $2,340; that's with vacation pay on top. It's been a year now and I just feel like I'm not going anywhere with this company and this government. I don't understand why it's taking so long. I worked hard for that money. My children need new beds. I need money to cover my child's medication. I was promised this money.

Every time I called this company at the beginning there wouldn't be somebody to answer the phone. After many people complained, he wouldn't return the calls back. They were saying the cheque was in the mail. I have a lot of ambition in me to be able to get work. If I get my foot in the right door, one of my dreams and my goals is to get off the system, especially at the amount that the government is taking off me. It's very hard. I've applied for handicapped benefits for my son; I'm not getting anywhere with them either. Sick Kids is sort of in disbelief that this is happening to me, but it is.

All I want is just to get paid. I don't want this company to get away with this, and right now I feel they are getting away with it. I'm almost to the point where I'm giving up hope, where nothing's going to be done. People out there need to be aware, especially a single parent with children, that you can wake up one morning and have a child who's really ill, in and out of the hospital, and end up quitting your job. Then what are you going to do?

I worked hard for this company, and when I started working for the company I felt really good about myself and it did boost my self-esteem because I thought this was some kind of income that's going to come in to help me. I would have stuck with this job today if they were paying me all the time and stuff like that. This would have worked out fine with a sick child.

I'm sort of in disbelief still that this can go on here in Canada. I'm still in disbelief that the government is taking so long for this to be settled. My children need clothing just like any other children out there and stuff like that, and as you're aware, when you're on the system you can't always afford all these extra things. My children are not — the other two are not young, they're teenagers, and things are expensive out there.

I think these companies need stiffer laws. They need to be fined maybe much higher fines. I don't understand why this company has gotten away three times doing this to the public, to people, whether it's the consumer or people working for this company. I'm struggling being able to deal with this. I'm even seeing a psychiatrist to deal with all these problems and issues I have. It's very hard. A lot of people think that when people are on the system, they're at home and this and that. Maybe some of them don't care if they get off the system or not; I do. I want my children to grow up knowing their mother is doing something with her life, not being on welfare for the rest of my life. There's no way I could even do that.

All I'm asking is for everybody out there who's listening and the public to be aware of these kinds of companies. I did not know I was going to get myself into this. I'm just, if I can use the word, desperate. Yes, I'm desperate. I have three children to support and it's hard. It's not easy being a single parent on the system. Right now it's very hard because they don't give you the money for TTC to look for work, and day care is so slow and you have to wait so long. I really don't know what to do. I'm just at the end of my rope here.

I just hope this can get settled as soon as possible. I've learned a valuable lesson. I'm almost afraid to work for companies at home because of what had happened to me with the case of Super Fitness. I really hope the politicians and the MPPs and the government can really put their foot down on companies and please don't let them get away with this. I don't enjoy being on medication and being under stress, but this has put me under even more stress and I really don't need this.

I'm here to speak on behalf of everybody who's working at home with companies doing this and getting away with it. Whether you're working at home or in a company or in a factory, you're still working. The bottom line is you're still trying to make an income coming in.

Like I said, I worked every chance I could while my son took a nap during the day. Days when he didn't take a nap, when my older daughter came from high school and finished her homework, she would watch my son while I went into my bedroom and did the telemarketing. A lot of the times when I worked with Super Fitness, they gave you this certain phone number that you phone in and you have to put a password in. They gave you logging sheets. You'd call people up one at a time. I did everything that they asked me to do. They called me. Even when I had to get a tooth removed and stitches, I still worked because I needed that money. All I'm asking is, I really need the money, I worked hard for it, and I'm really disappointed. I'm going to be more disappointed and have no faith in this government if they let companies like this get away with this. This just can't happen.

Ms Joy: I don't want to get too personal except to say that I had a strong background in hospitality for 22 years and I thought that was the worst you could do until I ran into telemarketing. I started telemarketing in 1990 because I was hit by a car for a second time in 1989. I died; I couldn't work with the public any more. I went to part-time work. I fought every day not to kill myself. I get back on track, I worry whether or not I'm going to still have psychotherapy twice a week. It took one year of shrinks telling me different things; it took a whole year to get a correct diagnosis. I'm only doing this because I can't do anything else. I never thought this is where I'd be.

In regard to Super Fitness, I'm one of the lucky ones. The main attraction was working from home. That drew me. I agreed to work 20 hours a week. The pressure was to work more hours, and that set off warning bells because until you have a proven track record, no telemarketing company is going to give you more hours.

I worked from August 28, 1995, until September 8, 1995. I quit for several reasons. First, when I called in to inquire how many people were taking advantage of their free membership, I was told they couldn't tell me. They're computerized, but they can't tell me. The warning bells went off because in telemarketing the pressure is per hour — every hour, what I'm bringing in. If you don't bring it in, you're fired. They don't give you the time.

The second concern was my contract. On my contract I could not find the company name anywhere, whether it was Super Fitness or whether I was working for a telemarketing company. Also, they mentioned online time. It was unheard of. They said I'd only be paid for actual talk time spent on the phone, not taking into consideration wrong numbers, answering machines, busy signals. Most of it's spent with wrong numbers, not talking to an individual.

The other thing was no cheque until you earned a minimum of $150. I thought, again, is that legal? But I thought, well, if they've got it in the contract, it must be legal.

They said the company did not specify the hours of work. That's untrue. Super Fitness determined the hours that I was going to work.

My claim is very small. It's only $347.74, including vacation pay. After informing Super Fitness that I had quit, I was told I would receive a cheque at the end of September. I spent two months trying to collect and got nowhere until the switchboard at Super Fitness was so sick of my calls they referred me to DFD telemarketing. I found a DFD Telecommunications in the phone book. When I contacted them, I thought it was the man who hired me from Super Fitness. He would not identify himself and denied that they did any telemarketing.

I called the Ministry of Labour and I was in for a shock. When I called, I was told they could not do anything; normally they could not do anything for me. The only reason they could do anything this time was because they'd received a number of complaints from Super Fitness: Come down and file a complaint.

I ran into somebody that was familiar with this class action through Parkdale. Because I wasn't happy with the response from the Ministry of Labour, I contacted Parkdale legal aid. They put a claim in for me in November. If it hadn't been for the non-stop commitment and support from Parkdale legal aid, and later on with the involvement of the Ministry of Labour, I would have walked away from this back in November.

I'm curious. If this had happened now, after Bill 49 was in place, would my claim be invalid because the amount is so small? I'd like to know what you're going to do in regard to Super Fitness.

The Chair: Thank you. If that's the end of your submissions, we have two minutes left. The official opposition; we ended with government members last time.

Mr Hoy: Thank you very much for your presentation. The personal ones that I've heard today certainly have much more impact and I think vividly show what can go wrong in a situation where you have a poor employer, one that doesn't have maybe any standards. Yours is a case study of things that can go wrong when people are not upfront about what they will pay you, how they will pay you, when they will pay you. So I appreciate the knowledge of the history of your background as it pertains to some of the aspects of this bill.

I was mentioning at the break to someone in the hallway that the more personal aspects of committee work are much more enlightening. Other people look at a bill and are looking at words and what they mean to them. I appreciate your presentation.

The Chair: Actually, there are a few seconds left. Mr Christopherson, do you have a brief question?

Mr Christopherson: I'll make two very quick points in just a couple of sentences. One is that what we're seeing is very clear evidence of the government's intent to push down the value and the price of labour. Overall, if you take a look at what the agenda of this government does, it's to lower the value of labour in this province.

Given the fact that they've slashed by 22% benefits to the poorest people in our province, that's exactly the sort of folks that are going to be pushed into accepting whatever's available. If the rights supporting those individuals are lessened, you are very much pushing people more and more into poverty. Whether you're doing it deliberately or not, you have to answer for yourselves. That is the result.

My last point would be that I'd like to hear, if there are remaining seconds, from the government members what they're going to do about it.

The Chair: We've actually gone over the time and I don't know whether it would be fair to ask, if the case is pending. Mr Christopherson, as a former minister I think you would know full well the consequences of dealing with matters before any kind of tribunal. I think what might be more appropriate —

Mr Christopherson: A meeting at least —

The Chair: No. What might be more appropriate is perhaps if you could direct the specifics of your case to the minister, and we can give you the address here this afternoon.

Ms Joy: The Ministry of Labour has told them to pay up, and they have refused and they have taken it to the adjudicator. The people who settled with Super Fitness for the claims from $250 and under, who made a private settlement that they were supposed to pay, they have not paid. They have done everything to dishonour the agreement.

The Chair: Aside from highlighting the case with the minister in terms of ensuring that the adjudication process moves along quickly, I think that's probably the best we can hope for at this stage.

Ms Joy: That's the best?

The Chair: We certainly wish you well, but I would suggest doing that to alert the minister directly to the details of this case and to ask for her oversight to ensure there are no further delays in the prosecuting. I don't mean to go into the details of the bill, but perhaps one of the other members might chat with you outside and let you know the significance of what would happen if in fact this bill was passed in terms of helping to enforce your existing claim.

Ms Joy: Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you for coming in before us here today. We appreciate you taking the time. A very courageous presentation from both of you.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, LOCAL 1750

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 1750. Good afternoon to you both. Again, for the umpteenth time today, we have 15 minutes for your presentation. You can divide that as you see fit between presentation or question-and-answer period. Would you be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the benefit of Hansard.

Mr Nick Milanovic: Certainly. My name's Nick Milanovic and I'm a lawyer for the Canadian Union of Public Employees. Sitting beside me is Carol Haffenden, vice-president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 1750.

Today we're here to address one aspect of the changes to Bill 49. What we have for you today is a very short presentation, and we hope the committee will question us on the brief that's just been circulated to you, as we would like to clarify some matters and I'm sure the committee has questions of us.

Local 1750 is one of 2,650 locals of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, the largest trade union in Canada. Local 1750 represents 3,400 employees at the Workers' Compensation Board. These members include clerical workers, administrative workers, industrial workers and some professional employees. Local 1750 represents members across Ontario located in many major towns and cities across the province. It has represented workers of the WCB for some 21 years and its membership has continued to expand over that period.

Before I start into what I'm sure the committee has heard today, a round of criticism, the union would like to acknowledge two minor, in its view, yet positive changes to the Employment Standards Act. The new act would provide vacation entitlement of two weeks per year, which would accrue whether employment was actively worked over the period or whether there was an absence due to illness over that period. As well, the amendments to the act provide for seniority and service during pregnancy and parental leave and ensure that all employees are credited with benefits and seniority while on leave. In the view of the union, it's a positive step and we feel we should acknowledge it.

Today in my short amount of time, what I want to avoid is talking past each other. We acknowledge that there are some minor positive changes. We applaud that. However, we'd like to focus on a particularly significant aspect in the union's view of the changes to Bill 49, and that concerns the changes to the collective bargaining structure under the act, what issues might be collectively bargained.

Section 3 of the bill and section 4(2) of the current act deal with the collective agreement overriding statutory provisions of the Employment Standards Act. This would have the effect of trade unions and their counterparts, employers, being able to bargain substantive aspects of employment standards law and incorporating them into the collective agreement. In the union's view, this is a road it would prefer the government didn't travel.

Perhaps I can begin with where the law has come from and where we are now. Beginning in the 19th century, this Legislature, along with other Canadian legislatures, began to legislate specific areas of employment and regulated terms and conditions of work relating to a variety of substantive issues, beginning with health and safety, children's and women's labour. Eventually the various statutory mechanisms that were out there and located in various pieces of legislation were brought together in 1968 to create the current act.

From that point forward the current act developed to the point where one basic truism resulted, and that was that most workers in this province had a basic universal floor of rights. That is, no one could negotiate out of the basic standard of rights that were provided for employees. Every worker in the province that was covered by the act was entitled to the same vacation entitlement, the same severance entitlement and the same determination entitlement as every other worker. There was a universal floor from which all employers and all unions or individual employees could bargain but never go below.

This act seeks to change that regime in a significant way, and that forms our main concern today. I'm keeping an eye on the time. Currently no trade union and no employer may agree to standards that fall below the various standards that are contained in the act. Under the proposal, unions and their employers may negotiate specific changes if the rights that are dealt with, and there are only a certain number of rights, confer "greater rights" than the act provides.

For the trade union, that seems to be rather ambiguous language. Determining how one juggles overtime pay against vacation pay and other rights in the collective agreement, to assess whether rights are in fact greater than what the statute provides, is at best an ambiguous process and at worst impossible to determine other than that a hearing will eventually be held under the grievance arbitration system of a collective agreement to determine that matter. How an adjudicator in that position will determine what rights are greater is left unaddressed by this act and that is a major concern.

For the purpose of clarity, the issues that can be negotiated under the bill, section 3, are severance pay, overtime pay, public holidays, hours of work and vacation pay. That puts Local 1750, which represents people at the Workers' Compensation Board, in a precarious position.

The government has signalled in other places that it is prepared to reform, if you will, the workers' compensation system. Employees at the board are concerned that the rationalization of administrative services will mean that their employer will have to undertake some drastic changes, and within those changes, they see this bill as fuelling concessionary bargaining because for the first time employers will be able to negotiate below the standard. For instance, if the board in its wisdom decided they wanted their employees to work longer, they could negotiate a change that provided for working hours that are in excess of the current standards with no necessary change in other conditions in the collective agreement because this collective agreement exceeds the level of the Employment Standards Act, and in many situations, many trade unions, whether it be this one or another, will have exceeded the Employment Standards Act over a number of years of bargaining.

What this act does is give an incentive for employers to take concessions from their workers without giving them anything necessarily in return, and given that this board is going to restructure itself, this union sees that as likely. As well, given that this employer takes its direction from the government, there's a very real and serious concern that direction will be given, either explicitly or otherwise, to undertake those changes. This will simply mean worse working conditions for the employees at the WCB. This act does nothing to improve the conditions of employees at the board.

There's another potential implication for a specific group of employees at the Workers' Compensation Board, and those are temporary workers. All estimates are that this is about 200 people at the board out of the 3,400 we represent. Temporary employees under the current collective agreement are not entitled, as in many different situations throughout the province, to the same rights that a permanent employee is entitled to, their rights aren't quite as strong as permanent employees, so they are going to be subject to an Employment Standards Act that necessarily makes it more difficult for employees to sustain their rights. Given that they're temporary employees in the first place, they have a natural reluctance to rock the boat because they want to become permanent employees. Given the current labour market, that's understandable.

This act will give an incentive to employers to use temporary employees to work longer work hours because somewhere else in the collective agreement they have a higher standard than the current act allows for and presumably, although we don't know for sure, they will have greater rights than under the current Employment Standards Act.

Inevitably, because this act puts more issues on the collective bargaining table, there will be an increase in industrial strife. A labour relations peace will not necessarily be maintained in the face of workers who have to fight for what before was a legislative right. That puts workers in a very difficult situation of accepting an offer and letting go employment standards rights that have been the basis of their relationship with the board for quite some time or going out on strike to fight for rights they have had since 1968. This committee and the government should take note of that very real possibility.

The other implication that is I think obvious for the workers at the WCB, given the restructuring that will be going on at the WCB — and Cam Jackson's report is out and the government will be considering the various options therein — is that employers, and specifically this employer, if they cannot get the concessions at the bargaining table, will look greater and greater to contracting out as a solution to lower their labour costs. Traditionally, we know in the labour movement and we know in the New Democratic Party that contracting out means savings brought on, for lack of a better term, the backs of the workers because they're not traditionally unionized jobs with higher wages. Any savings that are accrued to the government and to the public at large are a result of a transfer of a higher-wage job to a lower-wage job.

Again, this will lead to industrial strife because the workers at the WCB will simply not sit back and see their jobs contracted out, and with the change to Bill 7, the Labour Relations Act, successor rights do not attach automatically to those jobs so that the trade union won't exist any more and it is an incentive for people simply to walk out. It's our submission that this aspect of the changes specifically — I think I'm out of time — should be repealed.

Alternatively, if the government is not up to that task, it should consider making the changes in the aspect concerning greater conferring of rights specific, so that we might judge monetary rights against similar monetary rights or mixed rights against mixed rights or some sort of system for an adjudicator to balance those rights and obligations so that the parties involved in collective bargaining understand where the process is headed and have a greater certainty as to how their agreements, once they're resolved, will actually be implemented. Otherwise, there will be a great flood of litigation to determine what greater conferral of rights under the act actually means.

That ends our submission and if there's any time for questions, we would appreciate it.

The Chair: Thank you. There's one minute and 45 seconds left and since the last question was from the government side, Mr Hoy, if you have any questions.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your submission today. I chatted with a fellow the other day who thinks that Ontario might some day be open 24 hours a day, every day of the year. We'll be working, working and working. In the absence of minimum standards and some other things that are happening, some by the wishes of the public — we are open seven days a week and Christmas and so on now — maybe this chap isn't too far off and we will be commerce 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. Do you feel that the lack of any kind of a minimum standard could lead to at least a demand on people to work, we'll say, excessively, whether they're unionized or non-unionized?

Mr Milanovic: I hope that individual doesn't have to work 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, but it's our view certainly that without a defined universal standard, that's exactly what will happen. The committee should understand that there are very real implications of that. It means that people who tend to work more as a result of these changes traditionally have more industrial accidents, and that has an impact on this local particularly because they claim workers' compensation. We may be creating a more unhealthy, more unsafe working environment and any savings realized through this process, this rationalization here under the Employment Standards Act and at the Workers' Compensation Board, may in fact be eaten up by more and more claims because people are simply tired and have accidents at work because of that. I see this act as creating that incentive.

The Chair: Thank you both for coming down and making your presentation before us here this afternoon. We appreciate it very much.

My apologies to the government members. Actually, the last question before that had been Mr Christopher-son's, so I am behind in my times.

Mr Milanovic: Mr Chair, we have time to sit and answer government questions, if you so desire.

The Chair: We'll let you catch up with the next presenter.

Mr Milanovic: I'll be outside in the hall if you really want to know.

ONTARIO HOTEL AND MOTEL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association. Good afternoon, Mr Seiling.

Mr Rod Seiling: My name is Rod Seiling. I want to thank you and your committee for the opportunity to appear before you today. I'm president of the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association and executive director of the Hotel Association of Metropolitan Toronto. Collectively, we're the largest accommodation and hospitality association in the province, with over 1,000 members.

Employment standards reform is important, and therefore we support the government's initiative to fix it. Bill 49 is the first stage of this process and we look forward to the extensive consultation process that we understand will precede the introduction of the second stage of this reform package.

What this bill does is help to relieve the complexity and time involved for all concerned. We would hope and suggest that ultimately all legislation and regulations related to work and employment will come under one act. This would be a forward step in bringing clarity and fairness to the workplace.

Bill 49, in our estimation, and supported by our advisers, does not alter minimum employment standards in Ontario. What the legislation does is make technical changes to the act. These changes are aimed at improving administration and enforcement of employment standards, as well as reducing ambiguity and simplifying language. We also see this bill signalling a significant reduction in the government role in administering and enforcing the act. I might add that we also believe it will allow the ministry to utilize its resources on those it deems as important issues.

Our analysis of the proposed changes is as follows:

Act enforceable through collective agreements: The bill specifies that obligations under the act will be enforceable through collective agreements, as if the act were part of the collective agreement. Employees covered by collective agreements will not be permitted to file complaints under the act without the permission of the director. In essence, the grievance and arbitration procedure will replace enforcement through the administrative machinery of the act. Powers of arbitrators with respect to claims under the act will be expanded to include the powers of employment standards officers, adjudicators or referees under the act.

Parallel proceedings in court and under the act prohibited: The bill prohibits an employee from commencing a wrongful dismissal action in court if he or she files a complaint claiming termination or severance pay under the act. Similarly, where an employee files a complaint under the act for wages owing, breach of the building services successor provisions or the benefit provisions of the act, a civil action seeking remedy for the same matter is prohibited. These restrictions apply even if the amount owing exceeds the maximum for which an order can be made under the act. Civil actions are permitted, however, if the employee withdraws the employment standards complaint within two weeks after filing it. Parallel to the foregoing restrictions, an employee cannot initiate a complaint under the act for the specified matters if a civil action covering the same matter has been commenced. Effectively, the bill will require employees to choose whether to sue in court or to seek enforcement through the act.

Increased flexibility for provision of greater benefits in contracts: The bill will make it easier for employers to establish that they have provided greater rights or benefits than are required by the act, and thus obtain exemption from certain provisions of the act. When a group of collective agreement provisions — for example, severance pay, hours of work, overtime, public holidays and vacation — are considered together, rather than individually as in the past, the collective agreement will prevail if it provides superior rights. In addition, statutory and regulatory provisions, as well as provisions in oral, express or implied contracts, will prevail over an employment standard if they confer a greater right than is provided by the employment standard.

Service during pregnancy and parental leave: The bill requires the length of a employee's pregnancy or parental leave to be included not only in determining seniority, as is required by the current act, but also in determining the length of service for all rights except for the completion of the probationary period. Thus, all rights in employment contracts that are service-driven will continue to accrue during the leave. All employers should review their contracts of employment — we support this — to determine the impact this will have on their current employees.

Vacations: The present vacation of at least two weeks upon completion of 12 months of employment is amended to apply whether or not the employment was active employment. The pay during such vacation must not be less than 4% of the wages, excluding vacation pay, earned by the employee in the 12 months for which the vacation is given. This clarifies and simplifies the existing provisions in the act.

Maximum amount of orders: Employment standards officers will not be permitted to make an order for an amount greater than $10,000 in respect of one employee, with the exception of orders relating to breach of the pregnancy and parental leave, lie detector, retail business holiday and garnishment provisions, and termination and severance pay in connection with breaches of such provisions. Arbitrators will not be subject to these restrictions. The bill provides for regulations prohibiting officers from issuing orders below the level specified in the regulation.

Collections: The bill sets out mechanisms for the director to use private collection agencies to collect amounts owing under the act. This will provide the ability to contract out a function that is now performed within the ministry. Collectors will be authorized to agree to compromises or settlements of claims if the person to whom the money is owed agrees, provided that it is not less than 75%, or such other percentage as may be prescribed, of the money to which the person is entitled, unless the director approves otherwise.

Compromise of rights under the act: Compromises or settlements respecting money owing under the act will be binding once the money stipulated in the compromise or settlement is paid, unless the arrangement is entered into as a result of fraud or coercion. In the current act there is very little ability to contract out of the act's requirements. Employment standards officers will be given additional authority to settle complaints without making a prior finding of what wages are owing.

Limitation periods: In a prosecution or proceeding under the act, no person will be entitled to recover money that becomes due to the person more than six months before the facts upon which the prosecution or proceeding is based first came to the knowledge of the director, subject to certain exemptions. In the current act the limitation period is two years.

Review of orders: An employment standards officer will be deemed to have refused to issue an order if a proceeding is not commenced within two years after the facts upon the refusal is based first came to the knowledge of the director. Employees may request a review of an order or a refusal to issue an order, in writing, within 45 days. The director has the discretion to extend this time limit in certain circumstances. Certain orders may be reviewed by way of hearing. In the case of employers, application for a hearing is dependent upon paying the wages and administrative costs required by the order.

Administrative changes: Complaints under the act will be filed in either written or electronic form. Employment standards officers will be able to obtain copies of documents kept in electronic form. Certain changes concerning the service of documents under the act are also made.

In conclusion, we support Bill 49 as it signals a progressive change in employment standards in Ontario. It is not reducing minimum standards. We are not, I want to clarify, seeking a reduction in benefits. We are good employers and want to ensure our employees are treated fairly and receive all that is their due.

I want to conclude, but I thought it was important that we go through our understanding of the act, given that we've seen so much rhetoric out there about what this bill is or isn't and want to be on the record as to what our understanding of the bill is. Thank you very much for this opportunity.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Seiling, and you've left us a generous amount of time for questioning. To redress the imbalance, I'll give two fourths of the time. Since we have eight minutes, we'll have four minutes of questioning for government, two minutes to the Liberals and two minutes to the NDP. Satisfied?

Mr O'Toole: Mr Seiling, I want to put on record respecting your presentation that you've clarified that in the section dealing with increased flexibility for provision of greater benefit in contract; I think it's on page 3. You're clear there. It says that when they're considered together, "rather than individually...the collective agreement will prevail if it provides superior rights." The minister indicated this morning that this section of this bill would be moved to phase 2 of the review of the employment standards, but her intent was to ensure that the outcome of the collective bargaining process would ensure superior rights. If I was to read section 3, it says, "A collective agreement prevails over section 58 and parts IV, VI, VII and VIII of the act if the collective agreement confers greater rights...." That's pretty straightforward. What I'm trying to do is get on the record very clearly is that the minister's intention and the government's intention is to avoid the duplication and to empower the workplace participants — that's the union and management — to come with the best adjustment to the working day, hours of work and other conditions as the changing world of work around us evolves. Is that kind of workplace empowerment something your industry is looking for?

Mr Seiling: Very much so. We're very pleased. I want to be very firm that we are not looking for a reduction in standards, nor would we support that, but we see this as a progressive step in allowing our employees to negotiate benefits on their terms. I make a point that because we're in the service industry we have various times of the year where things are very busy or slow, and right now we can't give things legally to employees who'd like to have them. Under this bill we are able to bring some flexibility, keep our people employed full-time and give them a better living in our view and yet maintain the service to our customers, because without customers none of us has a business, nor do employees have jobs.

Mr O'Toole: The point I'm trying to make is that whether it's in the computer electronics area or the libraries, as we know, through technology the world of work and use of recreation time and leisure time and the whole standard of living are certainly not what they were some 20 years ago. This act needs to be reviewed to allow the workplace participants to be the deciders of the balance in the workplace. I think that's a reasonable expectation and I think that's the intent of the minister. I've heard you say the same thing, so thank you for that response.

Mr Tascona: Thanks very much for your presentation, Mr Seiling. I note under the maximum amount of orders — I want to get your opinion on this — with respect to the cap of $10,000, this does not apply with respect to termination and severance pay if it goes over the cap. What do you think about that?

Mr Seiling: Given today's times, it's fair and reasonable, but again, one of the things that we're most pleased about is that this bill seems to end what I would call some of the double jeopardy where, "If we're not successful here we'll go there, and if we're not successful there we'll go there." An employer is on the hook for years upon years in not knowing where they are, and so is the employee. We think it's not fair to either side to be playing this game of double jeopardy. If you have a problem and it's a real problem for both sides, it should be dealt with at one place or another. You can't go fishing and, "If the fishing's better in this hole than the other hole, we'll keep on moving till we find a bite."

Mr Tascona: That's been your experience, that it has been double jeopardy with termination and severance pay claims?

Mr Seiling: It has been. It's unfortunate that I'm unable to bring with me an associate who is head of our — we have a sister organization called the Human Resources Professional Association, and one of their biggest complaints is that they're tied up in red tape and regulatory dealing with these issues. If it's not dealt with in one, then they go someplace else and then they go someplace else. They believe they dealt with it fairly and they want some balance back in the system and say, "We want to deal up front." Certainly there always will be a bad apple somewhere, but we believe that 99.99% of all the people we represent are good employers. They want to resolve it fairly one time and one time only, and they want to make sure it's done in a just and fair way.

Mr Tascona: What would you think about electronic filing of payment of orders to pay?

Mr Seiling: The way the world is moving, you can now file your income tax that way, and as the world goes forward more and more people are going to be doing things electronically. It will become a way of life. I think that as this act is revised we should be looking more towards the future, not towards the past.

Mr Tascona: Would that be the same with respect to filing an appeal to order to pay?

Mr Seiling: I don't see a problem, but again, I believe at some point along the way, if someone needs to see a person, that should be there, but I don't believe we should impede it by saying you can't do it. As I said, it's progressive and we should be looking to where the world is going, not to where we've been.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. I would agree that probably most employers are law-abiding and socially responsible people, but for those who are not I want to talk about the limitation period. It was suggested today more than once that the six months is actually too short for people to move from one workplace to another because of reprisals if they were to start an action within the six-month period rather than the two years. Do you have any consideration for that in mind, an opinion?

Mr Seiling: I don't see it as a problem because I think that in today's world moving from one job to another is accepted. In days gone by where you started with a company and worked all your life with a firm, when you changed jobs there was always something untoward that had happened. That's not the case today.

I think the only time there is a problem is if there's been fraud or something untoward happen in the workplace where somebody may be trying to hide something. But I don't believe in today's workplace, from the employer or the employee side, that changing jobs is a problem. If you've got a problem, surely in six months you know whether you've been done in or aggrieved or not satisfied and will take appropriate steps.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. It's good to see you again. I was interested in your statement, fourth paragraph of the first page, where you state that in your estimation the bill "does not alter minimum employment standards in Ontario."

I was wondering and I'd like to hear how you feel that putting a cap on the maximum amount to claim, as well as a minimum threshold to cross, and reducing from two years to six months the time period in which a worker can make a claim is not losing a benefit. Whether or not you agree that it's a benefit that should be lost for whatever reason, I just don't understand the commonsense thinking that there is now a cap and a minimum threshold and a reduced time period where there wasn't one before and yet you're comfortable saying you don't think this alters minimum employment standards. Could you help me understand that?

Mr Seiling: I don't profess to be a total expert in this area, but we've had people who are experts in this area look at it and I am, I guess, restating what these people have told us. I can only restate what I've said, that we do not believe this bill represents a reduction in minimum standards.

Mr Christopherson: I wasn't playing technical legal gymnastics.

Mr Seiling: I understand that.

Mr Christopherson: I'm not a lawyer either. I was merely asking just from a commonsense point of view that if you looked at this and there's a cap where there didn't used to be one and you have to cross a threshold where you didn't before and you've lost a year and a half in a time period that you once had, how that could not be construed in some way or another as some kind of minimum right lost.

Mr Seiling: As Mr Tascona was just saying, you can go to a threshold in court. I think there are ways and means to recover those things. As I said earlier, I don't believe anyone today wouldn't know within six months whether they have a case. You can go over the $10,000 limit in court, so I don't think anything's been taken away from you. I go back to what I said: We do not believe this bill represents a reduction in minimum standards.

Mr Christopherson: Do you think the bill is going to make a difference to you and your colleagues in the industry?

Mr Seiling: We think it will make a progressive step forward, not just for the businesses we represent but our employees as well, because it's going to give us flexibility to allow us to offer our people better employment. Hopefully we'll see where we'll be able to give them the things that they want to have at times and periods when we'll be allowed to give it to them, have them work when they want to work and when we need them to work. It's going to give us flexibility to deal with those things and is something we need to be able to deliver service to our customers.

Mr Christopherson: How do you think you would square that with the minister who's said that these are only minor housekeeping changes? If you feel it's going to make a big difference, and there are people who think those differences are very controversial, how does that square with the minister saying these are only minor housekeeping changes?

Mr Seiling: We believe these are minor in the sense that we believe the discussion paper coming will shed greater light and greater flexibility and reforms, because this bill represents what the workplace was, not what it is today and where it will be in the future.

Mr Christopherson: I disagree with most of it, but I appreciate the dialogue.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Christopherson. We're over our time. Thank you again, Mr Seiling. We appreciate you coming and making a presentation here this afternoon.

Mr Seiling: Thank you.

The Chair: Is there anyone here from the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 136? I didn't think anyone had checked in.

UNION OF NEEDLETRADES, INDUSTRIAL AND TEXTILE EMPLOYEES

The Chair: In the absence of that local, the next group will be the Ontario joint council, the Union of Needletrades, Industrial and Textile Employees. Good afternoon to you both.

Ms Pat Sullivan: Good afternoon.

The Chair: We have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and question-and-answer. I wonder if you might introduce yourself for the benefit of Hansard, please.

Ms Sullivan: My name is Pat Sullivan. I'm the Ontario director of the Ontario joint council of the Union of Needletrades, Industrial and Textile Employees. The result of that union is from a merger of the former International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union and the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union. We merged last July 1 and we're now one union.

With me is David St Louis, the assistant to the director. We have made copies available to the committee of our submission, so I don't want to read through it and take up the 15 minutes. It would probably take longer than 15 minutes if you wanted to read through it.

I want to address the issues and the concerns affecting the membership that I represent, primarily in the clothing industry. Coming before government committees in the past, with the changes in the labour laws that have been before us in the last year, this is just another stage of taking away rights from workers who really need the type of legislation we've had and to be able to improve on what's there. I think these are regressive changes to this legislation. Although I've heard the minister say that this is just slight housekeeping, that it's not really cleaning out and making major changes to the legislation, if I did housekeeping in a manner like this I might as well move because there wouldn't be anything left in the house. That really greatly concerns me.

I understand also that the minister made an announcement this morning that some of the provisions that were part of the housekeeping had been removed, but they're not gone and that concerns me also. I think it's just a plot of the government to look like it's making some changes because of the presentations coming before the committee. She also states that this will come under the much larger review of the employment standards, and that gets your hair up on your back. If this is only housekeeping, these changes, and there's going to be a much larger review, what the heck is going to happen to the working people in this province?

If we go to the clothing workers in this city and this province who have been badly hit by everything that's going on, whether it be trade, free trade, NAFTA, you're starting to see the reoccurrence — whether industry wants to recognize or accept that there are sweatshops in this province, it's only going to create a bigger landslide of sweatshops. When you start to regress what they have under the minimum, bare standards and allow opportunities for employers then to reduce that, you're going to create much more of a sweatshop environment where workers have no rights.

In the past, up to five, eight years ago, you had people in this industry who were making good wages, who were getting up to $10, $12 an hour working under piecework, which is really pushing them with the old carrot, and working hard, primarily women, primarily immigrant workers. It also now seems to be the start-off point for students and youth getting into jobs. With the lack of jobs out there, there seem to always be jobs in this area.

We have plant closure after plant closure. In this industry you go through bankruptcies and then they open up a couple of blocks away under a new name, hire new employees with no collective agreements, just down to the minimum rights under the act. If you start to erode that act, people are going to work in worse conditions than we're getting in the Third World countries.

Then they're going to start to take off their vacations and their holidays. We have plants now even with union contracts where they're being forced to work more than 40 hours under their collective agreements. It's mandatory overtime even though the contracts say it isn't. The employer will come to you as a representative and say, "Unless we get some major concessions here, we need to have 45-hour work weeks, we have to have mandatory overtime." If you give them licence to do this under changes to the act, it doesn't take very much to see what is going to happen out there.

Seniority provisions for the people who have worked for these employers will mean absolutely nothing. They're going to have to work longer and harder. When you're working under a piecework system, for those who have had any experience with it, an eight-hour day becomes a very extreme, hard day.

I'm not concerned about GM, Ford and Chrysler to the same degree as I am about people working in textile and clothing mills because a lot of those employers are paying big and larger wages. They're not going to have a lot of impact and utilize the changes coming out under the Employment Standards Act to the same degree as small employers, singular industry employers who are going to take advantage of it.

Every day in my working life I have to deal with employers who are saying: "We've got to be competitive. We can't compete with offshore. We can't compete with the south. We're going to have to defer wage increases that you've got. We need a 5%, 10% rollback in wages." These people in this industry, to the largest degree, are making less money today than they were eight years ago because of giving back. Now when you give them licence under the Employment Standards Act to be able to do that, it's going to be a hayride.

I haven't heard one worker in this province come out and support the changes under the Employment Standards Act, whether they're in a unionized workplace or a non-union workplace. It's seen as something that's going to be an advantage for employers and a disadvantage for workers.

I think the government is going to have to very seriously sit back and look at what is going to happen. You're going to drive more of the economy to home workers, who are not covered by any legislation to any certain degree in this province, and it's going to be opened up for anybody. It'll become like a right-to-work state in the south of the United States, where you have an opportunity to work and work for whatever wages that you can get out of the employer. That scares me. I think the province of Ontario is a strong province, always been seen and recognized as the place where business wanted to be, and to give business and industry the opportunity take our standards a lot lower is a crime for the working people in this province.

I probably could go on for a couple days, but if anybody has any questions that they'd like to put to me —

The Chair: Thank you very much. You've left us just over seven and a half minutes, so two and a half minutes per caucus. Mr Tascona had his hand up first, and then Mr O'Toole.

Mr Tascona: Thank you for your presentation. I just have a question to raise with you. Presently, two thirds of the orders to pay, which is a situation where the employment standards officer has found a violation of the act and requires the employer to pay, go uncollected.

Now, for 67% of the employers that fail to pay, it's because of insolvent situations — in other words, bankruptcy. One area that we don't have jurisdiction in is bankruptcy protection. Certainly there's been talk that the bankruptcy laws should be strengthened to protect workers in those situations, and I put it to you, what can we do in terms of trying to increase those percentages? We're basically limited in what we can do with respect to bankruptcy. We can't pay for the federal government continuing not to protect workers under bankruptcy laws and we think it's a little unfair for us to be asked to do things that the federal government should basically be enforcing.

I just want to get your comments and what you think should be done with respect to insolvent employers. If two thirds of the statistics are that we can't collect because they're insolvent, what can we do in those situations? What have you, as a union, done in the federal area with respect to bankruptcy?

Ms Sullivan: I think sometimes in dealing with a bankruptcy, no matter what you do, the doors are closed, the ears are closed. Nobody wants to listen to the bankruptcy. They're more in line in dealing with the employers who are continuing the business.

I definitely believe there has to be something done about bankruptcy. We have gone before government, we have gone before whatever avenue we've had, where we've known for a fact a company has declared bankruptcy and opened up and probably not lost one day of business. So I think there's got to be some more scrutiny. I think there's got to be some accountability by an employer before they can declare bankruptcy. You've got the chapter 12, and I'm not totally sure how it works, in the United States, but at least there's a process if a company is going to declare bankruptcy that they've got to make the government aware.

I don't see why the province can't do it, that it has to be back on the feds. There's got to be some process. An employer just can't come in and put the notice on the door and say, "We're out of business." There's got to be some accountability working with the government, and if there's a union there, working with the union or some workers' representatives before they can actually come out and say the business is gone, because in a lot of the cases, especially in the apparel industry, that's not the case. They either will get out of business and become a contractor, they will work it out of home workers. There are a lot of scenarios out there and you don't have to be a brain trooper out there to be able to figure out what's going down. It's easy enough to track to find where they are.

Mr Tascona: I know.

Ms Sullivan: Whether the government has some committee meetings to sit down and try and put something together — there's been enough history of bankruptcies and experiences that we've been through on why it's worked and why it hasn't worked, that we could do something. I don't think it's my issue to be able to try and resolve it today, because I'd only be one person with one opinion who's been facing different types of bankruptcies, but I think there's got to be some responsibility under the province.

Mr Tascona: That is a problem in your industry.

Ms Sullivan: It's a major problem within our industry, but I wouldn't want to sit there and say to them, "Swallow the changes in the Employment Standards Act and we'll try and see if we can do something with bankruptcy." Bankruptcy is not the only problem, because by changes of the different types of employment standards legislation, bankruptcies won't be quite so bad now because you've got a licence to do whatever you want anyway.

Mr Tascona: Let's just get back to this.

Ms Sullivan: I don't want to mix the two together. I think bankruptcies is a different issue that employment standards.

Mr Tascona: I'll just raise one thing, though. There have been situations with respect to employers that shut down and the next day they open up. That happens in your industry. But recently there was a decision where the directors of the company that did that were prosecuted by the provincial government. Unfortunately it took them about four years to prosecute, and meanwhile they had operated another sweatshop and were operating somewhere else. If there was strength in the bankruptcy, we could protect the workers and that wouldn't happen, especially when you have the statistics that we can't enforce the orders to pay because they just shut down and then they act somewhere else.

Mr O'Toole: Just one or two points to reinforce that. Would you agree that there are indeed a few improvements in this current piece of legislation? I would point out to you that payment on termination has been tightened up to be paid in seven days. There are also provisions for a minimum of two weeks' vacation and protection for parental and pregnancy leave, and there are other collection provisions which we know today is in failure. Those administrative changes are indeed in favour of the worker. So do you recognize there are some? That has pretty much been stated by most of the presenters today.

I also want to just question you for a moment, and I fully agree with many of the comments you've made, that indeed there is a lack of jobs today. I'm somewhat educated in labour economics and I just wonder, do you think there are, because of globalization, things that are perhaps beyond the control of the Ontario government — I've certainly been here a year, but globalization and those issues, are they not impinging on your particular workplace? When I look at every label on every garment, you're really under siege from more than just the Ontario government. What kind of creative suggestions do you have that we should be listening to?

Ms Sullivan: I think the experience we've had as a union and representing workers is that we have sat there and worked with employers at the table recognizing that you can't just come back and say, "You can't make any changes." We understand globalization and being competitive, but we've been able to sit down with the more progressive employers, understanding that new technologies are going to be very important to this industry, to work out how we're going to work on quality or different issues like that. We've been very successful with some of the employers in doing that, and I think that's the route that we have to go.

You can't have blinders on and say, "Globalization may be going on and it may have impact on our industry," and refuse to accept it. You have to work with it. But I think you have to have the opportunity to be able to do that. Making these types of changes to the legislation doesn't do that. I think we had it working over the last number of years in committees and you're starting to see more and more of those being eroded, where you had participation, and I sit on several of those committees where it's made up of government, business and unions.

I'm working through a lot of the issues for a lot of the industries, because we don't just represent the apparel industry, we have the textile and we have chemicals and plastics and stuff like that, other industries. We sit on these committees and work it through. Unfortunately, since the change to this government, we're seeing all these committee works just slowly eroding. The participation level is just not there; the heart of it is gone. It's because there's no sense in me talking to the business side. It doesn't matter which side you're talking to. We talk to the government representatives on there and they say: "We don't know how long this is going to survive. We don't know whether this is going to have any impact any more." So we meet with no meaning because nobody knows what kind of life is going to be there.

We sat with a lot of the manufacturers that we represent, saying, "This is good." It gives us an opportunity to take it back to the whole base.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for being here today. In your conclusion, you say that our wages and benefits do not greatly exceed the minimum standards as it is. You did say in your verbal submission that there was a time when on average, if people worked very hard, they could get between $10 and $12 an hour. Now you say the wages and benefits don't exceed the minimum standards. What's happening?

Ms Sullivan: What is happening in a lot of cases is that the employers come to you and say, "We no longer can pay the type of money that we're paying because of globalization and competing with other countries or the United States and be able to keep out there and bid on the orders." A lot of them are saying if they can't get into the American economy, they're not going to survive. We know which companies are surviving and which ones aren't, what they're making for the US market. But they've got to be able to compete and to compete, number one, is the quality, which is never usually an issue. They always say, coming from any side of the border, that Canadian quality is very good.

The problem is the wages, the benefits. They'll come to you and say, "We can no longer continue to pay the dental," and if they're not in the luxury of being part of our benefit plan or our pension plan, those employers are saying: "We no longer can pay for the benefits. We can't do the pension contributions any more that we're doing. We can't keep paying the high wages. We have to drop the base rates." They want a 6% or 10% rollback on wages.

After a while of losing your benefits — they're slowly being eroded, your dental is now gone because they can't afford to keep paying the premiums — then the only thing they have left to attack is taking away the wage rates. It's getting lower and lower and lower, so now they're making just $7 or $7.50 an hour, and then they exploit them because you don't get the overtime any more because they send you home.

You start making a lot of piecework and your money gets up, they send you home for a day, and then it's calculated on a weekly basis. If you're unfortunate to be in that situation and you've worked at 115% all that week, you go home and lose a day's pay, you lose your percentage that you're making, and try to negotiate or get those things back with the employer where your piecework is calculated on a daily basis so you don't lose it if you're doing overtime and stuff. They're just constantly at you.

A collective agreement even now is hard because if you have a three-year collective agreement, it doesn't stop the employer from coming to you and saying: "We've got problems. We need your help." You either say, "No, go away. We've got a collective agreement and you're going to honour it," or you sit down with a committee of workers in the workplace and see if you can work it out. They want to keep working.

But the company doesn't hear the same complaints that we're hearing all the time, saying, "I can't work overtime any more because I've got another job that I do in the evening, because my wages have dropped," especially when you've got a lot of women, single parents and stuff like this. They're going from one job to a full-time job working an afternoon shift. We have some working midnight shifts going right into a day shift. People can't work 16 hours straight like that and keep going to maintain a standard of living, to be able to provide for their families. So it's becoming very difficult. You're always at the company's mercy because the threat is always there, "If we don't get what we need, we're going to shut down."

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Pat and David, for an excellent presentation. I think it's interesting that the government members continue as the day rolls on to talk about the federal government vis-à-vis bankruptcy legislation when there already was a very progressive piece of legislation in place under the wage protection plan that provided, for the first time ever, as a result of our government's initiatives based on lobbying from the labour movement, the very thing that they were talking about here today and asking you, "What are you doing about it?" that provided workers with an opportunity to have severance and termination pay and wages paid and vacation that was due them in the case of a bankruptcy.

It was this government, under Bill 7, which they didn't run on — there was no mandate to do that — that gutted that very program. So I find it quite hypocritical that anyone would suggest that the unions have been less than responsible to their members on the issue of lobbying the federal government when there already was a very positive, progressive piece of legislation that you helped bring about in the province of Ontario and that they gutted.

I also would like to turn to an issue that was raised earlier in the day about the whole issue of sweatshops and what's happening with garment workers. Given time limitations, I didn't get a chance to ask the question of them, so I'd like to pose it to you. We've seen in the States the whole issue around — what's that woman's name?

Ms Sullivan: Kathie Lee.

Mr Christopherson: There's been a focus down there and your union's been active in making this a big issue in the States. How big and to what extent do we have those kinds of sweatshops here in Ontario, in your opinion?

Ms Sullivan: If you go back to the basis of LA, where they had the whole big experience where they had the 18 or something women who were basically kept in a basement in LA, that is going on here. Maybe not as prominent, but you will hear about it. They're out there.

We talk to these workers on a fairly regular basis from our union. A lot of them are immigrants, probably almost 100% immigrant workers. They're afraid they're going to get deported or they're not going to be able to get any work because of language barriers or their children and stuff like this. So it's pretty much underground, but it's there.

We raised these issues when we came before the government on the whole issue of home workers and I think on the health and safety. I think every issue that's come before any committee of the government over the last number of years, with the NDP government, with the Liberals and now with the Tories, that's always been an issue that's there.

I think it's becoming bigger and I think you're going to probably start to see companies within this province start to come out. We're not only doing it with Kathie Lee, we're doing it with Disney World, which is now doing stuff in Haiti, paying them 38 cents a day and exploiting the women and the children and stuff like this, and I think you're going to start to see some stuff coming out in this province. It's there, it's not going to go away as long as they turn an eye to it. There's a lot.

I talked to one manufacturer who went into a factory with no windows, no doors, and there were just machines you wouldn't believe in there and people working in there, and it was one of our manufacturers. If that's not an underground movement in there, I'd be surprised. It was through a wife's business that he was in there looking at purchasing and stumbled on this place going down a long laneway. He said this was just a huge building that you would have thought was empty until you got inside.

I think it's very much alive and I think it's growing. Probably in just a matter of time what you're seeing with Kathie Lee and all the other issues down south of the border, and what we're doing here is to bring the message up to this province that it's going to start to happen here.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We appreciate your taking the time to make a presentation before us here today.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, LOCAL 815

The Chair: Our next group up is the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 815. We have 15 minutes to be used as you see fit.

Ms Gayle Long: I'm Gayle Long and I'm representing Local 815, along with my local, Local 3252. We're all hospital workers in CUPE. I'm here to make a plea of careful thought and consideration of the changes about to be made in the Employment Standards Act, to be called the Employment Standards Improvement Act. I cannot help but see this act as a step backwards, even prior to those accomplished in the early 1990s. At a time of restructuring in the public service sector, I cannot help but feel the government has misused its power against the right to protect the minimum standards of working conditions for employees by eroding the Employment Standards Act.

If this definitely was going to be an improvement act, there should be an increase in the base wage as the cost of living has increased and now rent controls have been taken off; also, there is the fact that Hydro may soon be sold off and then our power is out of our control completely. Our cost of food is also going up as our dollar is diminishing in other countries.

As for the part-time hours, I believe we should have a standard 24-hour part-time hour work and after that, anything over 24 hours should be called full-time, as many employers are using part-time workers in order to diminish the payment. I also believe it is time we opened our eyes and gave benefits to part-time employees. Many employees, especially those in non-unionized workplaces, have a need for vacation and protection also. There seems to be no definite protection there unless you do increase these basic ideas of employment standards.

Control of moneys by collection agencies is completely out of whack. These have a self-interest and self-motivating idea. There is no reason that the government could not collect moneys owed to workers by charging those employers who have gone against the rules and regulations of the Employment Standards Act. This should not be a burden on the government but a burden on the employer who has broken the law of the Employment Standards Act.

Employees will have a more difficult time getting moneys owed them and never receive full redress as the cost of going to these private agencies will take away some of their money. Also, anything over $10,000, they will have to go a civil court, and many of these employees would not be able to afford this. Employees should be recouping their money by a commitment made by the government. There is no recall. Many — I've done this all at the last minute. Can you tell?

I'm going to go back to the fact that employees now have only six months to file against an employer. This is unreasonable. The government will then have two years to investigate the claim, and then they have two more years in order to secure the money, at that time asking them to go to a collection agency in order to receive the money. Also, it's a fact that moneys under a certain amount, maybe $100, maybe $200, will go to Small Claims Court. This will also cost the government money and it's not a fair way to do it.

You, the government, with the passing of this act, will give the employer the instrument so that private companies paying the minimum wage and having substandard working conditions can accelerate the practice of contracting out unionized work, not giving concessions, those unions who will not give concessions to the new minimum standard. The unions in the past years have given away increases in salary instead for the protection of better working conditions and job protection. Now you're wanting to take these things away.

Already workers are under the stress of the threat of losing their jobs, as well as the burden of being overworked, since employees are not being replaced if they're off sick, as part of cost restraints. As well, only a percent of employees on vacation are being replaced. Now you are allowing the employer to have employees work more hours without paying them overtime.

Employees are under the pressure of being reminded by employers that there are thousands of people out there willing to do their job, and with the abundance of unemployed plus the threat of workfare, this is causing a great deal more stress. Non-unionized workers are finding their work is being contracted out over the past years or they are being laid off and they are being rehired in the same workplace by a private company at a reduced rate of wages. This is not fair.

I've had several people come to me to ask for help and information. They are not hospital workers. They are a young man who worked for a lawn care company. His employer gave him three paycheques, each one being an NSF cheque. He now has to wait 14 days for this cheque to go through his bank in order to see if it is NSF or not. A driveway paver for the summer had his pay held three weeks. It was one week holdback and two weeks in advance before he gets paid. He was then laid off and received no money. The same thing happened to a young man who works snow removal. There is also a young woman who came to me who worked in a doughnut shop. She worked three weeks and was told she was on training. Afterwards, she was told she was not to be paid during this training time and they didn't need her.

At a work clearance warehouse, a young woman came to me telling me of how everyone was a boss and she would be in trouble continually because this boss would tell her one thing, another boss would tell her another thing. At the end of it all, just simple clearance house gossip got her fired. She had nowhere to turn. She figured if she made too much fuss, she would be eliminated from ever working in a decent job again. She's been unemployed for two years and has three children.

All of these people have been too afraid to go forward, except for one young man who worked in a fast food franchise and worked in unsafe conditions when they used insecticides to get rid of bugs. He informed employment standards about this practice. Two weeks later he was given sick pay and was eliminated from his job.

The employees who will affect by these changes in the act are the most vulnerable. They are also the voters and taxpayers of this province. The changes seem to benefit the employer only and erode the protection to the employees. This is the open door to private companies having lower wages and taking advantage during this time in an oppressed job market. Please think twice about making these changes. This will not help the job market or the employees. It will only widen the gap between the rich and poor.

Thank you for your time.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us exactly six minutes, so we'll go two minutes per and we'll start with the government.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much for your presentation. It seems that you gave it a fair amount of personal thought, and I commend you for that.

You mentioned stress, and you're right. The world of work, as I see it, is changing. It's changing for a number of reasons: workers' habits, individuals, the market, a number of factors really.

I just want to bring a couple of points to bear, that today the collection system under the Employment

Standards Act is not working. Less than 25% of the judgements are actually collected, for a variety of reasons, so the system is really broken. Those who have been waiting — and the litigation process itself is bogged down, so the system itself is broken.

Another point that's important to think about is that 96% of the cases, when you're looking at the limitations which you were talking about, are under $10,000, and I think it's important to quickly get the parties together to get a solution as quickly as possible, which leads to the six-month period. If more people came forward as opposed to delaying it, the director can then bring subsequent claims, or the officer can bring claims, from other persons who may be in violation. So the quicker you bring these things to bear — I think there are a lot of very progressive changes that are long overdue.

I would ask you one question. Do you think the Employment Standards Act should go through a full hearing and full discussions, part 2 that was referred to by the minister?

Ms Long: I believe a full investigation, full discussion, should be made, including those people who best know the workforce. If we're talking to — I don't even know. Speaking to you, I don't know if I'm talking to closed ears, if we have an open ear and an honest opinion of people wanting to hear what employees and employers have to say. The only way it will work is if we all work hand in hand. As long as somebody is making the decision and forcing it on employees, it will not work. Employees can be cornered so far, and then they will stand up and fight back.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. Would you agree that having minimum standards as it applies to wages, minimum wages, has probably enhanced the quality of life in Ontario and has attracted people to the province?

Ms Long: I believe the minimum standards would be okay except for the fact that, depending on where you live in Ontario, the cost of living has gotten out of hand, and I don't find your standards are going to be all that much better. I know people are working longer, harder. Being in the health care sector, I see the cost of what is happening in the public: family breakdown, the emotional stress on families. It is becoming a growing concern. As we're cutting back on mental health, we're finding the stress out there is enormous.

Mr Hoy: My point would be, though, that if the minimum wage was lowered, that stress and those things that you're talking about would be more severe.

Ms Long: Would definitely grow. We are already seeing the breakdowns in families.

1640

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. Government members are talking sometimes, some of them, about the possibility of a broader review of the Employment Standards Act, and they've asked a number of people if they think that's important or worth doing or if there would be interest.

I'd like to ask you whether, since they're already going to do that in their own way — it's probably not a way that we're going to be real comfortable with, but they have the majority government. Do you think that not just the part about flexible standards but that all of the proposals in Bill 49 save and except the two or three items that really and truly are clarifications and are improvements — and that's it; there are two or three that really are minor housekeeping, that are improvements, and nobody's questioning that. Every union rep and community worker who's come in here so far has acknowledged that. But would you feel that the rest of Bill 49 should be put over to such a review rather than rushing this through?

Ms Long: Definitely. If you rush it through, it'll cost you more in the long run for the fighting back that will happen afterwards. I think also that you will see unions take maybe an unfriendly opinion to the government.

I have relatives on the wall out here who are former MPPs for the Progressive Conservative Party and I think they would cry at what's being done. They were strong believers in labour's rights and on human rights, and I think we're seeing it being eroded this time very drastically.

Mr Christopherson: Is it fair to say too that if there were such a review, that contrary to the government calling this — I mean, it truly is insulting that the name of this act is An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act. It's insulting to suggest that that's the name of this. But if you were to agree to a broader review in terms of improvements, would they be the sort of things that the government's contained here in Bill 49, or might they be some other things?

Ms Long: They would be some of the things I had listed below when I made my statement. I don't know if you picked up on them or not, but definitely to me this is a private industry takeover act as far as I can see.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We appreciate your presentation before us today.

ONTARIO SECONDARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' FEDERATION

The Chair: The next group up will be the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, Ms Wright and Mr French. Good afternoon to you both. We have 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation and question and answer.

Ms Pat Wright: My name is Pat Wright. I'm an executive officer for the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation. I am accompanied by Mr Larry French, who is a member of our staff. I thank you very much for the opportunity to make this presentation on behalf of the almost 50,000 members we have in education as teachers and in other areas of the classroom and providing the educational services for the students of Ontario.

When we looked at this bill, Bill 49, we saw there were some areas which seemed to be clarifications, I guess one may want to call them. I'm referring to the areas of vacation entitlement and the areas which remove some of the ambiguities around pregnancy and parental leaves. However, when we reviewed the rest of the bill, we found there are some significant areas where I would say that this bill does not represent minor housekeeping changes. In fact, they do represent some significant changes, changes which we would find problematic.

It's more than housekeeping. We do not believe it results in a better balance in the workplace. In point of fact, we would suggest that some of these significant changes would be moving the workers of Ontario backwards and have a potential for adverse impact not only upon workers, but on employers and the environment in the workplace, because I think it will have a very, very major impact on how collective bargaining and contract negotiations occur.

I came into the OSSTF as a negotiator and I know that any time we place constraints upon the system, constraints which adversely affect negotiations, it also adversely affects the environment in which we find ourselves. I speak specifically, for instance, to the area where we talk about flexible standards.

Recently we had the Olympics. During the Olympics I watched some very flexible people do some gymnastics, and in doing that they seemed to be bending and twirling and turning every which way. They were flexible. One often thinks of the word "flexibility" as a word that implies some kind of ability to change and accommodate. But what I see in this bill is not a flexible standard; it's a mechanism for adversely affecting the collective bargaining environment.

You talk about greater good — I'm speaking specifically to section 3. How do you determine what is the greater good? If I just read the section here, you're going to put "prevail over an employment standard if the provision confers a greater right upon an employee than is conferred by the employment standard." How do you determine the greater right? Greater right than what?

When you fool around, as it were, and alter the baseline, a baseline which sets the framework that everybody knows what the rules are and how those rules apply, you will have the potential for establishing one workplace operating under one set of standards and another workplace operating on a completely different set of standards. The minimum right guaranteed to all workers is a right which keeps both the employers and the unions operating in a manner to protect some basic rights for all workers.

As an educator, when I go into my classroom and I say to my students, "We believe in equity and we believe in fairness," do I tell them, "You have fairness number one in one workplace and fairness number two in another workplace?" I think not. I think that is not the Ontario that we have come to love, that we have come to cherish and that we have come to regard.

The kinds of things that can happen under this so-called flexibility in the workplace is that you have a tradeoff between a monetary value and time and something which is non-monetary in determining the greater right. Do you say, "Vacation pay is of more or less importance than time one has with one's children"?

For instance, it could turn out under this so-called greater right that a union could, for whatever reason, negotiate away working days. How long do you work? Do you work five days a week? Well, maybe now under this you'll work seven days a week. What happens to your time with your family? This is going to be especially problematic in those areas where we have single-parent families that feel they have very few resources available to them to fight this and to protest about this.

There's another section of the act, and I refer specifically to subsection 20(2), where we talk about enforcement where you have a collective agreement, enforcement where the employee is bound. "An employee to whom a collective agreement applies (including an employee who is not a member of a trade union)" is bound by the decision of the trade union. What happens to the right of that individual when the act itself takes away their basic right in terms of their employment? How do they respond? Because it says further that a complaint is not permitted.

We have some great difficulties with some of these sections of the act. Maybe the intent was for improvement, and I will not question the intent of the government because I'm sure the government wants to make Ontario a better working place for working people. However, I would question the actual application and the doors that this allows to be opened so that the working people can be adversely impacted upon by their employers, by unscrupulous employers. I know that although we try not to have those, we do have some of those.

I also have concerns about placing the onus upon the worker to take everything through the courts, because we very well know that we have a number of workers here who do not have the resources to find their way through extensive and lengthy court proceedings. We believe that the employees of the Ministry of Labour, people who work with employment standards — employment standards officers are trained, are capable and are therefore able to enforce the act, enforce the law and to ensure that if collections need to be done, then the collections are made rather than hiving off to private companies.

I believe that when you put in place a maximum claim that limits things to $10,000, what again you are doing is removing from workers their rights to fair wages. If I am owed $15,000, then pay me $15,000. Don't limit my claim to $10,000. I wasn't owed $10,000, I was owed $15,000 by an employer. I think the same thing would apply to limitation. The application of limitation periods, I think, takes away from workers their abilities and their rights.

In conclusion — and I'm looking at the time, so I'll leave some time for questions — I would suggest that this piece of legislation, Bill 49, does not represent minor housekeeping changes. If the minister is going to do a complete review of the Employment Standards Act, if there's going to be a review that is scheduled to take place, then why not leave this until such time as that review occurs? Why not work with the trade unions, the workers of this province — such as ourselves, for instance — who would be happy to sit down and discuss with you ways in which we can indeed make certain improvements and ensure that we have a piece of legislation that guarantees the minimum rights for the workers of this province.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us, bang on, six minutes for questioning. Seeing only two parties present, I will say we have three minutes per caucus.

Mr Baird: With respect to your comments about why not leave this to an overall review, the minister announced this morning that she would leave the bigger part of the bill with respect to the employment standards package, negotiating a package that was greater than the minimum standard, she did say that she would put that over to the review, which has already begun, is under way; so a big chunk of your suggestion. The minister certainly has listened to all stakeholders from both labour and many in the business community. To do so, she's done just exactly that.

I had one question I wanted to ask you. One of the provisions in the bill — and you didn't make mention of it in your presentation — is with respect to collections. Right now, once an individual makes a complaint, it's investigated and ordered by the employment standards officer, only 25 cents of every dollar that's been ordered to pay is actually paid. What do you think would be an acceptable amount for the ministry to collect? They previously, up until 1993, had a collections branch within the employment standards division that was phased out and the 10 employees there were made surplus. What would you think would be a good percentage that the government should aim for in terms of the recovery of money for workers?

Ms Wright: I would hate to suggest to the government that you pay 25 or 30 or 45. From my perspective, if a worker is owed 100%, then the worker gets paid 100%. I understand the logistics of that and how that may not be entirely possible. However, I suggest that if all of the employers contributed to a special fund from which employees who were in need of some kind of supplement could be paid as a kind of an insurance, or maybe even a wage protection, that kind of plan, then it is entirely possible that between what can be collected and what the fund could supply, they could be topped up to about 100%.

Mr Baird: I certainly agree with you on the 100%. I think it's got to be our mission as a government to ensure that 100% of the orders are filled by a given employer. With respect to your comments, though, on a special fund, would your union be advocating a new payroll tax of some form to cover that?

Ms Wright: I'm not referring to it as a payroll tax. I think we could sit down and work out the things that are necessary around the development of that kind of fund. I think it's a fund that employers should contribute to, to make a — call it a stabilization fund, if you want to call it something.

Mr Baird: That would involve, though, good employers. Mr Duncan said this morning that the vast majority of employers accept the responsibilities under their act. Certainly a majority do. The law-abiding businesses that are accepting their responsibilities and are treating their employees fairly shouldn't be punished for those firms that don't accept their responsibilities under the act.

Your point, though, about looking for 100 cents on the dollar is very apt. That's why the government wants to pursue private collection agencies, to say an order is issued, you have 45 days to appeal or pay but on the morning of the 46th, that will go into a private collection agency that will have, as Leah Casselman spoke of this morning, a personal interest in wanting to ensure that money is collected, because they don't get paid unless they collect money for a worker who is owed a claim. Would you have a problem with the private collection agency?

Ms Wright: Yes, we would have a problem with a private collection agency, because we are fundamentally opposed to the use of privatization strategies, as it were, to do the jobs that we think correctly belong to the government and the people of Ontario.

Mr Baird: We're getting 25 cents on the dollar. A year from now, if this is implemented and it's getting 50 cents, you'd still be against it?

Ms Wright: I did suggest to you a strategy that would allow you to not necessarily use the private collection agencies by looking at other strategies.

Mr Christopherson: Just to pick up on the last point of the parliamentary assistant, it's interesting that Hansard will show that the government's priority and objective is to achieve 100% of the funds. Yet if you look at the legislation the way it's drafted, if they collected 100% of what the law would allow, that could be only 75%, because that's what the new draft law would be, that there's a need on the part of private collection agencies to only collect 75%. That's the minimum amount. I find that quite interesting, and we'll pursue that further as the hearings unfold.

The government also leaves the impression, the parliamentary assistant certainly very specifically left the impression, that because the issue of flexible standards has now been referred to this broader discussion — it doesn't mean it's dead; it just means it's been referred to another day — that somehow everything ought to be hearts and flowers and the rest of this bill is quite acceptable to everybody. That's what I felt the impression was he was trying to leave. What are your thoughts about that? Do you think the rest of the bill is just fine with that one piece out, or do you think there are enough problems here that the rest of it ought to be referred to the broader review also?

Ms Wright: I think there are enough problems with the bill that it should be entirely referred to the broader review. In terms of flexibility of standards, the word "flexibility" tends to make me very nervous because we wonder, is the flexibility in terms of the application of the rules or is the flexibility in terms of the determination of what the rule actually is? I'd hate to see an Ontario where we have a checkerboard of standards across the province.

I think we have to move for a minimum set of standards, standards that every student in the province can get into the workplace and know where they are, where every parent knows, if their child is working part-time or full-time, where their child's rights are and where every employee in the province, whether they're a student employee or an adult employee, has a full knowledge of what to expect from their employer in the workplace, so that we have a basic minimum set of rights and standards maintained right across this province.

Mr Christopherson: If the government removed every aspect of this bill that had an impact on workers who have a collective agreement — so every reference to unions comes out and all that's left are references to non-union — would you still care?

Ms Wright: Would I care? Yes, I would care.

Mr Christopherson: Why?

Ms Wright: Because it's about the rights of individuals, whether or not they belong to a union. We have this section in here that I referred to, for instance, section 20 that talks about the employees a collective agreement applies to, whether or not that collective agreement is determined by a union. So we have to look at the fundamental rights of individuals and what happens to fundamental rights of individuals under this piece of legislation. I think that is what puts the workers of this province, whether or not they belong to a union, back in time. That's why we are opposed to this piece of legislation.

Mr Christopherson: Excellent. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you both for taking the time to make a presentation before us here today.

Ms Wright: Thank you for listening.

MARKHAM BOARD OF TRADE

The Chair: Our next group up is the Markham Board of Trade. Good afternoon, gentlemen. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between the presentation and questions and answers. I wonder if you might introduce yourselves for Hansard.

Mr Ted Shepherd: My name is Ted Shepherd. I'm the president of the Markham Board of Trade. I have with me Mr Cliff Hawkins, who is a director of the board and the chairman of the government and economic policy committee, whose committee put together our submission. Any questions, I think, should better be directed to Mr Hawkins than myself.

The Markham Board of Trade is a not-for-profit organization established in 1981 to assist member businesses in the Markham community and represent their concerns to government of all levels. We are associated with the Ontario and Canadian chambers of commerce.

We have 730 member companies which represent a wide variety of businesses, including computer and high-technology companies, business and financial services firms, wholesale and distribution companies and the hospitality industry. Our member companies range in size from large international corporations to small business enterprises. Some 92% of our member companies are small businesses. I might add that the majority of those small businesses have less than 10 employees. So 92% of our companies are small businesses, as I said, with 50 or fewer employees, and the remaining 8% are composed of large corporations such as Apple Canada, Allstate Insurance of Canada and IBM, to mention a few. Our member companies employ more than 32,000 people and our presentation to you represents the employers and employees of these firms.

Guiding principles: The Markham Board of Trade applauds the government's decision to significantly reduce its role in the administration and enforcement of the Employment Standards Act. Our belief is that the provisions of Bill 49 should reduce the cost of government, enhance the ability to do business in Ontario and continue to maintain the protection of workers' rights. We see this initiative with the Employment Standards Act as a clear step in the right direction. Therefore we support Bill 49, with very few exceptions.

The following are some key issues.

Reducing the cost of government: As a parenthetical comment, I might add that the board of trade has been actively pursuing the reduction of the role of government in business for many years. We are very glad to see that Bill 49 has come forward as a move to use existing structures and mechanisms rather than creating parallel ones that add cost. Making obligations under the act enforceable through the grievance and arbitration procedure of collective agreements for unionized employees provides business with the ability to deal immediately with issues without having to go to government for resolution. This is a natural extension of the grievance and arbitration procedure which further streamlines government and should reduce the cost to business.

A provision in Bill 49 that recognizes that the government should not be in the collection business has merit. By allowing the contracting out to collection agencies for amounts owing under the act, the government follows a principle that the private sector has successfully used of focusing their energy, time and resources on their core business rather than on activities which others can do more effectively. We expect this contracting out of collections will provide the opportunity to reduce the government payroll and achieve the collections with greater efficiency and effectiveness.

We are also pleased to see that the ability to file electronically is allowed under Bill 49. This will save time and money and will be consistent with the way many businesses operate today.

Enhancing the ability to do business: One of the major problems that business people have had with the Employment Standards Act was that of double jeopardy. Requiring individuals to decide whether they want to pursue litigation through civil action or file a complaint under the act will remove a great burden from business and yet still provide the individual the opportunity to determine which course of redress they wish to follow. This improvement to the act, coupled with a $10,000 limit on orders, will greatly reduce the cost of doing business in Ontario and assist business in being more competitive.

In addition, the board supports the amendment that requires that compromises or settlements relating to money owed under the act will be binding once the money is paid. We further support the reduction from two years to six months of the period that a complaint can be made of moneys owed to an employee as well as the extension from 15 days to 45 days for filing an application for review of an order to pay. This administrative simplification and shortening of time frames for claims, but loosening of review application filing times, moves further towards relieving the legislative burden on business while protecting the ability to appeal.

The Markham Board of Trade agrees that there needs to be greater flexibility in designing benefits provisions for employees. Under Bill 49, a business would be able to view as a totality a collective agreement's provisions for public holidays, overtime pay, vacations with pay, hours of work and severance pay, and weigh them against the provisions of the Employment Standards Act to see which confers a greater total benefit. This will assist employers and employees in designing benefit packages that most appropriately fit their individual circumstances.

Protecting workers' rights: Contrary to allegations by opponents of Bill 49, the Markham Board of Trade fully agrees with the government that Bill 49 does not weaken the protection of workers' rights under the act. Indeed, it guards against any reduction of employment standards in Ontario contained in the current legislation. If Bill 49 did not ensure this, the board of trade would not support it.

The board agrees with the provisions of the bill that pregnancy and parental leave should be recognized when calculating an employee's length of service and length of employment. This allows, as it should, these periods of employment to be included when dealing with any service-related employee rights in an employment contract, the one exclusion indicated in Bill 49 being the employee's probationary period.

However, the board requests that the government reassess the broader provision in Bill 49 which requires that entitlement to vacation time off and pay be based upon 12 months of employment whether the employment is active or not. This could result in an employee demanding to have vacation time off and pay after having returned from a paid sabbatical, for instance. Vacation becomes under this provision of Bill 49 time off from being on the payroll of an employer rather than time off from work. We argue that this provision is contrary to the whole rationale for ensuring a minimum standard of vacation time and pay in the legislation. We ask that this amendment to the act not be passed.

There is clearly a need to reduce government costs and its involvement in running private enterprise. Bill 49 helps reduce the red tape that makes it difficult to do business in Ontario and be competitive with companies in other jurisdictions. Bill 49 provides greater flexibility to a business to make arrangements with its employees that better serve both the employer and the employee in a particular business environment.

We endorse these improvements to the Employment Standards Act, with the one exception noted above, and look forward to the more comprehensive review of the act in the upcoming months to accomplish more of the same. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen. That leaves us again with just seconds over six minutes, so two minutes per caucus.

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton North): Thank you very much for your presentation. We heard earlier today about some very unfortunate employees who had been badly abused by an employer. Whether or not that employer is still in business in Ontario, I'm not quite clear. I think this bill is designed to alleviate some of the hardships on individual businesses, but if government were to come down very hard on those businesses that do break the law or do run up alongside the regulations, would your organization have difficulties with those kinds of activities?

Mr Shepherd: Not in the least.

Mr Chudleigh: Do you see that as government's role?

Mr Shepherd: We feel the role of government is to maintain a civilized standard of behaviour by business and employees, and the role of the legislation is to define those civilized standards of behaviour. If those have been defined by the Legislature, the Legislature and its arms of enforcement should be called upon to enforce those standards.

The Chair: Any other government members? We have one minute.

Mr Tascona: I'm just curious with respect to what your comment would be. We've heard a submission recently that we have difficulties in the collection of orders to pay. Presently the statistics are that two thirds of orders to pay are not collected. One measure that we have as recourse for companies that are bankrupt or insolvent is to go after the directors, but that's a fairly difficult and slow process. So the suggestion we've heard is that maybe a payroll tax or an employer-funded, experience-rated, which would be a tax, should be imposed on employers in general because we have a few bad apples. What do you think about that?

Mr Shepherd: We're opposed to taxes of all sorts. Businesses in Ontario are slowly but surely struggling out of a long recession. We are competing with jurisdictions with less government and less taxes. We feel the government in Ontario should be giving us a chance to make our way in the world and compete on an international scale. Adding taxes and disincentives to business doesn't help us at all, and it doesn't help the employees and the population of the province in the long run.

Mr Tascona: Do you think it would be of assistance if employers could file their appeal of an order to pay electronically and also pay the order to pay electronically?

Mr Shepherd: Our feeling is that that would be of benefit, yes.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for being here. I apologize for being out when you began your presentation. Earlier today we had a similar presentation that spoke in regard to the two-year and six-month period for complaints. They rather liked that idea, as do you, and they went on to say that they wanted an extension for the employee of 15 days to 45 days for filing application for review. It's interesting to me. I didn't have a chance to ask them, but one instance where reducing the time period by almost 75% — and you favour that. In the case of appeals it's an increase of almost 66% in the time. But anyway, would you give me your rationale for the extension on appeal time?

Mr Cliff Hawkins: Our view on that is that the greater time that you can give both the employee and the employer in responding to a situation is to everyone's advantage. We didn't really look at the percentage because the percentages really don't apply given that we're talking very different absolute values. Our concern is that there is fairness in the Employment Standards Act both for the employee and for the employer in that particular kind of circumstance, so we support that kind of change in the act.

Mr Christopherson: Interesting presentation. Your statement on the first page that "The Markham Board of Trade applauds the government's decision to significantly reduce its role in the administration and enforcement of the Employment Standards Act" is quite fascinating, and I'll do what I can to help get your message out to people about that.

I'm also interested in the statement that your member companies employ more than 32,000 people, which is significant, "and our presentation to you represents the employers and employees of these firms."

Mr Shepherd: I thought you might pick up on that.

Mr Christopherson: Yes. I'm a little curious as to how that is.

Mr Shepherd: We feel that the firms we represent are looking after the interests of their employees. They are giving them work, they are looking indirectly after their families and their welfare. We feel that the board of trade, in supporting these firms and supporting their interests, supports indirectly the interests of their employees.

Mr Christopherson: Fair enough, but don't you feel it's a little presumptuous, given the controversial aspect of this legislation, to present yourself as being the one entity that represents both sides of the equation?

Mr Shepherd: I must say that on the surface of it, the statement that we represent the employees in any direct way is a little presumptuous. I agree.

Mr Christopherson: On page 3, I was interested to note that you state that you "further support the reduction from two years to six months of the period that a complaint can be made of moneys owed to an employee as well as the extension from 15 days to 45 days for filing an application for review of an order," and you note "This administrative simplification and shortening of time frames for claims, but loosening of review application filing, moves further towards relieving the legislative burden on business while protecting the ability to appeal."

My question would be, that's fine for business, but what about the workers? Where do they get something out of that?

Mr Shepherd: We feel that the workers are adequately protected, and in fact we feel that the support of business and business enterprises in Ontario and their ability to do business and compete on an international and a national scale is a direct benefit to the employees and the population of the province.

Mr Christopherson: So whatever is good for General Motors is —

Mr Shepherd: If there's no business in Ontario there's no business for the workers in Ontario either.

Mr Christopherson: I have to say to you, in closing my comments, that that really is a scary thought because we're well past, I would suggest with great respect, the idea that we have benevolent dictators who can decide by virtue of what crumbs fall off the plate when workers are doing well and when they aren't. That's the last century. We're at the point where individual rights of workers and the collective rights of workers have their own place in our society. I'm quite surprised that a sophisticated organization like yours and a person like yourself would suggest that that ought to be the order of our society.

The Chair: That sounded more like a statement than a question. Thank you, gentlemen, for taking the time to make a presentation before us here today.

Mr Shepherd: Thank you for listening to us.

INJURED WORKERS CONSULTANTS

The Chair: Our next group up on our list is the Injured Workers Consultants, Marion Endicott. Good afternoon. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation and question-and-answer period.

Ms Marion Endicott: Thank you very much. Good afternoon. I have with me here Rebecca Lok, who also works at Injured Workers Consultants. We've been before you on other occasions, usually having to do with workers' compensation, but to the degree that you don't know of us, we're a community legal clinic providing services to people who have had the misfortune to be injured at work and who are having troubles with their claims at the Workers' Compensation Board.

We are of course speaking to you today on the proposed amendments in Bill 49 to amend the Employment Standards Act, primarily from the perspective of what that means in regard to health and safety. Will this generate increased protection for workers or will this possibly generate more injuries at work? As well, we want to look at the question of how it will actually affect injured workers, if at all.

The main part of the bill that concerns us is the part that allows for the minimum standards of the act to be overridden by negotiation between the employer and the union. This is of concern because there is a reason for minimum standards. They have been put there through years of experience and debate which indicate that they are necessary. It is our prediction that in the negotiation that occurs around minimum standards, the net effect of that will be to dramatically increase the hours of work that workers engage in both on a daily basis and on a weekly basis, and that is our main concern about the effect of this bill.

I think we're all very aware of what a central issue hours of work has been in our industrial society. Over the last century it's been a key area of concern and we have learned collectively together that it's very important to have not too many hours of work, that when you overburden people with work they are fatigued and they don't have time with their families, they don't have time for leisure. They are unhealthy, unhappy people, and unhealthy, tired, fatigued and unhappy people are not productive and they are not safe. It's our sense that the effect of these proposed amendments will be to produce a greater number of injuries at work.

The other aspect of the bill that disturbs us is that it represents a part of a general trend to lower workplace standards. The lack of enforcement provisions in the bill indicates that employers will increasingly feel that, well, the legislation is there but they don't really have to pay attention to it. When you don't have enforcement by the government, when you have within the amendments the suggestion that workers have only a limited amount of time to put in a complaint, that they can't even necessarily get back all the money they are due, or if they want to go for all that they've got to go to the recourse of the courts, which, of course, is a very expensive endeavour for anyone and would very much tax the resources of a working person, particularly a working person who is, as in the case here, without money because they have been laid off without severance pay or have somehow had a problem with their hours of work. In this kind of situation we can see that many, many workers will not pursue their claims and, as a result, employers will increasingly feel that they simply don't have to pay attention to the legislation.

This is part and parcel of what is happening in other pieces of legislation that all fits into a general picture of lowering of standards for the working people of Ontario. The other area where I am most familiar with it is in the area of health and safety. You're probably aware that the enforcement of health and safety standards has dramatically been dropping over the last few years and increasing numbers of inspectors have been laid off, and without enforcement behind legislation there is absolutely no expectation that the employer should have to live up to those minimum standards.

Another aspect of these proposed amendments is really an unjustified denial of rights, and that comes into effect in the sense that many of the workers will not pursue their rights because they can't afford it, because they missed the time limit. Why might they miss the time limit? One reason is because they may not know what their rights are. Unless the government is going to put a tremendous amount of time, energy and resources into educating workers as to what their rights are, to put a time limit on their pursuit of those rights simply is unjust. It's saving money by fiat. It's not actually doing any justice at all.

In particular for injured workers there's a problem with the time limit. You may know that after injured workers have been hurt, there's a legislative obligation by employers to take them back to the place of employment, and that is in effect for a certain period of time, effectively about six months. Whether or not there is a legislative requirement on the particular employer, there's a general human rights requirement that injured workers not lose their jobs because of their injuries.

Say we have an injured worker who has gone back to their place of employment and, for whatever reason, the employer is doing this in order to meet their legislative obligation but they really don't want that worker back. So they find some reason to lay that worker off. The worker, however, suspects it's actually because of their injury and wishes to pursue this with the WCB. That is their right to do that. You may or may not know that the WCB is notoriously slow. To have a claim processed at the WCB can take months and months, if not years and years.

In this situation, say we had a laid-off worker who didn't get severance pay and wanted to pursue under this act their severance pay. If they went to pursue the severance pay under this act, with that time limitation, they would in the board's eyes be accepting their laid-off situation and would not be able to pursue their claim that they should have that job, because taking severance pay is accepting the situation.

On the other hand, if they pursued the claim with the board but it failed, the board did not find in their favour, you can be sure six months will have passed, but by then it's too late for them to put in the claim for the severance pay. I'm sure there are many more other examples but, as I was reading through this material, that is the most obvious one that sprung to my mind around the return-to-work provisions.

Finally, I just want to make a general comment, which is the exact opposite of the two gentlemen who were here before me, and that is, as a citizen of Ontario, just the general concern about the race for the bottom. The employers really like this kind of legislation, they say, because it allows them to compete. To compete with whom? To compete with the Third World. What we're saying is we want Canada to become like Macau, to become like Mexico, to become like any of those Third World countries we are competing with. Well, I ask you, and we ask you at Injured Workers Consultants, do we really want that kind of society?

One of the reasons that companies like to invest in Canada, if we want to talk about it in business terms, is because even though it may cost a bit more per hour to employ a worker, this is a much nicer place. This is a place where you can live, this is a place you can feel good about and this is a place where we have healthier, happier workers who are in fact more productive. That's what the studies show. Both as citizens of this province and as people concerned about investment and productivity, really anything that lowers standards is not in our interest. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you very much. You've left us just under five minutes, so we'll take two questions. The first one will be the government side.

Mr Baird: Thank you very much for your presentation. We all appreciate it. You spoke, I guess, comparing some of this legislation with health and safety and you specifically went into great detail on declining enforcement. You said that an increasing number of inspectors have been laid off. Is that correct?

Ms Endicott: Yes.

Mr Baird: What's your source on that, could I ask?

Ms Endicott: Just the news. In the last six months the number of inspectors who were anticipated to be laid off were not. That was due to heavy negotiations between the government and the union that represented those inspectors. So not as many inspectors were lost as was feared, which is great, but we're still losing inspectors.

Mr Baird: But you're a professional. You'd get better quotes. I guess it's a concern we have. There have been no health and safety inspectors laid off in the previous year, none. It never happened, there never have been plans to.

Ms Endicott: Oh, there were plans to. I can vouch for that. It may —

Mr Baird: I asked you for your source and you just said, "the news." I think it's very important to put on the record that this government hasn't, but that Bob Rae's government did, by 7%. They cut the number of health —

Ms Endicott: We were pleased with that. I have no quibble there.

Mr Baird: I would take, though, your energy with that and put it to my friends from the third party, because I can tell you, health and safety is a very top priority for the current Minister of Labour. She's made it the top priority within the department; there have been no cuts in health and safety inspectors. She's been crystal clear on that. We've repeated it at every available opportunity, because it's a real priority.

I guess I have a concern. You explicitly said that they had been cut, and I think it's important that folks like yourself, who are professionals and well-respected, as you should be with the incredible amount of experience you've got, have your facts, because this government hasn't cut the number of health and safety inspectors like the previous government did because we think it's more important than they did not to cut. It's a real priority for us.

Ms Endicott: I'm sorry, I have to intervene. This government has done nothing to satisfy us within the health and safety realm. It is true that the number of inspectors that were anticipated to be laid off were not laid off due to heavy negotiations, but we have not seen anything that increases the enforcement and there was very poor enforcement before. I'm not going to stand here and say it was good; it wasn't.

The number of critical injuries has gone up 28% in the last five years. I didn't bring those figures with me, but the number of inspections have dropped dramatically over the last five years. It includes the NDP government; it includes this government. They have dropped and they're dropping. If this government is serious about health and safety, and I didn't come here to talk about the health and safety legislation, I came to talk about —

Mr Baird: You did though.

Ms Endicott: Well, I talked about it in —

Mr Baird: In great detail about it.

Ms Endicott: Anyway, the point is that if this government is serious about workers' health and safety, they would really put a lot of resources into enforcement and not devolve everything to the joint committees at the workplace and they would get rid of experience rating at the WCB, which is a major factor in diverting employers away from health and safety despite their statements to the contrary, and instead put their energies into fighting claims.

1730

Mr Hoy: Thank you for being here today. I was particularly interested in your conversation about severance and how it related to WCB and time lines and how one could jeopardize himself that way. I have to admit it's the first that I've been aware that could happen.

Further to that, I have had a number of constituents who don't understand their severance rights. You're quite right. People tend to know what the minimum wage is within a dime or a nickel or so and they know what the hours per week might be, but on some of these other issues I've had many requests, "What are my rights as regard severance?" So I appreciate your pointing that out to us.

Ms Endicott: Thank you.

The Chair: We're well over our time. Thank you very much for taking the time to come and make a presentation before us here today.

CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

The Chair: Our next group is the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, Metro Toronto region. Mr Borch, good afternoon. We have 15 minutes for you to use as you see it for questions or presentation. With that, the floor is yours.

Mr Robert Borch: The Canadian Union of Postal Workers is a national union. It more often than not falls under federal guidelines and jurisdictions. However, we also represent postal cleaners and various other groups in delivery-related functions that are respondent to provincial laws and regulations that guide the day-to-day worklife.

On May 13, when the Honourable Elizabeth Witmer introduced changes to the Employment Standards Act, she described them as housekeeping changes and implied that the alterations were to be minor and technical, the clarification of the existing regulations rather than the revamping of legislative procedures and language that would have a definite effect on workers in Ontario. Upon review, we found these alleged housekeeping changes to be quite major, with a detrimental impact on the cleaning industry at Canada Post and groups newly organized to ensure all workers with some very basic rights in Ontario.

The housekeeping amendment resulted in the polishing of employers' rights in Ontario so that they'd shine brightly, while at the same time workers' rights are either disposed of with the trash or swept under the carpet. Actually, this assault on unorganized workers, those truly dependent on assistance from governmental labour ministries, is even more serious as it will result in another roadblock to their basic rights as both organized and unorganized workers and has them remain at the abusive control their employers. At the same time, the organized workforce is deprived of some very basic rights which it had become accustomed to in Ontario for many years, decades in fact.

This brief is made on behalf of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, which represents 65,000 workers across Canada, 20,000 of whom reside in Ontario.

(1) Flexible standards, section 3 of the bill: Prior to Bill 49 there were some very basic rights guaranteed in Ontario in which collective language could not be eroded by virtue of contractual negotiations where employers have an unfair advantage by way of such weapons as the legislative invitation to the use of scab replacement workers during industrial disputes.

Bill 49 allows collective language to supersede the basic standards in the arena of public holidays, hours of work, severance pay, overtime and vacation pay if the contract "confers greater rights...when those matters are assessed together." Talk about a way for lawyers to send their kids through university. This kind of language is what does it. This now allows for tradeoffs and a legalistic chess game that will see all those rights eventually eroded below the previous floor that was guaranteed legislative protection.

Under Bill 49 an employer could force an agreement but eliminate severance benefits or expand the hours of work, a safety issue, by enhancing overtime or vacation pay, making it easier for job layoffs and plant closures in Ontario, something we certainly don't need.

The basic rights previously respected are now carved away. Knowing well about the inequity in negotiating power that this government has encouraged in previous housekeeping arrangements, one need not be a rocket scientist to realize the effect that lay around the corner.

Employers can now put items on the negotiations table that were previously guaranteed and protected by law in Ontario. This will lengthen the negotiating process, stifle settlements for the weakest of those and at the same time encourage more disputes rather than enhance agreements between the parties.

At the same time it will starve small unions into submission, as legal costs will soar in order to establish the "confers greater rights...when...assessed together," which is the quite convoluted language of Bill 49. This housekeeping change in itself would be enough for us to stand up as postal workers to oppose the changes.

(2) Enforcement for the organized: Under existing language, a low-cost and efficient route is available for the parties to allow access to investigative procedures and to allow direct enforcement at the same time when it comes to such matters as workplace closures and the resulting effect on severance packages.

Bill 49 places a barrier in front of unionized workers, so this avenue previously enjoyed and often utilized is now blocked. Once again, this is a cost factor aimed at starving smaller unions into submission. Although the director can make an exception, it is at his or her whim, and unions will once again pay the price of this change. The resultant effect will be to encourage interunion turmoil by providing another avenue for individuals to challenge a trade union by deeming to have the Employment Standards Act included in collective agreements.

This amendment will mean that a union can be confronted with complaints with regard to the Employment Standards Act concerning the duty of fair representation. The responsibility with regard to the failure of enforcement will shift from employers to unions. With this change, the Ontario Labour Relations Board will be open to interpret such failure as a breach of the duty of fair representation, thus again opening the door to additional financial liability and even more congestion on the time of unions.

(3) Enforcement for the unorganized: This change would shift the responsibility for enforcement of minimum standards for non-unionized workers from the Minister of Labour to the courts, by way of the "other means" proviso. Also, the amount that is recoverable is capped at $10,000, whereas presently there is no arbitrary limit. If an employee chooses one avenue, such as to claim for severance benefits to the Ministry of Labour, by virtue of the proposed amendments that employee is restricted from bringing a civil action for payment in lieu of wrongful dismissal for additional compensation.

Postal cleaners who file a complaint under the act have a very restricted window of two weeks to choose between a remedy in civil courts or to proceed under the regulations of the act. This could leave many out in the cold or unaware of this window, and there are much shorter time frames than presently outlined in their collective agreements.

Under section 64.4 there is restrictive language in which, once a civil action is started, employers are given the bonus of not paying wages owed, which is criminal in this society; or failure to comply with successor rights, which is a major roadblock to postal cleaners. Also, a worker who initiates a civil action for wrongful dismissal is not allowed to claim severance or termination payments under the act.

(4) Ceiling on claims: The arbitrary maximum claim of $10,000 seems to apply to such matters as back wages, vacation pay, severance pay, termination moneys etc. This is perforated only by a few exceptions. What this does is license, basically, the boss to steal from workers, as often these amounts will exceed $10,000 where there was no cap before. If postal cleaners or truck parcel personnel are owed more than $10,000 in back wages, severance pay or vacation pay, then why would this government allow them to be robbed of what they are justly owed?

Often an agreed-to collective agreement may grant severance pay for a 20-year employee which in itself would exceed the $10,000 to discourage plant closures, massive layoffs and job losses, something I hope this government will be looking at. The minimum claim provisos of the proposal — no dollar figure has yet been set — will also be refused outright if they attempt to file a claim for wages owed to them by an unscrupulous employer. So both at the top end and at the bottom end the workers get the short end.

(5) Private collectors: The use of private collectors is a major error and is in lieu of simply having the employment practices branch do what they should have been doing all along: Collect assessed amounts owed and enforce standards. Penalties should be imposed against employers who feel they are above the law and refuse to pay. These penalties should be substantive and serious enough to be a deterrent. Rather than enforce the rules, the bill proposes to shift the burden to the private sector and attach a collection fee on top of it all.

Where the amount collected is less than owed to, say, postal cleaners, regulations would then be apportioned of the amount between the collector, the government and the employees. This puts a great burden on such low-paid workers. The danger is that those employees owed money who are at the low end of the wage scale may be required to pay fees to the new collectors as well, so they get less than is legally and rightfully owed to them and must pay a fee in order to get the deflated amount. Postal cleaners can't afford these systemic taxes on their money, nor can other workers at the low end of the pay scale. As they are starved into accepting less than is owed, they are at the same time taxed as being forced into agreeing to a lesser amount. Is it that the government of the day just does not want to hear from the working class in our society?

(6) Miscellaneous, but still important: Presently employees have two full years where they can be entitled to back pay from the date of the complaint being filed. This housekeeping change will reduce that period to only six months, thus again taking money from the workers' pockets. This time restriction is a major one which benefits the employers once again. Failure to meet the new six-month rule will mean, "Forget what you are owed or take the legal road," which is often out of the financial reach of postal cleaners or other low-paid workers in Ontario. Yet the ministry still is granted two years from the complaint date in which to investigate and two more years to enforce payments. Now tell me there is not a law for the haves and a law for the have-nots.

Conclusion: The Canadian Union of Postal Workers will not deal with the positive elements — and we do recognize them — of the proposed changes here but rather what we consider the problem areas.

The question of successor rights in the postal cleaning industry is a sensitive one, where contracts are breached simply by virtue of a company changing its name. This leads to contract talks that are never-ending and periods of potential constant labour unrest. In circumstances where these issues are to be dealt with by a third party, we believe that a panel should be used rather than a solo decision-maker, but I digress.

We also feel a floor on a minimum standard must be maintained not only to stop the erosion of the rights of the most vulnerable in a workplace — which we call "the lame deer syndrome"; the wolves always stalk the lame deer — but also to set a standard of living in our society in Ontario. We feel these alleged housekeeping changes are in fact quite major. They allow loopholes for employers to easily chop away at what at the present time are basic rights which Ontario workers have enjoyed for years.

The CUPW asks you to reconsider moving the burden of the promised tax breaks from the backs of the wealthy to the pocketbooks of the impoverished in our society.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us with three and a half minutes, so we'll get two brief questions. I believe the last time we ended with Mr Hoy, so it would be Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for an excellent presentation. I enjoyed it. I want to ask you to embellish on the point on the fifth page, second paragraph, where you talk about flexible standards. Although that's being put off, there's no doubt in my mind it's coming back in a big way, so we need to be talking about it as early as possible. You state: "Employers can now put items on the negotiating table that were previously guaranteed and protected by law in Ontario. This will lengthen the negotiating process, stifle settlements for the weakest of those...and encourage more disputes rather than enhance agreements between the parties." Can you just expand on that, because I think it's important we have that on the record, as to why you think that will be the result.

Mr Borch: When you have employers at the negotiating table they have the power to end strikes or start strikes. When you're giving more power to employers there is more chance for them to want to starve the unions into submission. By doing that they enter long periods of negotiations and long periods of industrial action. They also have at their whim now, of course, the scab legislation that was introduced in Ontario where once again they can keep a company out on strike much longer.

You'll notice during the anti-scab legislation in Ontario that there weren't the strikes people thought there would be. In fact, there were fewer strikes, because all of a sudden you had to bargain; you had to sit down face to face with the boss and you had to bargain. There was pressure on both sides. When that pressure is lopsided, when the scales of justice are turned to one side, then you on't have that pressure on either of the parties to settle. In this case what you'll have is the employer sitting back, letting the strike happen and letting it go on as long as it wants and encouraging such a standard in our society, which I think is detrimental.

Mr O'Toole: On the same point, picking up on Mr Christopherson's, I would ask you to explain to me flexible standards. I've worked in a number of workplaces. Earlier on today we had a presentation from the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation. They don't work a traditional 40-hour week. Police and fire don't work an eight-hour day. There are exceptions and exemptions today. I think for harmony in the workplace you, as the person in that workplace and involved in the collective agreement, have a duty and a right to make the best decisions for the hospitality industry or seasonal work, like Christmas rush at the post office; you don't man up. Could you respond to flexibility in that context. Do you think it's a good idea to have flexibility in the workplace and certainly input from both union and management of the workers?

Mr Borch: Not when that flexibility erodes basic rights, and that's a problem.

Mr O'Toole: No, no, no. Clause 3 clearly says "no less than." I think with all our smart people in Canada and in Ontario today, if I read section 3 it's very clear; it says in there if the agreement "confers greater rights." I think we can codify and quantify those rights. In a collective agreement they do it every day for relief time, sub time, vacation time; it's all codified. So don't tell me that with all the intelligence today in the unions and very competent leadership, they can't in their own workplaces quantify and codify these equalities so that there are no fewer rights for the individual worker. There will be different hours of work and tradeoffs, more time off from the workplace perhaps instead of overtime.

Mr Borch: Yes, it would be Utopia, I'm sure, in your eyes, but certainly —

Mr O'Toole: We'll get there.

Mr Borch: If you'll let me finish my answer, the fact is that the basic rights in Ontario will be eroded, because right now you have guarantees that cannot be fallen below. What you're doing here is laying a loophole for employers to ease out of those things. One round of negotiations they may take out two articles, the next round they'll pick out the other two articles, but in the end there will be a lesser standard of living for workers in Ontario and for society as a whole in Ontario.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Borch. We appreciate your taking the time to come before us here today.

DONNELLY COMMUNICATIONS AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT (TORONTO)

The Chair: That takes us to the last presentation of the day, Donnelly Communications and Community Development, Mr Don Young. Good afternoon.

Mr Don Young: Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to speak to you today. My name is Don Young and I'm a consultant in communications and community development. I work with government and non-government agencies primarily. Most of my working life has been spent in the third sector or the social economy. I'm also one of those who feel that the Employment Standards Act is one of the pillars of our economic system.

Bill 49 is supposed to improve the Employment Standards Act, but in its present form it will do two things. It will provide maximum freedom and flexibility for owners and employers by making all employment standards negotiable. The definition of "standard" in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary is "the authorized exemplar of a unit of measure or weight," like a foot, a pound, an inch, or the number of hours in a workweek. If standards are negotiable, then standards don't exist. As you've heard many speakers mention, it will weaken the position of unionized and non-unionized employees. I won't go into that right now.

The Progressive Conservatives want a revolution. Any party that calls its political movement a revolution has to live with the consequences. I'm not going to comment on the Common Sense ideology, but I would like to label it as capitalist fundamentalism, and like any fundamentalism it is intolerant of other opinions. I'm sure that the Harrisites among you will not listen to me, but for the rest of you — for the NDP, for the Liberals and for the truly Progressive Conservatives — I would like to offer a word of warning. This is the same kind of thinking that brought us the first Industrial Revolution. You might say, "Great, back to basics." But do you really want to go back to the basic exploitative relationships of the 19th century and, I might remind you, to the many political revolutions and the vast environmental destruction which followed? Personally, I would not like to see a repeat of the 19th century. Once was bloody enough.

Recently I have attended large public meetings of several hundred people where single moms have spoken emotionally about the need for violence and everyone in the room understood what they meant and sympathized, maybe even empathized. These were not meetings of radicals. They consisted basically of the middle class, middle-aged and middle of the political spectrum, or at least what used to be considered middle before the abrupt turn to the right.

No, I'm not going to talk about the politics of the Harris Conservatives because the consequences of their actions will soon present themselves most ineloquently. Harris wants government to step back and give free rein to private interests. Without the leviathan of government we will soon have a Hobbesian war of all against all. From the beginning of this revolution I have said that all of the money that the Harrisites save by dismantling our social safety net will eventually be spent on policing. I was interested to hear that Harris plans to build super-prisons. In light of the Conservatives' other policies, this is a good idea. As in the States, when you have a significant percentage of your population in prison, it keeps your unemployment figures down.

No, I'm not going to talk about the politics, although I'm tempted to, but I'm going to talk about the economy under this particular piece of legislation. At a time when our economy is under attack by those who can mass-produce more cheaply elsewhere and when the true cost of transportation is not even factored into the price; at a time when we should be trying to make better things more efficiently rather than the same things more cheaply; at a time when everything is measured by its price and not by its true value; at a time when Canada and Ontario are becoming hourglass societies with the middle class disappearing down the funnel into a rapidly growing lower class; at a time when we cannot provide decent entry level employment for our young people and they are forced to join a disaffected underclass; at a time like this we should be raising standards, not making them negotiable. When you have nothing to bargain with, it only means a race to the bottom.

Why can't we enter the race to the top? The opportunity to change the Employment Standards Act should be welcomed by all progressive people. As in the past, during periods of chronic unemployment and economic crisis, we should be sharing out the work, making sure that everyone can earn enough to live. In this way we build a sound and sustainable economy, support civil society and our democratic political system.

The problem is that we have too much work for a few and not enough work for many. Some people are now working 60 or more hours a week to make ends meet and don't have time to enjoy the money they make. Many are unable to manage their work, personal, family and community responsibilities. This time squeeze has negative effects on mental and physical health. In Japan, deaths from overwork have become a chronic problem. Meanwhile, the number of unemployed and underemployed is rising.

Ontario is facing a jobs crisis of major proportions. The unemployed, the underemployed and the young are feeling increasingly marginalized and without hope for the future. The latest official statistics have climbed into the double digits and the real unemployment figures are about 50% higher. The official rate for youth is about 17% and estimated as high as 27%. Neither growth nor conservative economic policies have led to more jobs. Historically, a shorter work time has.

Between 1800 and 1950, the standard work week was reduced by an average of three hours every decade. Sharing the work ensured that labour-saving technology created leisure, not unemployment. After the Second World War, we abandoned this winning and proven strategy. Canada's level of unemployment has risen by about 2% a decade ever since.

None of these figures accounts for the growing army of the underemployed. In the past few years, I have met people working, even for the province, on three-month contracts which might or might not be renewed. In this way the government ministries do not have to apply the employment standards, provide benefits or give statutory holidays. Since then I have discovered that this is common practice in the private sector. Instead of employees, many companies have individual subcontractors or temps who have virtually no rights. Large corporations maintain absolute flexibility by out-sourcing grunt work to free-trade zones in the Third World and keep an army of overqualified, underpaid short-timers here to check and correct the substandard work.

The bottom has already fallen out of the job market and employment standards are dropping. The unemployment figures, which are already higher than they have been in years, do not tell the story of the growing number of underemployed and underpaid who are trying to earn a living under any conditions. Then there are the many who have simply dropped out and have joined the underground economy.

A balance between those who want to work more and those who would like to work less must be restored, along with a domestic balance between production and consumption. While exports are driving our current growth, domestic consumption is flat. But can we count on export markets indefinitely? When unemployment rises, consumer confidence declines. It is no accident that in recent years the number of bankruptcies in Ontario has increased dramatically.

Yes, we need a revolution, but a revolution to increase the quality of life for people of Ontario, not the quantity of things they can buy someplace else. We need permanent full-time work for as many people as possible and the security to afford well-made, environmentally friendly domestic products. One element in this new economic strategy is higher and stronger employment standards.

Therefore, I modestly propose that the following be included in any revision of the Ontario Employment Standards Act:

A reduction of the workweek from the current 48-hour maximum to a maximum of 44 hours per week; overtime of time and a half to paid after 40 hours.

An end to employers' exemptions from any maximum, as well as an end to the agreements between employees and employers to exceed any maximum. Exceptions should only be made in cases of emergency and in specific fields of work, as in the current act.

The limiting of overtime to a maximum yearly amount for each employee is another alternative. As long as this annual maximum is not exceeded, there could be flexibility in the way overtime is calculated; ie, overtime could be taken off in vacation or personal time in lieu of pay. Employees should also be given the right to take time in lieu.

The length of the standard vacation with pay should be increased from two to three weeks.

Whether they are temps, part-timers or on short-term contracts, the rights of all workers must be protected.

Last, but not least, the enforcement of standards should be strengthened, not weakened, and a public education program should be carried out to inform employees of their rights and employers of their obligations.

The North American free trade agreement and the rule of the Harrisites seem to have started a race to the bottom in terms of standards. I hope the members of this committee choose to do something to stop it.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. You have examples and some philosophical approaches to your presentation as well. You talk about the underemployed and the young. There was a time when employers confided in me that people were cheating on their applications and stating they had more education than they actually had to get jobs. Now I'm hearing that the reverse is true: In hopes of getting a job, people are saying that they maybe don't have a PhD, or whatever degree it might be, so they don't appear to be overqualified. The fear of the employer is that if they ever had the chance to work where they actually were trained for they would leave. It is a changing time indeed.

You talk about overtime. I've had presentations from the public to me that they're not receiving overtime but yet do not complain about it for fear of losing their job. Your call for more enforcement would certainly help that out.

Mr Young: Yes. I think it's also important to have an education program. As was mentioned earlier, there are people who don't know what their rights are and I think it's very important that a public education program be conducted so people actually know what their rights are.

Mr Christopherson: I join my colleague in complimenting you on an interesting brief and the presentation going in the specifics of what the government's offering. In the context of the broader philosophy, quite frankly, I think we need a little more of it so that all of this is understood in a context that's relevant. For those of us who are here and active in this business it's quite easy to see the whole agenda and to see the picture and where we're heading. There isn't much of what you've said that I would disagree with.

The one thing I would ask you to maybe focus on, because you say it in many ways, but not directly, just so it's there for Hansard for future reference — many who have come forward have suggested that this piece, as it fits into the larger Tory agenda, is creating a society of haves and have-nots, that we're polarizing. I guess you referred to that when you talked about the hourglass. Can you just expand on that a little bit in terms of where you think we'll be in three, five, seven years if we continue with this kind of an agenda? What sort of society do you think we'll have vis-à-vis the one we used to have?

Mr Young: Obviously, if you're giving more power to the employers and taking away power from their employees, the bargaining position of the employees will decrease. I see on the broader agenda, as the previous speaker said, that we are attempting to compete with the lowest common denominator in terms of nations. We're trying to compete with the maquiladoras or the Brazils of the world, and what we should be doing is trying to compete with the Swedens and making products that people can be proud of having made and that are worth buying. I hope this agenda doesn't happen; I hope there is a turnaround, a rethinking. That's why I came today.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Young. I appreciate your taking the time to come in before us here today.

Just a reminder to the committee members that the bus to Hamilton leaves promptly at 7 o'clock tomorrow morning from Queen's Park. If there's no other business to be conducted, this committee stands recessed until tomorrow morning, 9 o'clock, at the Sheraton hotel in Hamilton.

The committee adjourned at 1801.

Consideration of Bill 49, An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act / Projet de loi 49, Loi visant à améliorer la Loi sur les normes d'emploi.

OAKVILLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Good morning all and welcome to the second day of hearings on Bill 49. Our first group up this morning will be the Oakville Chamber of Commerce. Good morning, gentlemen.

Mr Peter Warmels: My name is Peter Warmels. I'm the president of the Oakville Chamber of Commerce this year.

Mr Don Crossley: Don Crossley, executive vice-president of the Oakville Chamber of Commerce.

Mr Warmels: The Oakville Chamber of Commerce is an organization representing more than 1,100 members. Members range in size from the Ford Motor Co to small business persons employing one to three people. We welcome the opportunity to address your standing committee with regard to Bill 49, the government's proposed employment standards improvement legislation.

The Oakville Chamber of Commerce congratulates the government on undertaking a two-stage reform of the Employment Standards Act and supports Bill 49 as a first step in the process. The act itself has been outdated due to legislation being added over the years without a complete inquiry into its underlying framework. Our chamber awaits the second phase of reform and supports the stated goals of promoting greater flexibility among the workplace parties.

Our chamber supports your three goals outlined in Bill 49: to allow the Ministry of Labour to administer the act more efficiently; to promote self-reliance and flexibility among the workplace parties; and to simplify and improve some of the language in the act. We believe that in doing so the bill continues to protect minimum employment standards for employees and workers.

The Oakville chamber is very supportive of the provisions of Bill 49 which eliminate duplicate claims, limits recovery of money to a six-month period and extends the appeal period. Employers are increasingly faced with defending claims of the same nature or for the same remedy in multiple forms. Non-unionized employees are able to have employment standards disputes dealt with by the courts in wrongful dismissal actions as well as by the employment standards branch. Unionized employees are able to file grievances under the collective agreement to be dealt with in a grievance and arbitration process, and may also file claims with the employment standards branch. This should avoid employers having to defend the same dispute in multiple forms and duplicating their costs. In our opinion, the public purse is often unfairly burdened in this manner.

The proposed provision of the act limiting the entitlement to recover money to six months instead of two years places the onus on employees to make complaints in a timely manner. In our opinion, the more time that elapses with a complaint, the more difficult will be the investigation and, as a consequence, increased costs to both parties.

The increased appeal period, from 15 to 45 days, provides for a more reasonable time in which to allow the parties to negotiate a settlement in lieu of an appeal, more carefully consider the merits of filing an appeal and make the necessary payment of the amount of the order and administration cost to the director to apply for the appeal. The current 15-day period in which to make the payment causes an unnecessary hardship to employers.

Our concerns: Notwithstanding our support in general of Bill 49, we pose the following questions, all dealing with section 20 of the bill, regarding enforcement of the act through the grievance and arbitration procedure.

Question 1: Is it appropriate to grant arbitrators the power to make an order that any employment standards officer is able to make? Our chamber believes that the arbitrator should not be taking on this role, as an arbitration hearing will only take place after the various steps of the grievance procedure have been concluded.

Question 2: What is the process to appeal/review an arbitration decision enforcing the act? The act is unclear about whether any arbitration decision may be appealed or if it is in fact final and binding.

Question 3: Do time lines in the act or the collective agreement prevail? All collective agreements set out time lines in the grievance process and must be filed and processed, but in many cases these time lines will be different than those in the act. Our chamber believes that collective agreement time lines should prevail to ensure consistency.

Question 4: Is the arbitrator's ability to award damages restricted by the six-month recovery limit? It is not clear from the proposed amendments if this is the case.

Finally, the chamber would support moving the provisions of Bill 49 allowing for a greater right or benefit assessment as a package to the second phase of reform. Our chamber strongly believes that allowing for a greater right or benefit as a package is an important component of allowing workplace parties the freedom to mutually agree to arrangements which, if viewed separately, would not be in compliance with the act.

In conclusion, the Oakville Chamber of Commerce supports the two-stage Employment Standards Act reform process and supports Bill 49 as the initial step in that process. We urge you to consider the questions we have raised to clarify certain of the proposed amendments. We thank you for allowing us the opportunity to appear before your committee today.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): Thank you for your presentation. The issue around arbitration is now coming up repeatedly with a number of business interests across the province. I wonder if it wouldn't be your view that perhaps the government might want to take the arbitration clauses out of the bill and deal with them in the second part of the process. Would you think that would be a prudent step on the part of the government?

Mr Warmels: I think the process of dealing with the appeal process certainly requires a lot of review, and if it can't be dealt with in the first step, then the second step may be more appropriate — wherever the most thorough degree of review can be taken, whether it's in the first or the second step.

Mr Duncan: The nature of your comments on the arbitration indicate to me that you would contemplate amendments to the bill as proposed that would substantially alter the government's intent. Would it be your recommendation that the government, prior to adopting this legislation, at the very least consider amendments to the arbitration, and if it's not prepared to consider amendments to the arbitration clauses, then deal with them in the second phase?

Mr Warmels: Yes.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): Thank you for your presentation; appreciate it. I noted on the second page, sixth paragraph, "We believe in so doing the bill continues to protect minimum employment standards for workers." I have some difficulty appreciating how that can be if you accept that right now the minimum is there is no cap on the amount of money that a worker can claim for, there's no minimum threshold they have to cross to be eligible to make a claim. They're losing the ability to claim for up to two years; it only goes to six months. With those losses of minimum protections that workers have now, how does that square with making the statement that you believe the bill will still continue to protect those very minimum standards that no longer exist?

Mr Crossley: I think that whenever you are taking a review process on something of this magnitude, there are a number of issues that have to be addressed. I don't disagree with what you're saying. We attempted, from our vantage point, to do the best we could in the time allowed to come up with what we felt were some solid questions that needed answering. I'm sure if we had studied it for another month, we probably would have come up with more and perhaps reached some of your conclusions. But in a general way, we feel a general level of comfort with what we've suggested today.

Mr Christopherson: I would just express that part of the concern of my colleagues and I is that a general level of understanding or acceptance is really difficult when the Employment Standards Act is the only real bill of rights that workers have and the government maintains that there are no losses and, I think I've pointed out clearly, there already are losses.

To the parliamentary assistant, maybe the fact you didn't have enough time would point to the fact that maybe this whole thing should have been put off for the year-long review, bearing in mind that the government tried to ram this through in just a few weeks last session.

My other question to you would be over on the next page. It says, "The proposed provision of the act limit the entitlement to recover money in six months instead of two years places the onus on employees to make complaints in a timely manner." I can appreciate that train of thought, but we've already heard evidence yesterday in Toronto from groups representing particularly visible minorities, women, people whose first language isn't necessarily English — in other words, the most vulnerable — non-union shops, where there are unscrupulous employers. I know that you wouldn't support employer who violate the laws, and I believe that's a sincere position on your part, but what we've heard is that there are an awful lot of these workers who are so fearful of losing their jobs and have so few other opportunities for employment that they don't make claims until, quite frankly, they've either been fired or quit out of frustration or have another opportunity to go to another job. But with this change in the legislation, they've lost the right to claim for a year and a half of money that's owed them; money they've already worked for. Again, how would you square the benefit that you see as an employer with the rights that the workers are losing?

Mr Crossley: I would suggest that there are still vehicles in place so that this process can be dealt with with due diligence in a six-month time frame. I do not think you need two years.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Simcoe Centre): Thank you very much for your presentation. There is one area I want to explore with you. Essentially the standards that govern employment are not being affected by this act, except for pregnancy leave and vacation leave, which are being clarified. What we're dealing with are administrative and procedural changes.

I just want to comment with respect to your concern about the arbitrator's powers, because as you know, we're looking at putting the resolution process between unions and the employer through the collective agreement process. From what I can see of your questions, is it your concern that you want to make sure that the arbitrator's powers are limited to the purpose and rights that are given under the Employment Standards Act and no further?

Mr Warmels: Yes, I certainly do. The arbitrators, even today, have an immense amount of power in the decision-making process, and the consistency with which their decisions are applied throughout the process is difficult to comprehend at times. I think they need a support of some sort to back up the decisions they make, particularly when it comes to the process we're dealing with today. Even considering that there is an appeal process in place, arbitrators — and we're concerned — may be allowed to make the final decision.

Mr Tascona: But within the context and the rights that are provided under the act, that would be fine with yourself?

Mr Warmels: Certainly, but the act can always be interpreted differently by arbitrators from one to another.

Mr Tascona: With respect to the cap, up to 1991 the cap for claims was $4,000, and then it was changed to be unlimited. Now we're back at $10,000. Do you feel that's a reasonable limitation, given the balancing with respect to the ability to enforce the act and also deal with the resources the government has to deal with this type of legislation?

Mr Warmels: I'm not here prepared to specifically comment to the amount of a cap. I firmly believe that a cap is necessary. I firmly believe that providing a timely process, ie, within the six-month period, would allow for that cap to be administered much more effectively than if there was no time limit on the due process that's to be taking place.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen, for coming and making your presentation before us here today. We appreciate it.

Mr Warmels: Thank you.

HAMILTON AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Hamilton and District Labour Council. Good morning, gentlemen. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between your presentation or a question-and-answer period. Once you're settled in there, I wonder if you'd introduce yourselves for Hansard as well, please.

Mr Wayne Marston: I'm Wayne Marston. I'm president of the Hamilton and District Labour Council. With me today is Darren Green, who is the chair of the political action committee of the labour council. Darren's actually going to present the brief to you, but just prior to that, there's a couple of observations I would like to make.

First of all, I'd like to thank the committee, of course, for the opportunity to present to you. For the record, the Hamilton and District Labour Council represents some 40,000 workers in the city of Hamilton, of course along with their families.

But one matter I'd like to deal with, I'd like the visitors in the gallery who are not with labour unions to raise their hands. Would you, please? Now, those that are with labour unions, please raise your hands. The reason I'm doing that is to be very clear with you that labour hasn't somehow stacked this room. I just wanted to get that point across. What we do have with us are a number of concerned citizens that were at a breakfast with us this morning. We had a bit of a meeting with them in advance. I just thought that that was important for the record: to see that there is a balance between unionized and non-unionized workers' concerns with Bill 49.

I've been following this provincial government's actions in ramming through Bill 7 and attempting to do the same with Bill 26. It's not overly surprising to us to see Bill 49 surface and some of the changes that are proposed in it. But I wonder, for one, if this government has considered an action that took place here in the city of Hamilton in February, when 100,000 people came on the streets of Hamilton. Now, that was one out of every 75 people in the province of Ontario. You should ask yourself what would cause people concern enough to come out to protest. What they were trying to do simply was to get the ear of their government. Those concerns were based on what they anticipated would happen with this government, not what has come to fruition so far. Especially with these proposed changes contained in Bill 49, they're realizing some of their worst fears.

The labour council's brief points to the fact that the changes proposed in Bill 49 take away many of the basic rights workers have enjoyed for many years, rights which helped ensure them some dignity on the job. Unionized workplaces will continue to have, as a result of a strong collective agreement, that sense of dignity still.

There will be significant pressures put on unionized workers, and I understand just yesterday the minister deferred some aspects of Bill 49 to a later date. The more cynical people out there say that that was being done because of the fact that they felt that it would pull labour away from the table at these hearings. I can tell you very clearly that for those who may not know much about labour, we have a couple of defining principles, and one of those is an injury to one is an injury to all, and that does not mean simply unionized workers. Our concerns are across the community for all workers.

At this point I'll ask Brother Green to present the brief to you.

Mr Darren Green: I'll start with the background. When the Minister of Labour, Elizabeth Witmer, introduced Bill 49 in the Legislature, she advised members present that the bill was intended to only streamline the act and encourage compliance and simplify administration. The reality of Bill 49 is that it has far greater implications than simple housekeeping. The Hamilton and District Labour Council believes these changes will continue the trend established by Bill 7 and further erode the workers' rights, to the benefit of their employers.

The fairness and balance in the workplace sought by such groups as women workers, minority workers, food processors and servers, home workers and domestic workers will be dealt a serious setback by the provisions in Bill 49.

The Employment Standards Act was originally intended to provide a floor of rights for the workers of the province of Ontario, and with the passage of Bill 49, Ontario workers will find much of that floor has crumbled away beneath their feet. The Employment Standards Act, as it existed in the past, has been notorious for its weakness and also for the lack of enforcement by the Ministry of Labour. There are estimates that one in three employers violate the basic standards contained in the act. This can certainly be attributed to the lack of enforcement.

The Hamilton and District Labour Council believes that these same dishonest employers will, as a result of the provisions of Bill 49, have a relatively free hand to continue to coerce and abuse their employees.

Mrs Witmer said that the bill was simply housecleaning. We don't think so. The following is a short list of some of the impacts expected following the passage of Bill 49:

Bill 49 causes workers to forfeit their rights in order to simply keep their jobs. It gives employers an open season to continue to violate the act. It further neuters the act by wiping out the floor of basic rights for both non-union and union workers. It caps the amount of money a worker can claim from their employer to $10,000. It shortens the period a worker has to file a claim. It forces workers to seek a resolution from the courts without the support of a legal aid. It gives collection agencies a power to negotiate settlements lower than the minimum.

Employment standards are no longer seen as minimums. In the past, under the Employment Standards Act, in the areas such as minimum wages, public holidays, vacations, hours of work, notice of termination and severance pay workers had a guarantee of a minimum set of terms and conditions of employment. The employment standards set out in section 4 of the act were minimum requirements. It was not possible to waive an employment standard, and when the amendments proposed under Bill 49 are enacted, this will change significantly.

Under subsection 4(3) it will read, "A collective agreement prevails over section 58 and parts IV, VI, VII and VIII of the act if the collective agreement confers greater rights relating to hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays, vacations with pay and severance pay than the act confers, when those matters are assessed together."

The blatant loss for workers contained in this section is clear. As long as the overall benefit package is deemed to confer greater rights than currently contained in their existing collective agreement, it becomes acceptable that some areas of the package may offer less than the standard protections. This particular change, in the opinion of the Hamilton and District Labour Council, will open the door to tremendous pressures from employers for regressive changes to the existing collective agreements.

The Ontario government has set about deregulating the workplaces of this province, which begs the question, has anyone in the government really asked themselves why the regulations were enacted in the first place? And as well, why aren't workers across the province of Ontario celebrating the so-called flexible standards proposed in section 3 of the bill? The answer should be obvious. It is because they can clearly see a significant erosion of their rights.

Complaints become grievances under Bill 49. The changes to enforcement contained in Bill 49, section 20, will further damage relationships between employers and their workers when nearly every significant issue, such as workplace closure, severance and termination pay, must be subjected to the grievance process. The offloading to the union and the employer of the important investigative and enforcement powers of the Ministry of Labour will cost both parties dearly in terms of dollars and lost productivity.

Subsection 64.5(2) of the act will read, "An employee to whom a collective agreement applies...is not entitled to file or maintain a complaint under the act." This includes an employee who is not a member of a trade union.

When enacted, this section will mean instead of having access to the act to resolve a problem, both employer and workers must do so within the grievance procedure contained in their collective agreement. This change, in effect, will force unions and employers to resolve the most basic of employment standards disputes through the costly grievance and arbitration procedure.

Other enforcement changes for non-unionized employees have set into motion the prospect of workers having to seek a resolution of their problems in the courts. We, as workers, know that accessing our courts is very costly and without a legal aid plan to assist them the average worker will not even be able to take advantage of this process. An example I would give to illustrate the problem would be the case of a clerical worker wrongly dismissed and who attempts to get restitution by going to the courts. Their lawyer fees alone may run between $800 and $1,200 a day, and should the case run three or four days, even if they win a settlement of three months' pay at $5,000, they would still lose. A worse case would be if they lost the case and faced the prospect of paying the legal fees of their employer. Ordinary workers faced with such risks will not be able to proceed with an action, even if they are in the right. Because of Bill 49, they'll find it necessary to accept the bare minimum as allowed under a claim to the Ministry of Labour.

The use of private collectors, as laid out in section 21 of the bill, will further remove the Ministry of Labour from its duty to enforce the act when employers refuse to pay for their violations. Now Bill 49 proposes to transfer the collection function of the Ministry of Labour's employment practices branch to private collectors. Such a move will further complicate the possibility of a worker receiving what is due them, and in some cases will ensure they do not receive any money at all. A case in point would be, a person close to or below the minimum wage could be expected to pay a collector's fee. In other words, they would have been victimized by the employer and now they are being victimized by their own government. The workers of Ontario deserve better from their government.

There are some positives to Bill 49 that the labour council sees in the area of vacation entitlement of two weeks and the fact it will accrue even if the employee has missed some time due to illness or a leave of absence. In addition, the changes to seniority rights and service during leaves of absence, such as parental and pregnancy leaves, which will now be included in the calculations of length of employment, service or seniority are also positive.

In conclusion of my part of the brief, the Hamilton and District Labour Council strongly urges the committee to recommend the government scrap Bill 49 and then to work to provide education to employers and workers as to the rights under the Employment Standards Act as it exists and to use the resources of the Ministry of Labour to enforce workers' rights, not weaken them. We believe a critical piece to building and maintaining a solid and productive workforce is the development and enforcement of a progressive Employment Standards Act, not the erosion of the act as proposed in Bill 49 and certainly not by the Ministry of Labour abdicating its responsibilities to the private sector.

Mr Marston: Just a couple of comments to add to that. As the result of the changes proposed in Bill 49, workers in both union and non-union shops will be confronted by employers and managers who demand more flexible terms of employment. It's very clear that the minister withdrew some things yesterday that are addressed in this brief, but it's because those issues are important and the fact that the bill even looked at them in the first place that we decided to continue with our brief and speak to them.

The expectation of more flexibility would open the door to a deterioration of working conditions and relationships between workers and their managers. One of the things that we've had for a number of years is relative labour peace in the province of Ontario. We could, from different philosophical views of the reasons for that, propose that Bill 40 helped us extensively and there are other areas of legislation in the past that did, but clearly that is at risk with Bill 49.

The types of changes, if enacted, would succeed in sending labour-management relations in this province back to the pre-Second World War era. In this community, that era led us to the great strike of 1946. I, for one, am very saddened that we have in this province people, who 50 years ago stood in those picket lines to fight for basic human rights for workers, who see this government forcing their grandchildren back towards those kinds of rights. The question that I have to ask is: Just how far is this government prepared to go with taking away rights?

I will say one thing to you: If you're eyeing the idea of a free trade zone in the province of Ontario, you're in for one hell of a fight. We know, from the perspective of workers, that under the free trade agreement there was a certain call for harmonization of laws with the United States, but it even appears that this government's prepared to take that even further and perhaps harmonize with Mexico. The workers of this province, both unionized and non-unionized, deserve better than that. They deserve better than their government turning on them.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen. We have one and a half minutes and under the rules we had set up, that will allow one question. So, again, the first up this round would be the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: Yes, just —

Interjection.

The Chair: We've been doing the same thing. We went all the way around there, so we now start with them again.

Mr Duncan: Did you want a question? I'll yield —

Mr Christopherson: We ran into this yesterday too. We started with the official opposition, we had one presentation. Now we've had the second presentation, so in rotation —

The Chair: But we've been rotating so that the total time each day, reflecting that the 15 minutes in most cases won't allow three questions.

0930

Mr Christopherson: Then could I respectfully request during the gap that's there in the schedule a quick meeting of the subcommittee to straighten this out —

The Chair: No problem.

Mr Christopherson: — because I'm not satisfied with the way this is going.

The Chair: Fine. Mr Duncan has yielded to you in this round, if you like.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate that very much, but I would still request a meeting.

Interjection.

Mr Christopherson: That's a valid concern.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for the presentation, Wayne and Darren. I want to ask you one question. There has not yet been an employers' group that's come forward, including the one from this morning, that hasn't said in their presentation that they believe workers' rights are being protected and therefore they're giving their full support to Bill 49. I'd like to give you an opportunity to go on the record with Hansard as to why you believe that minimum rights and standards are being lost under Bill 49 in a very direct way.

Mr Marston: It's very clear that there is a move to empower employers even beyond what they had traditionally in the workplace. The sad part of it is, from our perspective, that for many reasons under the existing legislation and the enforcement that was there, there were already abuses in the workplace, and this further takes away the dignity of workers in those workplaces.

Mr Christopherson: If I can then, to wrap up, I just want to compliment my own home-town labour council for the job it's doing representing the working women and men of this community. I think you do an excellent job and I appreciate everybody being here to explain it, Darren.

The Chair: Yes, and I'd like to thank you, gentlemen. As you put on the record, I'd like to put on the record that we appreciate the people who have taken the time to come out here today and participate in this process. That's the whole point of going around the province, and we appreciate the time you've taken to come and make a presentation before us here today.

Mr Marston: That opens the door to one more comment. I sure hope that this government continues to have public hearings on every piece of legislation. Thank you.

SOCIAL PLANNING AND RESEARCH COUNCIL OF HAMILTON-WENTWORTH

The Chair: That leads us to our next group, the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton-Wentworth. Good morning. If you would be kind enough to introduce yourself for the benefit of the Hansard reporter.

Dr Charlotte Yates: Perhaps to start with we should say that the name on the agenda of the presenter is clearly not either of us, as it's a man and there are two women sitting here. We are both executive board members of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton-Wentworth. This is Sharon Smikle, and I am Charlotte Yates. We will be jointly presenting the SPRC's presentation.

Ms Sharon Smikle: The Employment Standards Act established in 1968 was introduced to ensure minimum labour standards. Since that time, the act has helped contribute to a level playing field upon which employees and employers can negotiate by establishing standards in employment agreements regarding hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays, paid vacation, pregnancy and parental leave and severance pay.

Originally, the employment standards were put in place to protect women, children and the most vulnerable of workers. Nineteenth-century legislation was initially implemented to ensure appropriate health and safety measures in the workplace. In the years following, the minimum wage was established for the protection of underpaid women and children. Hours of work also became regulated. These pieces of law were consolidated to yield the Employment Standards Act. This law not only benefited workers and their families but also profited employers, as workers proved to be more productive under good working conditions.

The provincial government is proposing to make slight changes to improve employment standards in Ontario through Bill 49, the Employment Standards Improvement Act. We believe these significant changes will erode the effectiveness of the act and diminish the rights of workers. The impact of flexible minimum standards, limitations placed on the rights of workers to back wages, the enforcement of employment standards and the use of private collectors to recover money owed to employees will do little to improve working condition or the productivity of the Ontario labour force. There is concern that this bill will make exploitation not only possible but legislated. The ongoing restructuring of our labour market continues to increase the amount of power employers have over workers, and Bill 49 further reduces the capacity of the worker to secure quality work and a living wage.

The government promises that Bill 49 will make the act more relevant to the needs of the workplace and protect the most vulnerable workers. However, in light of the current environment and the erosion of our social safety net, we insist that the strict enforcement of the existing Employment Standards Act is what is relevant to workers, more now than ever before.

Currently, Statistics Canada reports unemployment rates will continue to rise, but these statistics fail to count the large number of people who have been laid off or are no longer looking for work or the growing number of people on social assistance. This large pool of unemployed or underemployed labour acts to keep wage levels low and workers from leaving their jobs, regardless of the conditions in which they work.

Under Bill 49, the situation will worsen by diminishing the collective ability of workers to voice their concerns. Under Bill 40, employers are now able to bring in labourers to replace striking workers. This effectively eliminates the only tool workers have to reach fair employment agreements — their labour — and those workers without the protection of a union must be their own advocates, knowing that if they make too many waves, there are hundreds waiting for their own job.

The changes proposed in Bill 49:

Flexibility of minimum standards: Bill 49 will allow employees and employers to negotiate employment contracts below current minimum standards of hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays, paid vacation and severance pay. This is possible as long as the contract provided appears to have greater benefits than those under the Employment Standards Act.

This can be illustrated by the following example. Under Bill 49, employers will be given the legislated right to remove the two weeks' vacation in exchange for additional severance pay. This agreement may seem more attractive than the other under the Employment Standards Act, but upon closer examination, employers will find it easy to offer severance pay at the time when people are in no position to leave their current employment, and for workers who are desperate to find work, they are in little position to be bargaining.

This and other scenarios will be possible because there is nothing in Bill 49 that states how the value of a particular benefit will be determined over another, and there is nothing that states who will determine the value of what each benefit is worth. Although the province has promised to table this section of the bill until the fall, the following concerns need to be addressed, regardless of whether it is brought forth now or later.

Agreement on the value of non-monetary benefits is virtually impossible to obtain, as individual workers and employers will place different degrees of value on these rights and benefits. Who will determine whether an individual employee will have input into this contract, especially in this period of high unemployment when employers have significantly more leverage to make that call than their employees?

Employers need to carefully consider Bill 49. Studies have found that work hierarchy and organization has a profound effect on the health status of populations. By eroding the rights and control a worker has over his environment, an employer will face the costs incurred through reduced productivity and increased absenteeism. Moreover, this will cause unrest and ensure that the relations between employer and employee remain acrimonious.

Dr Yates: Maximum restriction on claims and enforcement of employment standards: Under the current act, workers can choose to file a claim against an employer for back wages under the employment standards branch of the Ministry of Labour, in civil General Division court or in both. While this system is far from perfect, requiring employees to wait unreasonable amounts of time for even the employment standards branch decision, it does ensure that an employee's right to receive all the money to which they are entitled is met.

Under Bill 49, the employee must now choose between filing a complaint under the ESA or with General Division court. The benefit of an ESA claim is that it will be processed somewhat more expeditiously, but the drawbacks are that this claim is restricted to six months of back wages and a maximum settlement of $10,000, regardless of the period of time for which wages are owing or the amount owing. Under a civil claim, these restrictions do not apply, but the length of time of a civil case, as well as the cost of hiring a lawyer whose services would not be covered under legal aid, are prohibitive to many employees. Therefore, the employee is forced to choose between receiving what is rightfully owed to them and waiting years for the money, or receiving less than they deserve if they are in need of the money quickly or if they can't afford to pay for a lawyer. This bill forces a resource-poor employee to file a claim under the act because they cannot afford to hire a lawyer to sue in civil court and cannot wait for the money that is rightfully theirs.

Since the government's stated purpose of this portion of Bill 49 is to streamline the process for cost-effectiveness, the question then becomes: Will this bill reduce government costs? In reality, it cannot. The added cost to the legal system will outweigh any savings to the Ministry of Labour, since the burden is merely being shifted from one body to another. Therefore, the changes to this section of the act do not appear to save taxpayers dollars but do appear to deny justice to the most vulnerable of workers.

Privatization of collection: Enforcement of employment standards decisions and the collection of money owing to employees has always been a major problem with the act and within the Ministry of Labour. In 1994-95, of the $64.3 million in wages found owing to employees, $47.8 million was not collected, mainly due to employers' refusal to pay and the weak enforcement of the existing Employment Standards Act.

The government proposes to privatize the collection functions of the Ministry of Labour, thereby absolving itself of the responsibility to recover what is owed to workers of the province. But there is no guarantee that private collection agencies will be more successful than the ministry in collecting money. There is the possibility that collection agencies will exert more pressure on employees to accept less than they are owed, even under the maximum limit, to expeditiously process the claim so that they can then collect their fee. In the cases where the collector is unable to collect the full amount of money from the employer, their collection fees are to be paid out of the money owed to the employee. Considering the maximum limitation on money claimed and the ministry's previous track record in collecting money, it is likely that not only will employees receive less than they are entitled to receive, they will have to pay a user fee to collection agencies when employers refuse to pay the full amount of the claim settled under the act. Everyone wins in this situation except the employee.

Our summary: Does Bill 49 improve work relations or reduce the cost of enforcement of employment standards? Our analysis shows that it does not. The Employment Standards Improvement Act is anything but an improvement. At present, there are 20,000 formal complaints made annually, alleging violations of the Employment Standards Act. We believe that with Bill 49, the number of violations will increase. Bill 49 will have a negative impact on working conditions and will erode the employment standards Ontarians have struggled to develop over the last 50 years. In a society battered by constant change and downsizing, it is essential that legislation protects the rights of all working people, who find it increasingly difficult to protect themselves. We feel that these changes, combined with anticipated changes to the Occupational Health and Safety Act and Workers' Compensation Act, will make Ontario a harsh and a dangerous place to work.

The Chair: Thank you both. That leaves us with just over four minutes, and we'll start this round with the government.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): Thank you very much for your presentation this morning. I have a question, though. In one of our presentations yesterday in Toronto, we heard a very serious and significant, impassioned plea by a woman who, quite frankly, has been mistreated by the system. I acknowledge in your presentation that we agree that collection hasn't been on the best side of the employee's benefit in the past. As a matter of fact, I think you used the number that $47.8 million last year remained uncollected. That's probably living proof that the system isn't working the way it was, and for the intervenor yesterday, that's exactly what she confirmed. She had an impassioned plea: "Please do something." This is a multi-year issue; it's not just yesterday.

Would it not seem reasonable, then, seeing as the responsibilities for collection were even minimized in the last government's efforts because of layoff of staff on collection and absorbing that into other responsibilities of ministry staff, that perhaps attention wasn't being paid as it should? The government, as is presented in the bill, sees that perhaps there's another way to do this. Would it not seem reasonable to give that a try before somebody would say, in fact, it won't work, seeing as the other systems haven't worked in the past?

Dr Yates: I agree with you that there have been many problems in fact, not even in the last two but five or 10 years. There have always been problems with collections of employment standards since they were first developed. Part of that has been the low level of people responsible within the government for actually going out and dealing with employment standards complaints. Therefore, I think there is room for looking at new ways of doing things and doing them better so that you protect employees.

I think the concern, and I think a reasonable concern of the Social Planning and Research Council, is that to privatize the collection is not necessarily the answer. There are a series of anticipated problems, which we haven't gone into in great detail here, that we would anticipate from privatizing. For example, if there's a conflict of interest between a private collection agency and an employer, is there any body through which employees can ensure that their interests are being protected when you've privatized it to a business which may have links with other employers? Collection agencies are involved in all facets of business, not just in the collection of money, so that is just one example of a potential problem with privatizing the system.

Having said that, while I agree there's a need for experimentation, the question is how you experiment and the type of changes that you implement. It suggests to me that privatization is not necessarily the route to go, and to experiment without trying to anticipate a little bit what those effects will be would be seriously detrimental to employees.

Mrs Fisher: In closing, I would just add that her plea was, "Government can't do it for me, hasn't done it for me," and I'm not just talking about a government, I'm talking about government in general has not been able to do it for me." I think one of the reasons that we so strongly support the effort to try this otherwise is exactly that reason.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): Thank you for your presentation. I want to follow up on the same line of thinking, that if the current system is not working well for employees, as you rather agree, in your brief you're saying that by reducing the benefits to employees in the hope that some other system will collect the moneys for them is not what you're looking for; 75% threshold, user fees, as you mention, is not the answer you're seeking from the government in the hope that they can get some moneys rather than the current system.

Dr Yates: I'm not sure what your question is.

Mr Hoy: If the current system is broke, the government's suggestion of going this route, with private collections, is not the answer you're seeking to a broken system. Is that correct?

Ms Smikle: I think that in the interest of fiscal responsibility, we've seen over the years that the government has been downsizing. So the people who are enforcing the employment practices legislation, the collections end of things, have been regionalized. With that move, I don't necessarily think that all of the collections effort or the effort to see if we can collect more expeditiously and go after those employers who are trying to get away from making payment to these employees has been exhausted.

I don't necessarily think that all the options that perhaps are out there have been exhausted. I think that regionalizing that end of things, in terms of the collections component, has not been the most effective. It wasn't effective before when it was done centrally, and certainly being spread out among the regions has not proven to be effective either. I think there might be other options, though, within government to do that.

The Chair: Thank you both. We've gone over our time, but we appreciate your taking the time to make a presentation before us today.

HAMILTON DISTRICT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: The next group presenting this morning will be the Hamilton District Chamber of Commerce. Morning, folks. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for Hansard, please.

Mr Lee Kirkby: Welcome to Hamilton. We're very pleased to have the committee here. Please come back in November for Grey Cup. We're trying to celebrate 150 years of success in this community and we like as many guests as we can through the course of the year.

My name is Lee Kirkby. I'm the executive director of the Hamilton District Chamber of Commerce. With me is Sharon White, a member of our human resources committee and one of the people who has assisted us in putting our material together.

The Hamilton District Chamber of Commerce is the largest general business association in greater Hamilton. Its 975 members employ in excess of 50,000 persons within the regional area, ranging in size from one-person organizations to some of the area's largest employers both public and private. We are pleased to be able to make comment upon the proposed changes to the Employment Standards Act and the process undertaken to address this important legislation.

In the past year and a half, we have seen our membership grow substantially. This expanded base of involvement has brought with it a sense of promise, excitement and new enterprise which has been coupled to the substantial expertise and success of the restructured organizations which were the traditional base of greater Hamilton. There are several characteristics of the organizations we see today which have application to the issue covered under the employment standards legislation.

Today's businesses are generally smaller than those of the past decades. We see businesses of from two to 20 employees as a much larger part of the general economy. Most of these organizations do not have specialized human resource professionals involved in their operations.

Many organizations are virtual corporations. This type of organization is more of a cooperative than a traditional company. There are no employees, only contract individuals and groups who carry out specific functions for the organization. Some are groups of individuals who come together for marketing purposes but operate independently for other aspects of the enterprise.

Increasingly those enterprises which focus on export markets or which provide services to enterprises with an export focus are the ones which are growing and prospering. They find that their operating hours and time frames are very different from our traditional models.

The chamber is supportive of the government's action in initiating a two-stage reform of the Employment Standards Act. This presents an opportunity to redefine this legislation, taking the realities and new needs of today's economy into account. The first steps which are proposed in Bill 49 are reasonable beginnings to a more comprehensive review in the second phase. We will be pleased to participate in that process as it unfolds.

We have been told by our employers and the professionals who advise them that the act as it currently operates is cumbersome and leads to unnecessary delay and expense for all parties. Revisions are needed.

It is difficult to object to the government's first objective, seeking for improved resource utilization by ministry personnel in administering the act. Proposals to use commercial processes for such items as collection of unpaid judgements are good examples of methods to utilize expertise appropriately.

The second objective, to promote self-reliance and flexibility among the workplace parties, is critical in light of the changed nature of today's workplace. The ability for the parties in the workplace to be able to determine the working relationship, to be able to effectively respond to their customers' needs, is a vital part of expanding our economy. In absence of revisions to the legislation, the tendency to contract relationships will continue to grow. Recently one of our members described the unfortunate view which employers sometimes take in the following way, "The decision to hire an employee has become one which is a managed risk." If we do not make changes, this view will grow and prevail.

The third objective is to simplify and improve some of the act's language. This is a critical element in order to meet the first objective. Confused language and precedents make it impossible for the parties to understand and manage their relationship in light of the law. Administrative procedures for enforcement of the legislation must also be clear and understandable; otherwise we will see an increase in litigation, not the lessening, which everyone would desire.

Under the proposed amendments, employees in workplaces without a collective agreement will have to make a choice of whether they wish to commence an action before the courts or lay a complaint with the Ministry of Labour under the act. Only one of the two remedies will be available in each case.

We note that in the case of unionized employees under the proposals, where a collective agreement is in place, the amendments provide that only the grievance procedures under the collective agreement will be available for action. This effectively shifts the cost of the administration of the act on to the affected employer and union and stops the individual employee from seeking action through the ministry.

We have a question: Is it intended that the provisions of the act are to form a part of all collective agreements in the province? In other words, does it become an underlying clause within every collective agreement if this is the procedure to be followed?

While we strongly support the provisions which stop the use of multiple forums for the pursuit of individual cases, we would suggest that consideration be given to permitting the choice, in the case of the unionized employee, to be exercised as to the method of remedy at the commencement of a claim. This would parallel the choice which is provided in the non-union case.

There are several sections of the amendments which we think might benefit from further thought and review before enactment. Generally they relate to issues which appear to create the potential for confusion and subsequent litigation to clarify the application of the procedures.

1. Language relating to vacation entitlement: Section 8 of Bill 49, amending section 28 of the act, adds the clause to the first paragraph, "whether or not the employment was active employment." We are not certain whether this amendment is intended to provide that for every instance where an employee is absent from the employment environment, vacation entitlements shall be continuous. As the amended section is worded, an employee on extended educational leave, even by agreement with the employer under some specific terms of that leave agreement, long-term sick benefits or other agreed absence, could be granted a claim for vacation pay upon application. We suggest the added wording may cause more problems and more litigation than it solves.

2. Arbitrators in lieu of employment standards officers: The amendments provide for instances where the actions of an arbitrator shall have the same powers as those of an employment standards officer. We are not certain that the differences in the relevant powers under other statutes and procedures of these two types of officers have been adequately dealt with in the amendments. Considerable concern is raised that the clauses which deal with these powers will lead to substantial litigation as the different provisions of the two types of officers are resolved. We would urge the committee to look seriously at the implications of these provisions and make them clearer before the legislation is enacted.

3. Greater right or benefit: We have concerns about the greater right or benefit in the manner in which it was presented in the original provisions. We note that the minister has indicated that this has been put over to the second phase, but have commented on it and will leave those just for the written submission. You may refer to them. The major concern is that we need to make sure that we understand the scope of those and how the evaluation in value will come about.

In conclusion, the chamber supports the two-stage approach to Employment Standards Act reform and in principle supports Bill 49 as that first stage. We submit that with refinement through this hearings process many of the concerns that have been raised about reforms can be addressed and we have attempted to provide some assistance in that regard. In light of the rapidly changing forms and needs of our current places of work, it is important to employees and employers alike that the legislative environment be adjusted to provide as much flexibility and responsiveness as possible.

We thank the committee for the opportunity to appear and for your consideration of our submission.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We have six minutes, which means we have two minutes per caucus. This round will start with the third party.

Mr Christopherson: Lee, Sharon, welcome. It's good to see you both again. I've looked through a couple of times and listened carefully and I didn't see a reference — if there is one, maybe you can point it out to me, but I didn't see where you addressed the issue of whether you believe workers are losing any minimum standards or rights that they now have in the existing Employment Standards Act. Can you comment on that or refer me to the part of your brief that does?

Mr Kirkby: We didn't make direct comment on it. I guess, in reviewing the proposals, we do not see substantive reduction in existing rights. The minimum standards that are provided in terms of basic entitlements are provided in the bill and we did not see major issues of reduction.

Ms Sharon White: There does appear to be some scope for balancing, but the basic minimum seems to —

Mr Christopherson: I'd like to pursue that a little because I see it somewhat differently. Right now there's no cap on the amount of money a worker can claim through the Ministry of Labour for money that's owed. This is money they've worked for, that they're entitled to, it's owed to them, and there's now a limit on how much they can claim through the Ministry of Labour.

There's also going to be, or at least there's a provision for, a regulation that cabinet can enact that would provide for a minimum threshold that you must cross before you can make a claim. That's new; right now that doesn't exist, and the time frame that you can claim for is being reduced from two years to six months. I would submit to you that's a loss of a right that a worker now has. Can I have your comments on that?

Ms White: Years ago, when the employment standards legislation was codified into the current employment standards code, the types of claims that were followed through the employment standards process tended to be of a fairly small monetary value. I know in recent years, given section 3 of the current Employment Standards Act, officers have an ability to enforce the larger employment standards contract, which tends to get, can get into much larger claims on an individual basis. That sort of enforcement of a private contract of employment through the employment standards legislation was probably never the intention in the legislation when it was first envisioned.

When I read the proposed Bill 49 amendments now they appear to require an individual to go to the courts with claims in excess of $10,000, but all statutory entitlements — the severance pay and termination pay, that sort of thing — are still enforceable through the employment standards branch of the Ministry of Labour. Sometimes those claims can add up to quite a bit more than $10,000.

It strikes me that the proposed amendments are a nice balance between the original aims of the legislation and the need not to be using bureaucracy to enforce contractual provisions that were never really intended, originally, to be enforced through this mechanism, anyways.

Mr Christopherson: I would argue that when we lifted the cap, because there used to be a cap of $4,000 and we made it unlimited, clearly we were wanting to ensure that all those situations were captured by the legislation.

You talk about a balance. We certainly see where employers are gaining a lot, because there hasn't been an employers' group yet that hasn't bumped into Bill 49 and fallen in love with it. There also hasn't been a workers' group, either a community group or a labour group, that hasn't come in and pointed out time after time, and we've already seen it this morning, that workers are losing minimum rights.

I fail to understand where the balance is and I would submit to you that clearly there's a tilt here and that workers are indeed losing rights and benefits they now have.

Ms White: I'd just suggest, in response to that, it's not so much a matter of losing rights as a change in the enforcement process, but we may differ on that.

Mr Christopherson: Oh, believe me, we do.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham East): Thank you very much for your presentation. I just want, in the opening comment, to commend you for the excellent overview of the changed context of employment and work. I think it's very envisioned and certainly looks at what is the reality out there.

The organizations you represent are indeed the future types of organizations. The large Stelco types, General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, are downsizing, as the government is. But certain things that have to be done are services that have to be provided are the new era. Many of those will be unrepresented in the traditional union representation mode. That's also a change for unions where they need to look at what types of services and advocacy actions they take.

I like your last line that says they're finding their hour of work and time frames and traditional models are changing — the seasonal work and the changing demand in the market and the economy. People still need security. I'm making my point here kind of obliquely but, "The decision to hire an employee has become one which is managed risk" — at that point employees and employer both have responsibilities. Wouldn't you agree?

Mr Kirkby: Certainly.

Mr O'Toole: I think, just drawing on a previous presentation earlier this morning, that productivity increases with harmony in the workplace, so why would a prudent employer create disharmony in the workplace or try to create some kind of agitation in his small hands-on entrepreneurial business of 25 or 50 employees. Don't you see that price and quality and harmony in the workplace are really how to get productivity in?

Mr Kirkby: Certainly. It's a major part of what many businesses are doing, both in their training plans and in working, the whole concept of team building etc. Legislation doesn't build teams.

Mr O'Toole: The current system with its bureaucracy and vertical structures — large organizations don't function well, that's proven; that's why they're crumbling. Whether they're union or non-union isn't really the issue. It's that the current structures aren't versatile enough to respond to changing markets. Those versatile structures be they unions, the Brotherhood or the corporation itself have to respond. Would you not agree?

Mr Kirkby: Certainly.

Mr O'Toole: This whole amendment, don't you see that it's absolutely critical that they examine not just these minor amendments but the broader context of the employment standards, given the traditions of work themselves are changing?

Mr Kirkby: That's why we have agreed and support the concept of the two-stage process, because we think that looking at the relationship of employment to what's going on in the economy becomes a critical part of being successful.

Mr O'Toole: That's the reality. That's a really fine statement. Your opening comments are right on; they're very germane, and you're right. This is the kind of input the minister is looking for: What is going to happen in the year 2000 and beyond. We're not looking at the status quo as serving anyone, so it's a tough one. Did you realize that technically less than 25% of actual orders are collected? The system is in gridlock.

Mr Kirkby: We were aware of that and it's one of the reasons why we thought it would be almost across-the-board acceptance; the concept of using some form of commercial collection process to get the moneys people are due seemed to be almost a given as being a better solution than what we have today.

Mr Duncan: Lee, just one question: Would it be your view that the vast majority of your members are good employers and follow the laws of the province both in the labour market and in terms of their taxes and everything?

Mr Kirkby: I would suggest that the vast number of employers across the province are probably typified by the description you've given. One of the difficulties is that we tend to write legislation for the 3% or 4% or 5% who create problems and everybody else then gets wrapped up in them. There are times when people, inadvertently or by not understanding the exact letter of the rules and regulations, may violate them even if they didn't intend to.

Mr Duncan: So what's the big deal? Most employers aren't affected by this statute in any event. The official opposition, by the way, agrees with the government's initiatives to try and streamline, do a better job on collection and make the act work better. We applaud them for being the first government to take a step in that direction, but why would we want to reduce minimum standards? It makes no sense because standards, when they're enforced, only apply to the bad actors anyway, and in my experience the vast majority of employers in this province are good employers. So why in streamlining the act, which I don't think any thinking person would disagree with, would we want to reduce minimum standards?

Mr Kirkby: I'm not sure there's an answer to your question. Our read of it is that minimum standards aren't being reduced. What we're talking about is how we enforce those standards. We can talk about the method of enforcement and whether there are more efficient enforcement methods — we happen to think there may be — that doesn't mean you've changed the standard that people are being asked to meet.

The Chair: Thank you both. Mr Kirkby, in your opening comments you mentioned celebrating 150 years of success. You must be doing something right, because one of my colleagues discovered that the Sheraton was completely sold out last night, so something was happening in downtown Hamilton here.

Mr Christopherson: There's always something happening in downtown Hamilton, Steve.

The Chair: Congratulations on having such a thriving economy, and thank you both for coming in here today.

While the next group, the Hamilton-Wentworth Coalition for Social Justice, comes and settles at the desk, I wonder if the subcommittee members could come up and we'll just discuss this for two minutes. Nobody leave their chairs. We are not taking a formal recess.

Mr Baird on a point of order?

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): I just have a quick motion to make, if I could, that in Belleville on September 13 we change our time from 9 to 5 to 10:30 to 6:30. We had all-party agreement on it.

The Chair: To accommodate the transportation.

Mr Baird: Because there's a bus leaving from Toronto and that will just make it easier.

The Chair: Seeing no further comment, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the changes proposed? Contrary? The motion carries.

With that bit of housekeeping, back to the task at hand.

HAMILTON-WENTWORTH COALITION FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE

The Chair: Good morning all. We have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit between presentation and question and answer. I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter.

Ms Andrea Horwath: My name is Andrea Horwath. I co-chair the Hamilton-Wentworth Coalition for Social Justice. With me are two other members of the coalition: Jim Mulvale, who is a PhD student in social welfare policy at McMaster University; and Dr Peter Archibald, who has many areas of specialty at McMaster. Two that are relevant to our presentation are that he specializes in industrial sociology and in labour relations.

We want to begin by thanking the committee for giving us an opportunity to make this presentation. I believe Jim will begin with a bit of an introduction and our general concerns, I'll move into more of the substantive kind of issues, and Peter will conclude.

Mr Jim Mulvale: As Andrea mentioned, I'll just give a bit of an introduction and some general observations. Our comments on Bill 49 primarily address the effects this legislation will have on non-unionized workers. Over half of Ontario workers are not represented by labour unions, and therefore their terms and conditions of work are essentially defined by the Employment Standards Act.

In terms of some of our general concerns and observations, this legislation has been introduced by the minister and it was touted as making parties more "self-reliant in resolving disputes." One of our primary concerns is that it is not a level playing field in labour relations to begin with, that there is an imbalance of power, skills, education and access to information and resources, with employers having the advantages in all those regards.

An observation to make along that line perhaps, or a bit of an irony, is that even as we look around this table at this legislative committee that's hearing about proposed changes to the legislation, I think the committee as such is overwhelmingly male and also white and high-income, as members of provincial Parliament. Of course, this legislation is meant to protect all workers, but it has a special importance for women workers, for workers from visible minorities and workers at the low end of the income scale.

We feel this legislation will reduce access to justice for these vulnerable workers, particularly workers in sectors where abuses are currently rampant, in such areas as garment and textile, food preparation and service, cleaning services, domestic work and homemakers. Of course, as has been mentioned in previous briefs, we've seen an increasing splitting in two of the labour market between a small number of people who are continuing to have high incomes and the declining middle class, and the increasing number of people who are falling into the secondary labour market at low wages, few benefits and without the benefit of representation of labour unions. These are the people who will be most adversely affected, this growing sector of the labour force.

Another concern we have is that this legislation will have a negative impact on people in small workplaces. In Hamilton in 1993-94, over half of the employment standards claims filed were against employers with fewer than 10 workers. We feel this legislation will make access to routes to justice even more difficult for workers in small work settings and small firms. So it is the most vulnerable workers who are going to be most adversely affected.

We feel also that this proposed legislation puts us on the downward spiral. There's this race to the bottom in terms of working conditions, wages and access to basic rights in the workplace. To reiterate the point made by other presenters, including the labour council, we don't want Ontario to be part of the race to the bottom. We don't want to follow the route of the so-called right-to-work states in the US and certainly not the kind of gross exploitation that occurs for workers in developing countries and so-called free trade zones.

With that, I'll turn it over to Andrea to talk about some more specific issues.

Ms Horwath: We wanted to start with a positive note — I guess it's too late for that — to mention that we do agree with the amendments that clear up issues of entitlement to vacation time as well as the clarification of accrual of service time during parental and pregnancy leaves. Unfortunately, that's where we start to differ, however, on the remaining amendments.

We were concerned particularly about enforcement, because, as you might guess, the social justice coalition is concerned about social and economic justice. We see the ability for workers to obtain justice in the workplace being eroded by this legislation, particularly the time frame for workers to be bringing a complaint being reduced from two years to six months after an alleged violation takes place. What that does basically is it reduces a worker's access to justice. Although we understand why statutory limitations exist, we believe they should provide the greatest opportunity for Ontarians to access justice. We would submit that a two-year period is neither excessive nor modest. It coincides well with the employer's obligation to preserve records and accords the worker a fair window of opportunity to obtain justice.

Similarly, we are concerned that the bill reduces the period for which the worker can recover money from two years to six months. Basically, we think the bill tells employers that they will be able to steal from workers for extended periods of time, knowing that even if the workers were to file a claim, employers would only be required to pay six months' worth of wages owing. This is a calculable risk which we think unscrupulous employers would no doubt feel great comfort in taking. Workers, on the other hand, will be forced to decide whether or not to take employers through the civil courts or through the employment standards system to get some kind of justice.

We're concerned that the discretion of the director of the employment standards branch to obtain up to one year in cases where there are recurring violations does little to deter the employer and again provides some workers greater justice to access earnings. This is not a scenario that provides equal access to justice for workers.

In stark contrast to the tightening up of time period for workers whose rights are being violated, the Ministry of Labour, under this bill, would be given an additional two years to initiate prosecutions against employers who don't pay. This is on top of the initial period where the ministry is going through the initial recovery procedure. This additional two years will in no way streamline expedite enforcement, a stated goal of the amendments.

The next issue is maximum and minimum claims. Again, capping any claims to moneys that are owed to workers by an unscrupulous and unlawful employer is unconscionable. If an employer is intent on ignoring the laws of Ontario, that employer should be responsible for every dime that was stolen from the exploited worker. This section of the bill puts a cap on access to justice for workers.

A similar case will occur if through regulations the minister sets minimum claim amounts. Employers will have basically an incentive, in our opinion, to "nickel and dime" workers out of millions of dollars.

Procedures for violations: We're discussing a little bit in this section the issue of whether or not to file a claim or whether to proceed in the civil court system to seek redress. Of course, the decision that the worker makes initially is a binding decision, but they're only given two weeks to find a lawyer and obtain legal advice. We find that two weeks is a rather meagre time period for making a binding decision that's going to affect their ability to access justice. We think it's prejudicial against workers who have claims for wages owing for longer than six months or greater than $10,000, as they will undoubtedly have to wait longer to get their settlement through the courts and will be forced to incur considerable expenses to obtain legal representation. The only other option, of course, is to forgo any amount which falls outside of these parameters, again denying them full recovery of moneys owed and again not accessing full justice.

Privatization of collections: We don't agree with the government that the contracting out of collections to private collection agencies will improve the current dismal record of collection of wages owed to employees by employers. In fact, in our conclusions we'll provide some suggestions on how to address this. What we fear is that the major effect of this change will be that workers will be pressured by collection agencies to settle for less than the value of their claim, again leading to denial of justice for the worker. The government itself recognizes that this is likely to take place, which is precisely why the legislation allows for the nullifying of settlements that are the result of coercion or fraud. The remedies suggested are all but non-existent, however, as there is no requirement for review of settlements of at least 75%. The bill in effect entrenches the recovery rate for employees at a basic level of 75% of moneys owed. Again, workers are denied full restitution, denied justice.

Dr Peter Archibald: In conclusion, we would like to restate our concern that the amendments to the ESA contained in Bill 49 will encourage employers to violate the law while curtailing workers' access to and realization of justice. We believe that workers will be forced to choose between their jobs and their rights and that their basic rights will erode.

I'd like to deviate from the script here to give an example from Hamilton, a home-spun one. For years, Stelco has forced workers in Hilton Works to work excessive overtime, even illegal amounts of overtime. The United Steelworkers has twice tried to get the Ontario government to enforce those standards of overtime and twice has failed to get them enforced.

By the way, I find it kind of distracting that I'm competing with the chairman while I'm trying to speak here.

The Chair: Forgive me. The chairman doesn't vote, so the chairman has other duties he has to take care of. But thank you for the lecture.

Dr Archibald: Well, he should do them elsewhere. But at any rate, when students in my classes at Mac do this, I kick them out. Unfortunately, I guess I don't have the prerogative here, but —

Interjection: Why not?

Dr Archibald: Why not? Good question.

What happened in Local 1005 was that many workers were encouraged to work excessive overtime. They made incredible amounts of money, sometimes $60,000 or $70,000 a year, while a huge proportion of 1005 were unemployed; they were laid off and couldn't get work. It was in the interests of the employer to keep this situation, because of course they didn't have to hire on more of those laid-off workers and pay them benefits. They could simply work these workers 70, 80, sometimes 90 hours a week overtime. Again, Local 1005 was not able to stop this.

Now, if Local 1005 can't have the act enforced, what's going to happen with a weakened act? What are non-unionized workers going to be able to do if unionized workers can't enforce that? By the way, the ramifications in terms of weakening the union were incredible. Stewards who were opposed to overtime were voted out of office and Local 1005 is a lot weaker as a union in part because those original standards weren't enforced.

We would like to see the current act maintained and strengthened. We would like to see it enforced. This government instead has cut back on inspections, which is going to weaken that. We've heard a lot of talk here about making the system more efficient, saving money. I would question whether this government is serious about saving money. There was a study summarized in the Globe and Mail about six weeks ago by an independent research organization which indicated that government bill collectors, including getting money from employers, were three times as effective and three times as efficient as private bill collectors. This study was published around the same time this government announced that it was moving to private collections. Is it serious?

I live in Dundas. A halfway house for young offenders was closed down there, and two thirds of those were sent back to jail at six times the cost to taxpayers that they were paying in that halfway house. Is this government serious about saving money, or does this government want to reward its friends in business? I ask the audience, you make your own decision.

The Chair: Thank you. Well, that only leaves us 45 seconds, so if anyone has any closing statement or a very, very quick question — 15 seconds each.

Mrs Fisher: Very short. I would concur with you, being the only woman on this panel. There's only one solution: Elect more of us and we'll have the representation we need.

Mr Hoy: We don't have much time at all here, but I do want to make the remark that you talked about the balance that's on the committee, who the members are etc. I have family members who have worked and are working for minimum wage. I am a farmer, previous to coming to Queen's Park, and we made less than minimum wage in certain years. So we try very hard to understand what the people are discussing when they come forward and I appreciate your input today.

Mr Christopherson: I would just like to thank Andrea, Jim and Peter for their continuing leadership on issues of social justice, not just for what they're doing here today. For the benefit of committee members, this coalition has worked hard and is consistently there for the most vulnerable people in our community of Hamilton-Wentworth and they deserve an awful lot of credit for the leadership they show on behalf of those people. So thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you for coming to make a presentation here before us today.

BURLINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: That leads us to our next group, the Burlington Chamber of Commerce. Good morning. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, and if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourself for the Hansard reporter.

Mr Stan Lang: I'm Stan Lang. I'm the current president of the Burlington Chamber of Commerce. To my right is Mr Scott McCammon, our executive director.

I appreciate this opportunity to speak to the standing committee regarding the proposed improvements to the Employment Standards Act, or Bill 49. As president of the Burlington Chamber of Commerce, I represent approximately 900 companies that are members of our organization. These companies, representing large and small business in a variety of sectors of the economy, employ over 33,000 people, or 60% of the total labour force in our city.

The Burlington Chamber of Commerce joins with chambers and boards of trade across the province in welcoming the proposed improvements to the Employment Standards Act. We congratulate the provincial government for yet again trying to lessen the bureaucracies of government and the burdens on business.

The need for reform is clear. Ontario has an Employment Standards Act which is antiquated, bureaucratic and not reflective of the workplaces of 1996. This is confirmed by the fact that the current act did not foresee the advent of computers and can be interpreted to only allow access to written records, not ones stored on a computer. It is time for the Employment Standards Act to find the 1990s.

As we understand it, the general intention of the proposed amendments is to increase the efficiency of the Ministry of Labour in administering the Employment

Standards Act, to reduce the role of government by allowing increased self-reliance and flexibility, and to simplify the language found within the act itself. These seem like admirable intentions. In fact, with chambers of commerce having preached the need for governments to get out of the way of free enterprise, it is hard to show anything but support for Bill 49.

The Burlington Chamber of Commerce also applauds the government for its two-stage approach to the reform of the Employment Standards Act. Since the issue of standards in the workplace can be a tremendously sensitive one, it is appropriate to deal with reforms in smaller, easily understood parcels. We understand that the provisions for greater rights or benefits will be moved to phase 2 of Employment Standards Act reform. We fully support this move.

Of course, change creates uncertainty, confusion and differing opinions. There may be people who shun Bill 49, viewing it as an attempt by the government to reduce or eliminate standards in the workplace. These concerns, though, would not be justifiable. In fact, enhancements such as section 12, the ability to accrue rights during pregnancy or parental leave, are simply formal acknowledgements of current rights and practices.

The Burlington Chamber of Commerce strongly supports the sections of the bill that eliminate duplication. It has been an unnecessary burden to have wrongful dismissal action disputes dealt with by the courts as well as by the employment standards branch. Employers spend time and money having to defend the same dispute in different venues. Of course, this burden is also felt by the public, whose taxes must support the duplicated efforts.

It has also been difficult for employers to present a fair and accurate defence when many disputes are not filed for years. Older disputes usually lead to longer, more difficult and therefore more costly ministry investigations. We strongly support the provision of Bill 49 which limits the entitlement to recover money under the act to six months rather than the current two years. This places the responsibility for timely filing where it belongs — with the employee.

The Burlington Chamber of Commerce is also very supportive of the proposed change to increase the time limit to appeal employment standards officer orders from 15 days to 45 days. The increased appeal period provides a more reasonable time in which to (1) allow the parties to negotiate a settlement in lieu of an appeal; (2) more fully consider the merits of filing an appeal; and (3) make the necessary payment of the amount of the order and administration cost to the director in order to apply for the appeal. In many cases, the current 15-day period in which to make the payment causes a hardship for employers.

There are some provisions of Bill 49 that we feel need clarification. Our concerns are mainly focused on the difference in authorities granted employment standards officers versus arbitrators.

Employment standards officers have the power to investigate complaints, require production of documents for inspection, and make inquiries relevant to the investigation. Is it intended to give arbitrators these same powers? We do not feel this is necessary. Since collective agreements have procedures for grievance resolution and arbitration, it seems redundant to then also have an investigation. The grievance procedure replaces the ministry investigation.

Under the act, the orders of an employment standards officer can be appealed. It is unclear whether this also applies to the orders of an arbitrator. If an arbitrator has the authority to make the same orders as an employment standards officer, then it seems only reasonable to allow a parallel system for appeals.

It is also unclear from the proposed amendment whether an arbitrator can award damages beyond the six-month recovery limits. We believe that all employees should be treated equally, and the remedial action of arbitrators should also be restricted.

There is also clarification needed in the area of timeliness. Collective agreements have negotiated time lines for the filing and processing of grievances. These time lines can often be different from those in the act. Which is to prevail? We believe, in order to give the greatest consistency and to avoid problems with grievances that allege violations of both the act and the collective agreement, that the time lines of the collective agreement should prevail.

The bottom line, as we see it, is that Bill 49 embraces the current level of employment standards while ensuring the process and legislation are clear, simple and effective for all parties concerned. The bill also acknowledges current workplace realities, such as pregnancy and parental leave and, of course, computers.

The Employment Standards Act reforms create a balance of change for both employers and employees. We are pleased to be able to offer our chamber's support. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us with about nine minutes, so three minutes per caucus, and this time we will be starting with the Liberals.

Mr Duncan: Thank you for your presentation. I want to come back to this notion that minimum standards don't need to be reduced to improve the efficiency of the statute and the efficiency of the way the statute is enforced. I don't think the official opposition would disagree that we need to look at non-traditional ways, for instance, possibly even the privatization of debt collection.

But where I'm having some difficulty with the presentations I've heard from the business community is, given the very small number of employers who have orders issued against them, why is it necessary to reduce those minimums? If the agenda isn't really rather one of reducing overall a macroconcept of wages, what's the concern? Frankly, as someone who was an employer and someone who dealt with the Ministry of Labour, I would submit that the Employment Standards Act, on a daily basis, was probably the least intrusive of statutes. It only applied where you had a rogue employer.

Mr Lang: I think some of that is obviously a matter of interpretation. We don't see a lowering of the minimum standards. We see flexibility being given under the act to deal with different issues as long as the present minimum standards are met. I'm certainly not going to argue with you. It's just that my interpretation is that the minimum standards aren't being eroded.

Mr Duncan: But the present minimum standards, in most cases, are being changed. There's a couple that we support, as you have as well. But, for instance, the maximum of $10,000 on six months is about 400 bucks. We are really reducing, in my view, the standard.

Now the minister has withdrawn section 3 of the bill, which dealt with this notion of negotiating collective agreements that may trade off some sort of comprehensive set of standards in exchange for reduction of one standard or another. But again, don't you think that we could achieve the kinds of efficiencies that you have talked and I think others have talked about without lessening standards for employees and workers who are in vulnerable situations?

Mr Lang: A couple of issues: Number one, a number of employees deal in different legislations, not only in Ontario but in other provincial areas. Some of those have a six-month provision so it's, for lack of a better word, trying to balance some of the provisions that one employer has to deal with across different jurisdictions.

While certainly there's been a lessening of the opportunity within the act to deal with the $10,000 issue, that has not taken away from those employees the right to go to litigation. In the past, they had both opportunities. That opportunity is still there. You're right, it's taking some of it from the act, but it's certainly not removing the opportunity for any employee or any employer who believes they've gone outside the law to seek restitution through the courts.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. On page 2, the fourth paragraph, you state: "We strongly support the provision of Bill 49 which limits the entitlement to recover money under the act to six months rather than the current two years. This places the responsibility for timely filing where it belongs — with the employee."

We've heard evidence, yesterday in particular, in Toronto, that there are situations where workers are faced with an employer that is in the bad boss category, one of the unscrupulous types that unfortunately cause us to need legislation like this in society, and I know you wouldn't support those kinds of activities in any workplace any more than I would. However, they do exist, and many of these people are the most vulnerable in our society. A lot of them are new Canadians, visible minorities, and they don't have any real options in terms of where they can go. Sometimes it takes them a long time to find another job so they can live a place that is, quite frankly, horrible, all but a sweatshop. In other cases, they just can't afford to quit that job because they need the money, as bad as it is, and the evidence is there that the only time they file for what they're owed is after they've already left, if they've quit or been fired.

If that's the reality, then it does fly in the face somewhat of the submission that you're making in that statement, and I wonder how you would reconcile those two when we talk about the reality that workers are facing as opposed to just the intellectual approach to it.

Mr Lang: I think there's a fine line there. I certainly don't disagree with you. With unscrupulous employers or unscrupulous employees, in either case, where there's an abuse being made to the employer or by the employer, I agree 100% those have to be dealt with. They have to be dealt with and eliminated. Whether this piece of legislation will assist that — we're again I believe dealing with the minority. However, certainly there has to be a vehicle for those people to get dealt with.

Six months, two years, I think is, again, a matter of interpretation. In your case, isolated or otherwise, it's going to be a small percentage, and some people may fall through the cracks. At the same time, I believe the two-year time frame we were dealing with before in costs also led to abuses on the other side where records, due to no fault of anyone, were rather incomplete, caused a lot of taxpayers expense, caused a lot of heartache for both the person bringing forward the claim and the employer involved.

Mr Christopherson: But if at the end of the day that worker is entitled to that, my problem with it is —

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, you've gone over the time already. Mr Tascona.

Mr Tascona: Thank you for your presentation. The basis of Bill 49 is to deal with administrative and procedural changes. In effect, there are no changes in the minimal standards; in fact, there are improvements for vacation and pregnancy leave. But one area of administration that I just want your comment on in terms of efficiencies is, would you agree with electronic filing for orders to pay and also the appeals by employers?

Mr Lang: I don't see any reason why we shouldn't follow through with the progress, to use that word in quotations, I'm afraid, but the electronic filing, eliminating of paper, that's throughout industry. I would be surprised if any company is not into the computer age. The filing of electronic is no different from paper. It just saves time, in many cases; saves costs. Electronic filing just makes good sense to me.

Mr Tascona: The other part of the act we're dealing with, and I think one of the major focuses, is that collection is a problem; 44% of employees received the money owed and in fact what's actually collected is 25% of the dollars. So the focus is on collection, and what we're looking at are measures to improve the collection so that employees get the money they are owed.

One of the problems is insolvency with respect to the employers, and for 67%, that's the reason they don't pay, because of the fact they're insolvent. We've heard some measures with respect to, "What could you do to assist us in collection?" We heard yesterday from certain groups who said, "Why don't you just put on payroll taxes to make everyone pay for these bad employers?"

One other suggestion is maybe the federal government could do something about bankruptcy to ensure that we have measures to protect employees, rather than the provincial government funding the bill for the federal government's not acting. Do you have any comments on that or do you have any ideas on what other measures we could take to improve the collection process to help workers?

Mr Lang: Certainly in our view, again, the six-month time frame, that's the entry level which leads to the collection, but I think timely filing — companies that are unscrupulous and that are abusing their employees need to be dealt with. I would guess, and this is certainly a personal view, those companies going bankrupt may be going bankrupt because of the abuses they've got to, to the point if they were treating their employees badly, they were probably also treating their suppliers etc, leading to financial problems for them.

But if the filing process is speeded up, I would hope that would lead to quicker resolution of the claims and therefore a quicker collection period to be starting. Under the old scenario, it was many years into the process. Not only did that give the company a longer time to become insolvent, but it allowed them to continue to deal with those employees in a bad manner, and more and more people would be — again, this is the example with the unscrupulous employer — treated badly. It needs to be dealt with quicker. I believe, in my own experience from a collection point of view, the sooner you act, 99 out of 100 times, the more you will get and you will be able to deal with the issues. The longer you wait in any collection procedure, the less money you recover. I don't think that any collection agency or office or whatever will dispute that. You have to deal quickly, you have to deal decisively, and I think shortening up the time frame will lead to better results in the end. Whether private sector is going to be better —

The Chair: We've run over our time. Thank you, Mr Tascona. Thank you both, gentlemen, for coming and making your presentation before us here today. We appreciate it.

ONTARIO NETWORK OF INJURED WORKERS' GROUPS

The Chair: That leads us to our next group, the Ontario Network of Injured Workers' Groups. Good morning. Again, at the risk of repeating myself —

Mr Karl Crevar: Good morning. My name is Karl Crevar.

The Chair: Yes, Mr Crevar, and we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit here this morning.

Mr Crevar: I will most certainly try and leave some time. I'm the president of the Ontario Network of Injured Workers, which represents organizations in 34 communities across the province of Ontario. I do not have a brief with me. I was up until 3 o'clock in the morning trying to figure out how to make a presentation to this committee to outline our concerns at the proposed changes.

First of all, let me just say I'm very disturbed, and all the citizens in this province, in a democratic country, should be very concerned, when we're sitting here faced with a bill that's being introduced that had no consultation with the people who would be directly affected with it prior to its inception and sitting here and trying to wrap up in 15 minutes. That, to me, is wrong. The consultation should have taken place with workers in Ontario, because this bill is strictly an attack on workers' rights in this province, and as we've seen in the past, it's just a continuation of previous actions by the government of the day.

The Premier of the province, Mr Harris, has made it very clear, and I'm sure you heard news reports of Mr Harris overseas, stating that Ontario is open for business. It's open for business at any cost, the way I see it when we take a look at this bill.

Bill 49 again demonstrates the Conservative government's agenda, which is in the interests of profits for corporate Ontario before the workers who gave their lives, their sweat and blood to make Ontario a better place to live. Bill 49, this bill, will do exactly the reverse. It will take us back 30 to 40 years to where we were many, many years ago.

As we have previously seen, the cuts in health care, education, social assistance and the future proposed cuts changes in workers' compensation, health and safety and cuts that will be paid for by Ontario citizens through tax increases, user fees etc, and this is at the expense of the most vulnerable people which is our future generation our children, injured workers, workers and disabled and elderly, and Mr Christopherson has mentioned the minority groups that will be affected, the minority workers who will be affected and their rights.

The purpose and intent of the Employment Standard Act was to protect workers by improving workplace standards, not by diminishing them.

Bill 49 limits and will deny access to fairness and justice. Many workers will not be able to afford the high costs of litigation and will be forced to settle for far less than they would otherwise be entitled to under the current act. They will be forced further into poverty. They will be forced to apply for UIC, social assistance or other income replacements. They'll have to turn to food banks to shelters if they lose their homes or families, which in many cases we have seen happen. This is reality. This has happened in other areas. The costs will be borne by the taxpayers of Ontario.

I know we talk a little bit about some of the provisions in the bill when we talk about putting the responsibility on organized labour to negotiate contracts. Well, ladies and gentlemen, the reality is that in employment relations in this province particularly, there's a wall that's built up between both parties. When we see items to be putting on the negotiating table, is the employer going to deny the right to negotiate? That's ludicrous, to put a statute or the bargaining table. What we will see is more problems and they will be more costly than anything else.

I want to say that people elect governments to protect, to protect all of us, not just a few, because we all have a stake in our future here. We all have to protect the rights of all citizens, whether they be employers, whether they be workers, whether they be the elderly, the disabled, the injured. But we do not see this in this bill.

This bill will not protect workers; it will only give justification to further exploit them. Some comments were already made. Workers will be harassed in the workplace. They'll be forced to quit. This attack on workers and citizens in Ontario cannot and must not be tolerated.

I want to just say in closing, as I indicated when I started, I did not prepare a brief. I tried to put together some notes. I don't want to be angry, but I am. Premier Mike Harris and his government, through their neglect of the most vulnerable in our society, stated prior to the election that he would not hurt the most vulnerable; well, he did. Your government has broken that promise. I call on the Premier to resign. That's the most decent thing that he can do: resign, as he stated he would.

The questions I have on enforcement have been talked about before, the enforcement provisions. We know — we did some research into compliance issues — that the insolvent corporations are not being followed up on to collect the moneys that are owing. What will Bill 49 change? It will not change a damn thing. You will continue to lose money. The cost will be put on the workers of Ontario and the citizens of this province.

The shortening of the appeal time: What will happen? Questions have to be asked. Many workers will abandon; they'll just simply say, "I don't want to go through this." Many workers will not even know. I ask the question of the government, how will they know what their rights are, when we all know, around this table, that the majority of workers in this province are unorganized? How will they know what their rights are? They most certainly will not. That is a question that has to be answered that Bill 49 does not answer.

I think, Mr Chair, I will leave that. Again, I want to thank you for giving me the opportunity to address and express my views.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us two minutes per caucus. This round will start with the third party, Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Karl, for another excellent presentation. I think it's important to underscore the note that you struck when you talked about the fact that this is not just about unions, this is not just about those who already have; this is about an ongoing attack on the most vulnerable, on the disabled and, in your instance, in your area of expertise and who you represent, injured workers. I wonder, in the context of this being one more piece, if for the record, for Hansard, you could paint the picture you see that Bill 49 forms a part of in terms of the attack on injured workers and disabled citizens in the province of Ontario, which, as you have pointed out, is a direct violation of their promise.

Mr Crevar: We've had discussions with the government on injured workers' issues, on workers' compensation. We know that there's a high rate of injured workers who have not returned to work. We know that they've been harassed in the workplace and we know that Bill 49 will continue to do that. It's just another step. Injured workers who have returned to work will give an employer the opportunity to say, "We no longer have work for you." They will use whatever means, and that is a reality, ladies and gentlemen. That's not just hearsay. They will just say, "I'm sorry, we have no work for you; therefore you're out of work." What avenues do they have available? We see Bill 49 as just another step towards that.

Mr Christopherson: In your opinion, some of the changes that are proposed by the government in WCB — and we know that some of those changes are going to force people to stay at work longer than they need to, because they don't have the protection of the WCB. Does Bill 49, in your opinion, further erode the rights that workers have and feed into that whole idea that workers who are injured will actually have to stay on the job for fear that they don't have the protection in WCB, and now they may not have the further protection in the workers' bill of rights, which is the Employment Standards Act?

Mr Crevar: You're absolutely correct. We foresee that. We saw it before and we can see that as a continuation to continue on.

Mr Baird: Thank you very much for your presentation; we appreciate it. You mentioned in your remarks that you were concerned about the appeals process being shortened. Is that correct?

Mr Crevar: Yes.

Mr Baird: This bill lengthens it from 15 days to 45 days.

Mr Crevar: What I was referring to is the time to launch an appeal or to launch for a claim. If I misrepresented in terms of words, that is what I meant.

Mr Baird: I think it's the latter. The appeals process is extended —

Mr Crevar: Because it went from two years to six months.

Mr Baird: Yes, you're right on the former part. I just wanted to clarify that.

Mrs Fisher: I have just a short question. I appreciate some of your comments. Obviously, some of them I won't agree with. But I do have a question for you. One of the nice things about these hearings is that we get to hear some of the solutions from the points of other people, of which you are one. Could you please tell us how better to handle the collection on outstanding dues owed to employees who have not been able to collect same under the past government ways in which they did it? When government was involved in it, all governments — this is a non-partisan statement — have been unsuccessful in earning back the rights to the workers' money. Could you please give us an idea how you would do it?

Mr Crevar: You've brought up an interesting point. What I do not see in Bill 49, again, is the enforcement issue, and that's a reality issue — the reality issue of how employees can get what they're due, how they can actually get what they are owed as a result of any action by their employers. What you have to do is strengthen that enforcement.

You have to get away from this idea that simply because — and it's well known; the research is there. Many employers who become insolvent through either bankruptcies or the statements that have been made — "If you force us to pay any money that's owed, we will close," and they use that as blackmail. That's blackmail, and governments have shied away. The Conservative government, I'm afraid — I shouldn't say I'm afraid; what I see — will even step up that procedure and forgive those employers, and this puts the workers at risk. This is what I see in Bill 49.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation this morning. You would know that the caps are limited to $10,000, and that on average that's about $400 a week. People have the recourse to go to the courts for retribution under part of the act. What's your feeling on the ability of workers to use the courts as the avenue for their claim?

Mr Crevar: Again, my comments before were that many workers will abandon because they simply cannot afford civil litigations. The cap that's being proposed, the limit of $10,000, I believe is unfair. If it takes two years to file a claim for a person earning $30,000 to $40,000 a year who is unjustly let go and all they're going to get at the end of that day is $10,000, I ask anyone around this table whether that's fair. It will be a costly venture and many people will just not go into it.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Crevar, for coming and making a presentation before us here today.

HAMILTON STEELWORKERS AREA COUNCIL

The Chair: That leads us now to the Hamilton Steelworkers Area Council, Mr Adamczyk. Good morning.

Mr Bryan Adamczyk: Good morning. I'm a staff representative with the United Steelworkers of America working out of the Hamilton office. I'm not going to read the brief verbatim. I will refer to it and maybe read a couple of comments I've written down in the brief. At your leisure, if you get a chance, if you care to read it, we've addressed the issues of contracting out of employment standards, enforcement under a collective agreement, enforcement for non-unionized employees, private collection agencies and decreasing employer liability.

I will say there are a few things that are minor positive changes. One is that we can support the amendment dealing with the entitlement to vacation pay whereby vacation entitlement of two weeks per year accrues whether or not the employment was active. We can also support the amendment that provides for the calculation of service and length of employment to include time while on parental and pregnancy leave, and the issuance of termination pay seven days after the person has been terminated.

Those are probably the only minor changes that we would see as — I think the term that has been used by the government is "housekeeping." The rest of the amendments that are being proposed under Bill 49 are just a gutting of the Employment Standards Act, in our view, really a brutal attack on working men and women.

Let me explain a bit to you who we are. The Steelworkers area council represents approximately 14,000 men and women in the Hamilton area. We represent people who work, for example, at Stelco's Hilton works, Lake Erie works and small units. We're the bargaining agent for the people who work at the occupational health clinics for Ontario workers, which are under attack right now. We're in fear and jeopardy of losing them.

I understand that this process is the first phase of a two-phase process of reform. I looked up the term "reform" in the Funk and Wagnalls dictionary. Normally, reform means a change for the better; normally, it means a moral improvement and a move to improve social conditions. The Bill 49 amendments are not doing that. They're regressive, not progressive. They would like to take us back maybe past the 50-year mark. The last introduction to changes in labour legislation took the labour movement back to the 1930s and this would take us back even further.

I'd just like to comment on two areas of our brief. One is the contracting out of employment standards. Let me start off with that. Our concern is that the bill would eliminate the basic standards with respect to minimum standards covering hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays and vacation pay. The bill erases the standard for people who work in organized workplaces. It's just a matter of time; perhaps in your phase 2 you'll want to have these amendments applied to people who do not have the benefit of being represented by a union.

The contracting out of the employment standards has an impact in two areas. It has an impact on the worker's quality of life, family obligations and health and safety. Let me give you an example, if I can. Let's suppose under the Employment Standards Act you increase the hours of work a worker could be scheduled to work up to 56 hours. I understand some months ago General Motors wanted the government to address that issue and increase the hours of work whereby a person could be scheduled seven days, forced to work that. That has an impact on a person's quality of life as far as dealing with their family, health and safety issues, and other implications are concerned.

Let me give you an example of a health and safety issue: We have a foundry here in Hamilton, Dominion Castings. They have about 700 workers there and it's a tough job to do, a real tough job to do. Foundries, by their nature, are just ugly. This time of the year we get a lot of phone calls down at the hall because the heat is bad and people get real miserable. In wintertime it's cold, brutal. A good group of men, and we've got some women; some women operate the cranes there at the foundries.

They are scheduled to work 48 hours a week. At times people don't mind making some extra money, but normally they are scheduled to work Monday to Saturday. Because of the way families are, we have people who have split up from their spouses. It's not unusual — I had a couple of cases when I serviced that local union where a fellow would phone me up and say:

"I just got disciplined by the company for not showing up Saturday. I was scheduled to work."

"Why didn't you go in?"

"Here's the problem: For the last six months I've been working six days a week. I've got two kids, and in the past I might get them maybe once a month, on the weekends. Normally, I have to get somebody to babysit them. But damn it, I've been working too hard and I want to be with my kids. I decided, when my wife dropped the kids off, I couldn't make any other arrangements. I made a judgement call, to spend time with my kids whom I don't see that often because my wife has custody, or to go in to work."

He made the right call to stay with his family, but from his employer's point of view he was supposed to show up for work. It has an impact on the quality of life for our members. Also, when somebody starts making those kinds of judgement calls, it could put them in jeopardy with their employer.

Health and safety is an issue too. Some jobs you could probably do dancing on your head in some workplaces. Other jobs — you're talking about foundries, people working in the retail and wholesale sectors, people who work in steel mills and other workplaces — it's tough to get through just an eight-hour day.

The other issue is that if an employer right now was to bring to the bargaining table changes to negotiate less than what the act provides for, I could hit him with bad-faith bargaining, because we have what I understand is termed the "floor." But rather than having employers and unions work in a labour relations climate that is one of cooperation, partnership, with this legislation we're going to be on a collision course. Working people have fought long and hard for the gains. In the past in the steel industry we've had to give up some concessions at the bargaining table, but to negotiate anything less than what is there by law is going to put us on a collision course and we're going to end up in an adversarial situation in many cases. I can't see that. Talk about a message you send out to anybody who's thinking about investing in the province of Ontario. I don't think anybody wants to invest in this province if there's the potential for a lot of labour turmoil.

Enforcement under the act: What you're proposing, I understand, is that if you're in a union you can't go to the employment standards branch and lay a complaint; you're going to have to use the agreement and arbitration procedure. We have a couple of problems with that. First of all, unions are going to be drawn out in long, lengthy litigation. The other problem with that is if a disgruntled member isn't happy with maybe the outcome of our investigation, whether or not he has a complaint, he'll file a complaint with the Ontario Labour Relations Board saying that we misrepresented him.

I can't see the logic in where you're going with this, because if I end up at the labour relations board with a misrepresentation complaint, so does the employer, because the employer will be involved in addressing a concern about a violation of the Employment Standards Act; they would have violated it. If the disgruntled employee, our member, didn't like what he heard, he'd go after us, and also the company would be dragged into it. A lot of money; it's costly for companies to hire their lawyers, to book their plant manager, human resources personnel, their assistants, general foreman — everybody — to go down to the labour board. That's not very cost-effective. The current system is, in our view, expeditious and inexpensive. It provides for an officer to come out and investigate the matter before it goes any further and probably most times it's nipped in the bud.

Non-unionized employees will have two routes to go. One is to pursue the employment standards route and the other one is to go to civil litigation. As the previous speaker addressed that concern, some people just won't have the financial resources to go out and hire a lawyer to represent them to go after their money.

The only other thing that puzzled me a bit has got to do with these hearings but not with the act. I got a call in my office last week from somebody from the Ministry of Labour who wanted to know what the Hamilton Steelworkers were all about and what our, as I think her term was, mandate was and what we do, our guidelines. I found that puzzling because I would think that anybody in the Ministry of Labour and anybody who would be on this panel would do some research and find out about the labour movement. With the Bill 7 amendments and these amendments you're proposing, I don't think you've done a good job finding out what the labour movement is all about and what working people are all about and their concerns and their issues.

Those are my comments. I'll try to answer any questions you may have.

Mr Tascona: Thank you for your presentation. I just want to deal with one aspect of it, though, the enforcement under a collective agreement. As you're aware, under the act currently, under section 58 for severance pay, unions have the power and have been given the rights to settle severance pay claims with an employer. Bill 49 essentially is extending the union's role to resolve all claims under the Employment Standards Act. What is the problem with giving the unions greater rights to represent their workers with respect to these types of claims when the history is that there are very few claims which involve unions and the employment standards branch?

Mr Adamczyk: Let me put it this way: In some cases we put in language that talks about severance pay in the event the plant closes down and how much severance pay people would get. Normally, it's better than what the law provides for.

Mr Tascona: I know, but you've been given that right already to deal with severance pay claims under a collective agreement. That's a precedent that's already set. We're extending that right for you to get involved and deal with your members' claims. The average claim time is seven months to turn around under the Employment Standards Act, I understand. You have a grievance procedure. You have expedited arbitration under the Labour Relations Act. Arguably, you've got a faster procedure to resolve the claims if the union decides to take that claim and represent its members.

Mr Adamczyk: Normally, when we're talking about severance issues in a lot of cases we're talking about a plant shutdown or a partial cessation of operations. Yes, we do have expedited arbitration; that's true. One of the difficulties with that is that we used to have the use of settlement officers but you're going to be laying off all the settlement officers. They'll be out of a job November 1. That was a good way to try to mediate any type of an issue. Again, we have a system. The Employment Standards Act has been there for some time. In our view it's a system that works, it's inexpensive and it's quick. If it ain't broke, why do you have to go out and fix it?

Mr Duncan: I'd just like to pursue that for a moment. One of the things that strikes me about the debate is the notion that the system works; I don't think it works at all.

Mr Adamczyk: But the —

Mr Duncan: If I can finish by putting a question, I had a chance to read your presentation about the privatization and use of collection agencies, and one of the things that strikes me about the failure of our current system is our inability to collect wages owing. Yet in what I read here you seem to be saying that things are fine the way they are. I would be curious to know what proposals you might be able to offer that would make the collection of wages owing, increase the percentage, rather than simply defend I think a process which demonstrably isn't working and I think demonstrably was lowered when the collection agents of the Ministry of Labour were let go in previous years. Do you have any suggestions along that line? I don't think the present system works.

Mr Adamczyk: What I think you have to do is go out and enforce it. If somebody owes you money, if the Ministry of Labour is acting on behalf of a claimant — is that what you're asking?

Mr Duncan: No, I'm asking you how would you enforce it. We all agree we have to enforce it. I guess the real question is how. What methods are available? It disturbs me when I hear progressive forces in our society such as the Steelworkers suggesting that the status quo is adequate. I don't think it is and I'd be curious to know what suggestions you would have, because I don't think necessarily the government has the right ideas. I'm really curious as to what kinds of proposals you have.

Mr Adamczyk: Why isn't the money being collected? Because employers just don't want to give it. Right? Why do you stop there? That's what I would ask the government. Why do you stop there?

The Chair: Sorry, Mr Duncan, we're running over time. Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: Thanks very much, Bryan. It was an excellent presentation as always. I just want to talk a bit about the issue of, as you've called it here, the contracting out of employment standards. You speak in the brief of the fact that your union, the Steelworkers, which is certainly one of the strongest, most-established unions in the country, is not prepared to relinquish rights that were obtained through, in most cases, long, hard fights. I suspect that even you could see with some of your larger locals that you'd have a struggle, depending on the situation the company found itself in, to fend off those attacks on the basic rights.

Mr Adamczyk: That's right.

Mr Christopherson: Recognizing that, what chance do you think smaller locals or isolated local unions would have, faced with an employer who's not merely putting concessions on the table as they relate to improvements that have been negotiated into a collective agreement, but now the fundamental bill of rights that workers have had for decades? What do you think their chances are of holding off against an employer that comes after them that way?

Mr Adamczyk: Slim to none. It would destroy them. It would out-and-out destroy them.

Mr Christopherson: Would you agree that that's the slippery slope taking us back to the point where there are no minimum standards, that if you do that often enough and if you had checkered rights in some places and not have the rights in other spots on the checkerboard, eventually the rights don't mean anything and it's a free-for-all?

Mr Adamczyk: Exactly. I deal with employers some of whom we're trying to drag, kicking and screaming, out of the 19th century. We're heading into the 21st century, and this legislation wants to take us back on that slippery slope. Oh, yes, the intent is to take us back farther than — as I indicated initially in my opening remarks, past the working conditions and whatever rights people had 50 or 60 years ago.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Adamczyk. We appreciate your taking the time to come before us today.

LABOURERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION OF NORTH AMERICA

The Chair: Our next group up is the Labourers' International Union of North America, Local 837. Good morning, folks. Again, 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit, if you would be kind enough to introduce yourself for the Hansard reporter.

Mr Joe Mancinelli: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I am Joe Mancinelli, regional manager for the Labourers' International Union of North America for central and eastern Canada. To my right is Paula Randazzo, who is an industrial representative for LIUNA Local 837 here in Hamilton which represents approximately 3,000 workers.

The Labourers' International Union is an international trade union affiliated with the AFL/CIO, the CLC and the Ontario Federation of Labour. We represent 770,000 members across North America, 40,000 in Ontario, and about 3,000 in this very fine city, Hamilton. We represent a very wide variety of workers, precast workers, construction workers, workers from many different sectors, and we also represent a very significant portion of our membership that is non-construction which is in the cleaning, maintenance sector. We have caretakers in the public sector from the Hamilton-Wentworth separate school board, industrial workers from factories in the area, plants, airport workers and other sectors.

LIUNA is one of the most innovative trade unions in North America. We have recognized the need to partner with our contractors and work together to find innovative solutions to our industry. I know that our next speakers are the Hamilton Construction Association. Cam Nolan is coming up, a good friend of LIUNA, we get along very well. Even though our opinion on this bill may differ, and you'll hear that today, we get along very well with our contractors.

LIUNA has gotten involved in a number of projects where we've partnered with our contractors. The Garden River Reserve project in Sault Ste Marie, where we've partnered with the native Canadians in that area, Keiwick Construction and ourselves, to work on a $100-million project which will be financed by the consortium is a display of our innovation. The 407 highway is another display of our innovation. Of course, the Prince Edward Island fixed-link bridge between PEI and New Brunswick and the Hibernia project where we're very active show the kind of innovation that we're involved with.

We have provided unprecedented service to our members and their families and have achieved the harmony and progress I have briefly outlined because of the stability in the workplace. But also stability in the Legislature has given us the opportunity, of course, where for decades a delicate balance was achieved by keeping companies profitable and competitive and of course, our workers protected. We are concerned that Bill 49 will once again erode that delicate balance that has made Ontario unique.

The Minister of Labour, the Honourable Elizabeth Witmer, has indicated that the changes to the Employment Standards Act embodied in Bill 49 will cut through years of accumulated red tape. In fact the effect of these amendments will be to cut even further the currently inadequate protection found in Ontario's employment standards legislation.

The minister has said that these amendments will encourage the workplace to be more self-reliant in resolving disputes, where in fact we feel that the proposed changes will encourage employers to take advantage of their employees. The minister has said that these amendments will make the act more relevant to the needs of today's workplace, where in fact these amendments ignore the needs of today's workplace.

The minister has also said that these changes are designed to focus the attention of the government on helping the most vulnerable workers. In fact with these amendments the government is preying upon those who are most vulnerable and rewarding those employers in Ontario who operate outside the standards demanded by Ontario workers and demanded by Ontario law.

Many of the presenters here today will be voicing their grave concerns with this proposed legislation. In some instances I will echo those voices. However, and I know the workers in Ontario would agree, such an important message cannot be conveyed too often.

Over half of employment standards claims in Ontario are from workplaces with 10 people or less. Traditionally, labour has found these small workplaces the hardest to organize and service. The changes in Bill 49 will make it even more difficult and far more expensive. The result will be to discourage those same workers from joining the very unions that traditionally have been able to negotiate far better working conditions and job protection and which have protected the rights of those employees currently codified in employment-related legislation.

With global competitiveness as the rationale, our government is reducing the standards that encourage the most productive use of our workforce. This rationale ignores the fact that in Canada, our exports, primarily produced by union labour, who enjoy standards far above those provided for in the Employment Standards Act, continue to be competitive in the global market. Furthermore, this rationalization based on competitiveness and the global economy ignores the reality that those members of our domestic labour force who most need the protection of the Employment Standards Act do not compete in the global market because their services are not and cannot be performed offshore.

Clearly, the government's attack on Ontario workers cannot be justified in the name of the global economy. Clearly, this is a veiled attempt to undermine the bargaining strength of Ontario's workforce and the unions who represent them.

Bill 49 contemplates collective agreements where terms respecting hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays, severance and vacation with pay will be below the minimum standards currently prescribed by the Employment Standards Act. The only proviso is that these rights as a package will confer a greater benefit than the comparable employment standards as a package. These proposed changes are merely a back-door attempt at eliminating Ontario's minimum employment standards. Minimum standards — and make no mistake, these are the minimum standards to be tolerated in a democratic society — serve a number of purposes, all of which are frustrated by these amendments.

First, the employers and unions will have to agree to the package. With employers attempting to push back currently established minimums in the name of competing in a global economy, unions will have to rely on strikes and work action in order to protect the interests of their members. By placing long-established employment standards on the table, Bill 49 makes the settling of contract issues more difficult, again adding to Ontario's industrial conflict. In fact the resulting labour unrest will be detrimental to Ontario's economy, and not further the government's stated objectives. In the view of this obvious fallout, one is left wondering as to the real motivation of this government in proposing such an erosion of the rights of unionized workers in Ontario.

Second, experience with the current legislative scheme shows that determining whether a contract confers a greater right or benefit is not a precise science. Making such a determination under the proposed scheme will require the comparison of apples to oranges, and the legislation provides no guidance in making this determination. Employees of Ontario do not deserve such uncertainty in their workplace. What the employees of Ontario deserve, and what Bill 49 does not give them, is security in knowing that certain conditions and terms of employment are not subject to dispute. Although I understand it is the intention of the minister to defer this particular provision until later this year, its shortcomings will continue to exist, no matter when it is introduced.

For unionized employees, Bill 49 shifts responsibility for the investigation of employment standards breaches to the unions and to the employees they represent. By doing this, the government is abdicating its responsibility to the workers of Ontario. Many employees and their unions, particularly in those job sectors where employment standards breaches are most prevalent, will not have the resources to take on the added responsibility. This is especially true with the demise of previously available ministry mediation services.

In fact the question remains whether the Labour Relations Act confers sufficient jurisdiction on arbitrators appointed under the act to fashion the remedies needed in an employment standards context. What this means is that employees in Ontario will not be able to enforce their rights. What this means is that the most vulnerable of Ontario's workers will be denied access to justice. Our society demands a remedy for all workers in Ontario. The scheme contemplated in Bill 49 will erode and destroy decades of hard work by both business and labour.

Let me put it into real terms for you. The Labourers' International Union currently is leading a claim to the employment standards branch on behalf of a number of cleaners who, through the actions of a successor employer, were replaced in their jobs with workers earning minimum wage. This successor employer has not fulfilled its obligation under the Employment Standards Act, and the displaced employees have not been paid termination pay in lieu of notice, nor have they been offered meaningful work.

Under the current system these employees do have a remedy through the employment standards branch. Under the system proposed by Bill 49 the cost to the union of investigating this complaint and taking it through grievance procedures would be prohibitively high. In essence, these employees would be unable to recover the two weeks' wages presently owed to them. This may not seem like a lot of money to some of us in this room who are fortunate enough to earn a decent income, but to unemployed cleaners who earn $8.50 an hour, this amounts to their food and housing.

The bottom line is that unions will simply not be able to pursue the valid employment standards breaches complained of by their members if they have to use the arbitration process. Again, justice for the most vulnerable and marginalized workers in our society will be denied, while dishonest employers will be rewarded for their illegal, unjust actions and honest employers will be denied the right to a level playing field.

As I mentioned earlier, Bill 49 essentially privatizes the investigation of employment standards complaints for unionized workers. It also goes further in its privatization of the protection of Ontario's workers. By virtue of Bill 49, responsibility for the collection of amounts owing under the act will be surrendered by the ministry to private collection agencies. Simply requiring employers to pay for collection costs would vastly improve the ministry's ability to collect amounts owing under the act, but such a course of action is not being proposed. Instead, the minister proposes to turn over the fate of Ontario workers to an unaccountable group whose sole motivation is profit. Altruism is not known to run rampant in the private sector. It is therefore not hard to see that such a scheme will result in collection agencies acting in a manner which is most profitable even though it may be at odds with the affected employee's best interests.

Today we will all hear a great deal about the shortcomings of Bill 49. I've briefly covered those issues which will affect organized labour in Ontario, including the members of LIUNA, which I represent. I would, however, like to quickly touch on a few remaining issues before closing.

Bill 49 proposes to limit employees' recovery to six months in the name of increased efficiency and fewer evidentiary problems. If this was the government's true objective, why does Bill 49 not include provisions to expedite the ministry's investigation and enforcement of employment standards claims? Bill 49 does not address the current four-year period available to the ministry to investigate and enforce a claim. In addition, why must this alleged increased efficiency be borne on the backs of Ontario's employees? Limiting an employee's recovery shifts the enforcement of Ontario's minimum standards to the individual by pushing employees to use Ontario's civil courts to recover money owed to them because of the employer's employment standards violation.

Some might ask: With all these employees seeking their remedy through the courts, won't the cost to Ontario taxpayers actually be higher than under the current enforcement mechanisms? If that's the case, why would the minister propose a change that would actually increase costs? The answer of course is obvious. An overwhelming majority of employees cannot afford a lawyer and therefore will not pursue their claims. The minister is in fact counting on this and aims to save money at the expense of those who really need it most. The result: For all practical purposes, those employees who cannot afford legal representation will be left without remedy. In Bill 49's Ontario, employers are winners. There can be no excuse for this unjust enrichment and imbalance.

The yet-to-be-prescribed minimum claim will have much the same effect. For those to whom every penny counts, and that's most people in Ontario, if their claim is below the minimum set by the minister, they will be forced to head to Small Claims Court to enforce their rights.

For those whose claim exceeds the maximum, they are forced either to abandon that part of their claim in excess of that maximum or hire a lawyer and initiate costly litigation. Again, for most, making a civil claim is not financially viable. Most will be forced to accept less money than they are owed. Since a small percentage of the claims actually exceed $10,000, there is no improved efficiency here. All that is accomplished is to deny justice to those who are wronged.

In conclusion, the innumerable complaints currently handled by the ministry confirm that the protection afforded by the current act is weak and its provisions are not effectively enforced. The fact is, this legislation should be bolstered, not eroded. Changes to the Employment Standards Act which address preventing employment standards violations and expedite their investigation and enforcement should be introduced, not the current amendments which simply reward the unscrupulous employers in Ontario who violate these minimum employment standards with impunity.

We have worked hard as an organization, together with our companies and our contractors, to achieve progress and stability in the workplace. I find it disheartening that this type of regressive legislation continues to be introduced.

I thank the committee for the opportunity to express our views on Bill 49, and we look forward to some positive changes to the bill as its progresses.

The Chair: Thank you for your submission. You used the magic words "in conclusion" just before 15 minutes. Actually, we've gone to about 16 and a half, so I'm afraid we won't have time for questions, but thank you very much for taking the time to make a very detailed presentation.

HAMILTON CONSTRUCTION ASSOCIATION

The Chair: That means the next up will be the Hamilton Construction Association. Good morning. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit.

Mr Cameron Nolan: My name is Cameron Nolan. I'm the executive director of the Hamilton Construction

Association and I'm very pleased to be here. I'm also quite pleased to follow my good friend Joe Mancinelli because it gives me an opportunity to critique everything he said, but I won't do that because we have a good working relationship.

I want to emphasize, however, because I do follow his presentation and do have a somewhat different perspective to present to you, that I don't think the goals and objectives between management and labour are different necessarily; they perhaps are just achieved in different ways. For those companies that operate with good standards and good wages and pay their employees according to the act or in superior performance to the act, they know the importance of having the competitors that are in their industry paying at the same rates, dealing with their employees in the same manner and at the same cost, because that creates a more level competitive playing field. So I don't think we have different objectives. Perhaps it's just a question of some differences of approach.

The Hamilton Construction Association represents some 380 firms that are working in the non-residential construction sector. Our members employ anywhere between 15,000 and 20,000 people over the course of a year in terms of actual persons, but based on the number and volume of construction activity in our area, which presently is about $200 million, that represents a fairly substantial number of employment years in terms of activity within the non-residential construction sector.

I'd like to start off by saying that the overall assessment from the construction industry is relatively positive to the government initiatives. The essence of that is that these kinds of initiatives where increased flexibility is going to prevail and the ability of employers and employees to set their own tone for how they're going to work and make themselves more competitive in a global economy are certainly of benefit.

I will tell you that we are most appreciative of the overall government emphasis on handling its finances and cleaning up its red tape and various other aspects of the legislation that intend to be changed. We are supportive of the agenda, and I want to tell you that we are despite the fact that the current economy is killing the construction industry and the current initiatives are killing the construction industry in the province of Ontario.

We have seen in the Hamilton area, for example, a decline in non-residential construction activity from a high of $450 million for the year ending December 1990 to a low of $210 million roughly for the year ending December 1995. That's significant. That changes the number of employed persons from employed person-years in the order of 10,000 down to roughly half of that. It is significant. So while we are hurt, we certainly are appreciative of the kinds of general directions because I think that has long-term stability and importance for long-term economic health and benefiting the province of Ontario and the people of Ontario.

I'd like to touch on just a few general comments, then some specific comments, and hopefully leave time for questions.

The construction industry has exemptions within the act. It probably doesn't take a brain surgeon to figure out that inclement weather and the problems of being able to put construction works in place in times of poor weather conditions, whether it's rain or snow or cold, means that in order to take what would hopefully be a year's worth of employment, we have to crunch that down into a smaller period of time in the good weather months. There's a recognition within the Employment Standards Act of this particular fundamental aspect of the construction work, and we appreciate that recognition. We need the recognition, both labour and management, in order to be able to ensure we have a productive period of time in which to complete the work that is required of us and provide an opportunity for our companies and our employees to profit from that through wages and salaries and other forms of profit.

While we appreciate that, we want to remind the committee that as you go into the second-stage review there will be more discussion about these types of flexibility arrangements for construction, and we want to encourage you to enhance them.

The second issue I wanted to address with you is one that relates to a specific segment of the act which is not addressed, to my best knowledge, under Bill 49. It's clause 58(6)(e) of the act, which relates to construction workers who may be working in a shop or a fabrication shop for their employer under the terms of a collective agreement; for example, a sheet metal worker who is a member of the sheet metal union, working for that union as a member of the union employed by a sheet metal contractor, but who works on a day-to-day basis at the location of the office of that sheet metal contractor fabricating the components that will eventually be installed on a construction site. That employee is under the collective agreement, just as the employee who is out at the site installing the fabricated works — fabricated works which could be fabricated onsite, I might add, but are done more efficiently in a plant at the site of the employer, all under the one collective agreement. The employee in the shop, because of the terms of clause 58(6)(e), has greater severance rights under the present act than the employee on the site. They're both paid the same wages. They have the same terms and conditions of their employment contract. They essentially do the same work; it's different parts of the same work.

So that's a problem with the act and we are proposing that it be amended. It's in the brief; you can read the details. If you have questions about it, I'll address those.

The remaining comments relate to some of the concepts within the act. I'd like to support the reduction to six months. I also think it's prudent to place upon the Ministry of Labour and the Employment Standards Act officers a duty of care that recognizes that six months. I didn't say that in the brief, but I think when you heard from Mr Mancinelli, that's only a fair and equitable position to take. If we're going to speed up the process and constrain the time period, we have to place performance standards on our government employees that will meet those standards of performance that we're expecting of the general public and the employers and the employees. I might add that we have to furnish them with the resources to make it happen properly too. So we would certainly encourage that.

With respect to the minimum and maximum claims authority and increased authority of officers, once again Bill 49 doesn't recognize — and we do say in our brief that you must provide proper training; you must take a look at your hiring practices and examine what the best way is to make sure we have employees who become officers and have the capabilities of carrying out those new responsibilities. Adjudicating responsibilities are different than fact-finding responsibilities; with them comes a greater duty of care as well. So it's incumbent upon the minister to put the resources in place to make that happen as well.

With respect to the courts or the ministry, my understanding is that the minister wants to preclude parties from doing both at the same time and "double-dipping." That makes eminent sense. If there are some deficiencies in that in terms of constraining a person's ability to make ends meet or to in fact have the money to hire a lawyer, right now they can follow the Employment Standards Act line of thought. They can do that after this change. I don't see the difference there particularly.

Dispute settlement before investigation that allows the employment standards officer to let the parties come to a resolution before a completed investigation seems prudent. It reinvests in the parties to a dispute the rights that are theirs to begin with, the right to come to a settlement so that we don't have government intrusion where two parties come to an agreement. That seems to make sense to us.

With respect to the privatization of collections, once again, standards can and should be put in place that ensure that private collection agencies do have the employee's best interests at heart and they only make money when those objectives are met. It does have the advantage of separating the investigation and adjudication responsibility from the collection responsibility, and that frees up the employment standards officers to do their job with more focus. We agree with that.

With respect to grievance procedures being used as a means to address Employment Standards Act disputes or disputes between an employer and an employee, there are some issues raised by the Ontario Chamber of Commerce that I think are relevant. You should pay attention to those questions and address them at the end of the day. It's going to be critical that there be some very clear guidelines set. I think the Ontario Chamber of Commerce has identified, for example, the time limits. If the minister and the government put in place the six-month time limit, that may not exist in certain collective agreements. Which prevails, the ESA amendments or the collective agreement amendments and time periods? That's something that the minister will have to pay fairly close attention to.

I agree also with the clarification of the pregnancy and parental leave, but I want to tell you one other thing that I don't think is in the act, and I'm not sure the change that's proposed really addresses this: an employer who has chosen weeks in lieu of, so weeks of service in lieu of 4% or 6% or whatever that is. An employer who is in that situation will pay to an employee who takes parental and pregnancy leave the full weeks in lieu of. That's the Ministry of Labour interpretation brought to bear on that language. So if I, as an employer, have chose that route, I have to pay two weeks' vacation to my employee despite the fact that they may have only been in my employ for six months, while they took the balance of six months for parental and pregnancy leave. That seems to be an improper balance and definitely should be addressed in terms of changes.

There are several other minor items that are in the brief; you can read them. We do acknowledge the minister's tabling, if you will, of the proposal that employers and employees can set terms and conditions which differ and vary and maybe are less than the Employment Standards Act. When they come up under the second-stage review I think will be an appropriate time to spend more discussion on those points.

With that, at the end of our brief there's a brief synopsis of who the Hamilton Construction Association is. I've appended to it some statistics on building permits to validate my comments earlier. That concludes my formal remarks. I'd be happy to answer any questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us with four and a half minutes for questioning, so one and a half minutes each. I guess because we didn't have any questions last time, we'll commence this round with the official opposition.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. We've heard from a number of people, and you cited here, courts or the ministry. There are a number of citizens and workers who can afford to do that, I would suppose, but I've been meeting with people who quite frankly are meeting with more costs in their life rather than reduced costs. I cite tuition increases which are happening and which I'm hearing about quite a bit right now; that school is about to go back and user fees are proliferating through universities. These people are hardworking, they see their costs going up, and the suggestion is that they will not be able to pursue through the courts any claims that they may have. Do you believe that to be true? Should there be some onus on the ministry to assist those people, rather than forcing them to the courts?

Mr Nolan: I have no knowledge of whether that's true or not. I don't know how that circumstance distinguishes from the present circumstance. I have some great difficulty understanding. If they can't afford it now, presumably they're not pursuing through the courts now and presumably they're using the ESA as their methodology for achieving some satisfactory result. If they're doing that now, I don't see how they're not going to be able to do it in the future. There are certain elements of the proposal which constrain parties, clearly, and those have been identified. I think I acknowledged that if we're going to put those constraints, we have to put some more resources in place to make sure that they are properly adhered to.

Mr Christopherson: Cam, thanks very much for an interesting presentation. What I'd like to do, because you opened up by saying you'd listened to Joe Mancinelli's presentation, and I wanted to ask him a question but time didn't allow it, I'd like to run it by you.

Mr Nolan: Oh, I can answer for Joe.

Mr Christopherson: That's what I thought, interchangeable. I don't want to break up this great love-in you two have, but I found it really interesting because it's the first time that I've seen it put forward, and the fact that it was put forward by a labour organization I thought deserves to be underscored. Joe said in his presentation, "Again, justice for the most vulnerable and marginalized workers in our society will be denied, while dishonest employers will be rewarded for their illegal and unjust actions and honest employers will be denied the right to a level playing field."

Mr Nolan: I've said the same thing.

Mr Christopherson: I thought that was an excellent point. I wonder how you would comment on that.

Mr Nolan: I think Joe is absolutely, 100% on. Those employers, whether they're union or non-union — and that's quite irrelevant; there are many employers in both areas of our economy who operate in the most legitimate way because they understand the long-term value of that. There are some employers who will be able to get away with it.

I think when you deregulate, when you lessen regulation, when you reduce the power of government to intrude in the relationship, you risk that side of the equation being exacerbated, where the most vulnerable can have difficulties. My sense of it is that the minister just has to put the resources in place to make sure that the Employment Standards Act officers are spending their time in that area of the sector rather than the area that's already performing well.

Mr Christopherson: I would interpret the statement that Joe made, that "justice for the most vulnerable and marginalized workers in our society will be denied," to mean that it will be denied as a result of the changes in Bill 49, and that that will lead to the inequity that you agree will be there. So I see a little bit of inconsistency.

Mr Nolan: I think the inequity already exists, because I don't believe that the Ministry of Labour or the Ontario government or any government has the resources today to enforce to the degree that is necessary. So it's a question of reallocation of resources. I think that's where Joe and I may have a somewhat different emphasis in terms of the philosophy that's here. I see the opportunity for reassessing where the resources go; they see it differently, and that's their call.

The Chair: Questioning moves to the government benches. Any members?

Mrs Fisher: If we follow up on what Mr Christopherson was just asking — and I don't disagree with your comment, by the way, because right now it's not working competently and it's not serving all of the workers of Ontario; so we together have to do something to fix that. I believe that's the goal of the changes to the act right now.

In saying so, however, as you've noticed through the course of the morning and ourselves yesterday through the hearing process, there's consistently this issue with regard to the collection of outstanding moneys owed to workers. If we were to reallocate it so that the responsibility of enforcement of the act other than the collection was there, do you think we can actually resolve the issue that way?

If we continue to leave it merged, it seems to me, taking off party colours here, all governments of the past have unsuccessfully been able to protect the workers that way. Could you see that private collection on behalf of the workers would benefit the worker?

1150

Mr Nolan: I understand the distinction between private collection and government collection is the government employee has perhaps a greater duty of responsibility or has a greater accountability to the government agency. I think that's the issue. The government must put in place the proper accountability channels and enforce them properly and fairly. Anybody can do the enforcement. Why couldn't I do the enforcement? Whether I'm a government employee or a private employer, why can't I do that enforcement, as long as the standards and duty of care that I'm required to meet are the same, regardless of whether I'm an employee of the government or whether I'm a subcontractor contracted out to do that particular role? The issue I don't think is who's doing it; it's what's the accountability process?

The Chair: Thank you very much for taking the time to make a presentation here before us today.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 199

The Chair: The last presentation of the morning session, Canadian Auto Workers, Local 199. Good morning. Is it Mr Allen?

Mr Malcolm Allen: Yes, it is.

The Chair: Good morning, sir. Again we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit.

Mr Allen: First off, I'd like to thank the committee for the opportunity to make a presentation before you. My name is Malcolm Allen. I'm the recording secretary of Local 199 in St Catharines. At the present time we represent in excess of 7,000 CAW members working in diverse industries, not just including auto. Personally, I work at General Motors, and part of the brief will deal with General Motors' attempt to see the ESA changed concerning the hours of work, which is extremely crucial to those of us who work for the Big Three.

First off, a brief explanation of who the CAW is, where we come from. We are a labour organization with a membership in excess of 210,000 members, with approximately 143,000 members working in the province of Ontario. What probably is the most misunderstood part is that we are not only auto workers; in fact, we are in a minority as auto workers. I being one who has been in the auto workers sector for 20 years, we have shrunk over the years to the point where we're in a minority in our own union but yet we're still an integral part. So when the auto workers union represents workers in Ontario, we don't speak solely for auto workers. I think that needs to be made clear up front because there's a misinterpretation in the public and sometimes by the government that the CAW is auto and auto only, and in fact we are not.

The brief before you is one that's been compiled by the CAW with numerous people and that all the locals concerned had input into. It's taken great time and consideration by the CAW and the members by looking at their concerns and their needs as far as the Employment Standards Act is concerned. The CAW may be looked upon as having, in the auto sector at least, contracts that seem rather, shall we say, nice. That's not always the case. I go back and talk to my father who was employed for 29 years in the auto sector and he reminds me of the collective agreements that were signed in the early 1960s that weren't so nice. Without employment standards, there was hell to pay when you worked in that sector.

Basically we have four crucial points that we want to look at. Our position is that Bill 49 dismantles the long-standing guarantee found in the Employment Standards Act against any person contracting out of workplace standards. We believe that Bill 49 seriously limits and in some circumstances denies worker access to justice and the proper enforcement of the standards that remain in the statute.

We also believe that Bill 49 continues this government's destructive agenda of privatizing public services without regard to the consequences upon the community at large and the government's employees who are terminated from employment as a result of that privatization.

Bill 49 fails to address the desperate need for progressive improvements to the current set of workplace standards found in the statute. It's surprising to us in the CAW that we, as a progressive union, seem to be watching a new government which is taking us back in time. For us, that's dismaying, to say the least.

We look at the economy of Ontario and we look at a business sector, at least the auto sector, that shows immense profits and yet wages that are stagnant. In some cases they're actually below real levels of where they were five years ago. Those of us in the Big Three who had collective agreements signed three years ago, in real terms, have not accelerated to the point that equals our productivity gains inside the Big Three, which for us is a step backwards.

Just to point out some of the statistics, the GDP has grown by an average of 1.9, versus 1991's 3.1, and yet consumer spending is lagging. I know in the city of St Catharines, when you go downtown it's like a death bed. The businesses in the downtown area are closing even though the MTO has relocated; mind you, in smaller numbers than anticipated. St Catharines is a dying town and it's only because wages of workers in the real economy have stagnated. The Employment Standards Act, according to what the changes in Bill 49 are looking at, would probably drag them even further. It seems to be a race to the bottom for St Catharines' people, at least, and for no other.

My own employer, General Motors, as most are well aware, reported an obscene profit last year and yet it continues to downsize. There were 9,000 employees in the GM St Catharines facilities 10 years ago; there are now 5,200. We make more product now than we've ever made before, with fewer people. We haven't shared in the productivity gains that GM has enabled itself to derive its profits from, and yet it continues to do so.

It continues to sell plants. It leaves us with the threat of another 1,500 employees who may be out of work in another two years, and yet it turns around and asks the ministry to look at opening up the hours of work from eight to 10 a day, from 48 per week to 56 or more. Yet it's still shrinking. It wants to take a shrinking workforce, under the Employment Standards Act, according to the amendments it would like to see, and work those who are left excessive numbers of hours; those who are older an excessive number of hours, because there's one thing that's true: We don't get younger, we only get older.

In the plant I work in today you need 10 years to be there. You're not a young employee any more, you're an older employee. The recovery time for your body day to day takes longer as you age. I think that's a given for most of us. I don't see any teenagers around the table. I think we all fully understand that, excluding possibly the parliamentary assistant. The bottom line is, the older you are, the harder you recover. Yet here's an employer who has done remarkably well by all standards and by all accounts, by any economist in the province of Ontario and by its own accounts — it trumpeted quite highly last year how much money it made — yet it continues to whittle away the number of employees it has while it continues to make money.

Now it turns around in the most draconian fashion and asks people to work more than eight hours a day and then asks the government to have the right to do that legally. Not only is that an economic impact on those of us who remain as far as our wellbeing is concerned, there's a legal aspect. Myself, as a parent — I don't quite fall into that chasm now, but I did a few years ago. Living in rural Ontario, as I do, outside of St Catharines, when my children go to school they go by bus. If my employer has the right to keep me beyond eight hours and my children are under the age of 10, as they were not long ago, and my wife's at work, who takes care of the children when I had anticipated that I would arrive home at 3 and my employer told me at 2:30, "You're staying until 5, Malcolm"?

Now I'm faced with the dilemma that the Employment Standards Act says the employer says I can stay and the Child and Family Services Act says I have to be a responsible parent, have to be home to care for those children or I could be charged under that act. Now I face the dilemma of a job to keep the roof over the heads of my children and food on the table or no job at all, and yet being delinquent in my responsibility as a parent to look after my own children. I find that absolutely heinous in the utmost, that an employer would force parents into that type of situation.

If we look at the regulation aspects, Bill 49, in our opinion, restricts and adversely regulates a worker's right to recover what is owing to him or her pursuant to the statutory enforcement process. We believe the bill denies workers the right to make a claim pursuant to the ESA to the Ministry of Labour under as-yet-unspecified minimum dollar limits.

We believe the bill puts a new, more restrictive time limit on workers who wish to file a claim. Workers will only have six months to do so. Representing workers in the workplace, as I have done over the years as a committee person and as a UI rep, I understand time limits, but I also understand what workers need to do to decide for themselves if they wish to follow a course of action. Whether that's an appeal process to the UI commission, whether that's a grievance procedure which has time limits, they need to decide internally, within themselves, do they wish to pursue it?

That process can be timely and there are mitigating circumstances that make that time limit sometimes protracted and drawn out. It could be fear, it could be the fact they're not aware of the time limit and they let it drag on because they have family responsibilities or other responsibilities that enables that process to take so long. The bottom line is they need to have a fair and equitable time limit to make a decision that is unfettered by any sort of fear or coercion, and by dropping the time limit the way the ESA is suggesting here in Bill 49, I truly believe that places a burden on the employee.

We believe the real objective the government has for the ESA is that improvements are needed in the way it is enforced and administered, beyond a question. In 1994-95, when we look at collection, 29% of the orders to pay against employers were not collected and 74% of the total sum of dollars assessed against employers went uncollected. A third of the cases were unsatisfied orders to pay. It seems that you look at one after another after another.

The bottom line is, if the amendments had looked at how we get just severance pay for those who are denied and then have the ministry write an order against an employer and then not be able to collect it, it seems if the ministry had spent more time looking at this aspect rather than the hours of work, which seem to me are going to open up to the point where we no longer can adequately look after families and spend quality time at home because we're going to spend it in the workplace — I think this committee would have taken a great step forward if it had looked at this aspect and cleaned it up to the point where workers collect money equally as well as banks collect loans that are outstanding. It seems that as workers, if we were on equal footing with the rest of the debts that are owed, we'd be better off.

The brief is extensive. I leave it to you to read the rest. I thank you for your time. I know the workers I represent in St Catharines are appreciative of the fact that we were able to come, and I'll take any questions.

The Chair: Actually, we've got barely 45 seconds left, so if anyone just has any quick statement they'd like to make at this time. The questions would have started with Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. This is probably the most comprehensive presentation in terms of written analysis and backup material that we've received to date, and I intend to read the entire document. I just want to thank you for coming forward. I particularly want to thank you and a lot of the other leading unions for continuing to stay in this fight, representing not just unionized workers and people who pay union dues but a lot of the vulnerable workers who need your help too.

The Chair: Any other quick statements?

Mr Duncan: Thank you for your presentation today.

The Chair: Yes, thank you, Mr Allen. We appreciate your taking the time to come in and appear before us. With that, this committee will stand recessed until 1 o'clock back in this room.

The committee recessed from 1205 to 1301.

The Chair: I call the meeting back to order for the afternoon session of our second day of hearings on Bill 49.

HAMILTON-BURLINGTON CUPE HEALTH CARE WORKERS JOINT ACTION COMMITTEE

The Chair: Our first group up this afternoon, the Hamilton-Burlington CUPE Health Care Workers Joint Action Committee. That was a mouthful. Good afternoon, folks. We have 15 minutes, just as a reminder, for you to divide as you see fit between your presentation and question-and-answer period. I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter, please.

Ms Michele Columbus: My name is Michele Columbus. I'm coordinator for the Hamilton-Burlington CUPE Health Care Workers Joint Action Committee. With me are Pat Whitfield, president of CUPE Local 794; Mike Tracey, president of CUPE Local 786; and Fran Borsellino, a member of CUPE Local 786. I'm just going to read through my brief and if there's any time left we'll have questions.

The Hamilton-Burlington CUPE Health Care Workers Joint Action Committee welcomes this opportunity to make a submission to the standing committee on resources development regarding Bill 49 amendments to this province's most fundamental workplace standards legislation.

The Hamilton-Burlington CUPE Health Care Workers Joint Action Committee represents 4,000 hospital workers in the Hamilton-Burlington area. We are seven locals, part of CUPE, Canada's largest trade union, representing more than 450,000 members. Our national union is organized into more than 2,650 local unions situated in nearly every major city and town across the country. CUPE members are employed by boards of education, municipalities, hospitals, universities, nursing homes, homes for the aged, electrical utilities, voluntary social agencies, the Ontario Housing Corp and the Workers' Compensation Board.

It is the position of the Hamilton-Burlington CUPE health care workers that the employment standards legislation is among the most fundamental pieces of labour legislation for ordinary working people in this province. The purpose of this legislation has been to establish vital minimum standards designed to protect workers from the exploitation handed out by the province's worst employers. Furthermore, we submit any amendments to this legislation must enshrine a basic principle of continued improvement in the employment standards of workers so that they may be protected from the excesses of the labour market.

The Minister of Labour has portrayed the changes found in Bill 49, the Employment Standards Improvement Act, as housekeeping amendments that would facilitate administration and enforcement by reducing ambiguity, simplifying definitions and streamlining procedures. On the contrary: The Bill 49 amendments are significant changes designed to frustrate the legitimate claims of workers under the act by undermining workers' most basic rights. Bill 49 attempts to effect major changes to the law as it currently stands. Bill 49 places several new obstacles in the path of workers seeking to enforce their existing statutory rights. The new act alters the manner, substance and duration of a worker's claim in order to frustrate an individual's ability to obtain a just result in the face of a violation of the law.

Although the current Employment Standards Act has proved to be a relatively weak piece of legislation, the Bill 49 amendments dilute this legislation even further. The improvements in these changes are reserved almost exclusively for this province's employers.

The primary effect to unionized members will be to transfer the cost and responsibility of enforcing public law issues relating to employment on to the shoulders of labour unions covered by a collective agreement. Unions like CUPE will shoulder the hardship of investigation and/or enforcement of all additional cases generated by this procedural change in the law. The reality of this is that labour unions simply will not have the same financial wherewithal as the provincial government to investigate and enforce every claim. Some employment standards claims, despite their legitimate basis and a union's best efforts to proceed, will have to be discarded for financial reasons with no guarantee that the director will exercise his or her discretion to allow the claim under the Ministry of Labour's process of enforcing the act. Unions will have to stretch resources to cover the costs of grievances arising under the collective agreement and the added employment standards claims.

Complaints that are heard before an arbitrator under this aspect of Bill 49 will be heard in a forum that requires the parties to pay for the costs of the adjudicator along with other associated costs of the litigation. The cost aspect puts greater pressure on the parties to settle, which in turn will result in less favourable settlements than would result in the full hearing under the current act. At the end of the day, labour unions will be required to investigate, enforce and fund complaints that the government currently maintains but is now unwilling to address.

In addition, labour unions will face new claims against them by members for whom the unions did not pursue an employment standards claim to arbitration and by other members who were not satisfied with an arbitral ruling concerning an employment standards grievance. Although the duty of fair representation has not in the past been seen as requiring a trade union to represent employees in respect of employment standards claims, this amendment will expose unions to such claims. This could mean that a failure of enforcement under a collective agreement will be seen by the labour relations board as constituting a breach of duty of fair representation. Moreover, for those individuals whom a labour union does represent at an arbitral hearing but were not satisfied with the representation of the union at the hearing or the ruling generated by that hearing, a complaint under section 74 of the Ontario Labour Relations Act may still be filed with the Ontario Labour Relations Board. Thus a union like CUPE might be placed in a number of situations where it will face a duty of fair representation complaint whether or not it proceeds with an employment standards claim.

In effect, unions will be faced with organizational challenges as a result of the government's privatization of the enforcement of this act. The added burden of these financial costs, along with the new legal liability placed on the union, may well exacerbate CUPE locals' abilities to effectively represent their members. CUPE locals are being given new financial and legal responsibilities along with the new legal liability at a time when their ability to fund these tasks is reduced by the increasing demands of the memberships to counteract many of the government's actions related to the elimination of public sector jobs.

These changes force unionized workers to fund complaints against their employers so that these employees will only be able to enforce their rights if their unions can afford to grieve the dispute. It is surprising that Bill 49 would require unionized workers to privately finance claims enforcing employment standards rights when the government itself will not spend needed funds to enforce these fundamental rights.

In summary, our brief has mainly focused on the amendments related to the new legal, financial and liability issues proposed by the provincial government. It has stated that this amendment is not beneficial for workers and their unions. The changes proposed to this act in general have the effect of reshaping the Employment Standards Act in several important ways.

As previously noted, these changes negatively alter the manner, duration and substance of claims under the act. All these changes seek to limit the ability of workers to enforce their rights under the law. The method by which an employee may recover against an alleged violation of the Employment Standards Improvement Act is significantly changed to limit the worker's ability to obtain full redress under the law. The substance of what may be claimed has been limited under Bill 49 so as to set a minimum and maximum amount that a claimant may obtain as a result of a violation of the act. Finally, the duration of acceptable claims has been shortened in order to reduce the amounts that may be recovered against employers who have violated the law. These changes will reduce the total amount workers may claim from their employers under the act.

As well, these changes will have the effect of forcing many non-union complainants to abandon the Ministry of Labour's dispute resolution system and opt into the court system for resolution of their disputes. Many workers will be unable to afford the financial expense and time required in private litigation. As a result, workers will simply not be able to enforce their employment standards rights and abandon their claim. Union members will be barred from launching a complaint under the investigatory and enforcement powers of the Employment Standards Act. As a result, unions will be faced with new financial and legal obligations that cause difficulty for unions attempting to enforce all their members' employment standards complaints. In summary, employers will face fewer complaints as a result of these changes.

Several underlying themes arise throughout these amendments. The Ministry of Labour is attempting to rid itself of the cost and responsibility of enforcing the act. All the changes designed to channel complaints into the court or grievance arbitration system seem to help the ministry reduce its budget. The alteration to the collection system also aids the ministry in eliminating the cost of funding the enforcement mechanisms of the act. The outcome of this reduction of tasks is a parallel decline in the Minister of Labour's obligation to enforce the law. Clearly the government has signalled that it has little interest in maintaining employment standards for all its citizens.

Bill 49 repeatedly differentiates claimants on the basis of a worker's labour union status. Workers who happen to be union members are treated materially differently in terms of their substantive and procedural rights from non-union members. The changes to all workers' rights based on union membership is a beacon indicating an end to the universal basic workplace rights enjoyed by all workers in this province for approximately 30 years. Unionized employees will have their rights enforced through a procedure separate from their non-union counterparts. This change has negative implications for the equality of enforcement of employment standards legislation in unionized and non-unionized workplaces.

Finally, the elimination of the universal floor of rights for unionized workers, along with the numerous amendments limiting non-unionized employees from fully enforcing the law, indicates an effort by the government to erode the general level of employment standards in this province. Allowing employers with a bargaining agent the opportunity of setting workplace employment standards will only lead these employers to actually erode current safeguards. Employers will attempt to copy lower workplace standards of their non-union counterparts or attempt to contract out their services to private sector, non-union workplaces, which is currently happening to our health care services. These changes are detrimental to workers and unions alike.

The Hamilton-Burlington CUPE Health Care Workers Joint Action Committee stands in opposition to the changes proposed as briefly outlined. We ask the committee to seriously consider our submission during the process of redrafting this legislation. All of the above is respectfully submitted for your consideration. We thank you for your time.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much for a very interesting, thorough presentation, fairly significant and well researched by the four competent people here today, a very detailed report eminently able to represent its 450,000 members locally and nationally. In that respect I think you portray your position as somewhat weaker than it really is. I think you very ably represent your constituent groups.

I don't think this act is intended to deal with that. What it's trying to do under section 3 — the minister has indicated that she will move to part two of the review of employment standards. Right now you make many decisions in your workplace. For example in health care, very few health care workers actually work a 40-hour week. How come it's in the act that it's 40 or 48 hours required? I'm saying there's all kinds of vacation, day-off entitlement, relief time, training time, all those kinds of working conditions which you more than capably represent.

I think what they're trying to do is give you more empowerment to work with your employer. I'd ask you the question — you deal in the public sector primarily — are those unfair employers? The municipal governments, the hospitals, the volunteer boards of those hospitals, libraries and other facilities — are they what you would call unfair employers?

Ms Pat Whitfield: What do you mean by that? For instance, my local union is in a hospital. I'm the president of a local union. Currently, we have 700 outstanding grievances on violations against the collective agreement. That's a huge amount; that's just for this year.

Mr O'Toole: Those are grievances with respect to employment standards?

Ms Whitfield: No.

The Chair: We've got to stay on schedule. It was a very generous one minute.

Mr Hoy: I'll ask that question. Could you very quickly categorize what those grievances might be?

Ms Whitfield: In my case, it's violations against our collective agreement. If you then dump employment standards on our local, we'll have I don't know how many more.

Mr Hoy: We don't have much time; I'll pass.

Mr Christopherson: Just to pursue that a little further, because I think it's an interesting road Mr O'Toole starts to take us down, you say that you have 700 outstanding grievances, and that's with a public board, to the extent that there is some accountability. You have a collective agreement which gives you rights and strengths and you have labour relations experts, supposedly, on the management side who understand the rules, and yet you still end up with 700 grievances. That's the kind of trouble you're facing. What do you suspect some of the workplaces must be like where there is no collective agreement, where there are just a very few employees who are perhaps immigrant workers, new Canadians, English isn't their first language, no collective agreement, and all they have is employment standards? What will their life possibly be like under this new law?

Ms Whitfield: I think there's a potential that it would be absolute hell, depending on the employer. I'm not saying that all employers out there are going to be violating the act, but we know there's a potential, and when there's no protection like a collective agreement, it's going to be worse.

Ms Fran Borsellino: I'd like to make a comment.

The Chair: Very quickly, please.

Ms Borsellino: With all the grievances that we have in Hamilton, we do have guidelines to follow under our collective agreements and the employers are having a very difficult time trying to follow our guidelines, as it is right now. Once you make these changes to the act, it's going to be much more difficult for unions and non-union employees to work out their disputes.

The Chair: Thank you all for taking the time to make a presentation before us here today.

TURKSTRA LUMBER CO LTD

The Chair: Our next presenter up is Mr Carl Turkstra from Turkstra Lumber Co, a fellow retailer. Good afternoon.

Mr Carl Turkstra: Let me begin briefly with some background information. My name is Carl Turkstra. I operate a lumber company in Hamilton and the Niagara Peninsula, along with three manufacturing companies. We have 150 full-time employees. The average length of service is just about nine years. I believe we pay above-average salaries for our industry. We have a good benefits package and a profit-sharing policy. Our people work hard to help the company make a profit and we work hard to avoid layoffs and terminations.

Let me say that I have prepared two pieces of paper here. One of them is the statement that I'm reading and the other is a two-page summary in case you don't have the patience.

My company is not unionized. I have very little experience with firing anyone, let alone people who have worked for the company for many years. I can safely say that any employee who was forced to leave the company carried a good deal of responsibility for his situation. He may have built up his own business so that it conflicted with his performance in a serious way. He may have been promoted to a position which he was unable or unwilling to do properly, or to accept training to do that job. His job may have changed to become more complicated and he was unable or unwilling to adapt. He may have refused to take an alternative position even if we did not reduce his salary.

Except for cases of employee theft, we do not want to dismiss a long-term employee for cause within the very narrow definition of the act. It is too inhuman and too brutal. I believe the act should recognize an employee's responsibility for his own situation and not assume the fault is entirely with the employer. I do not know how this could be done, but it would be much more equitable than the present all-or-nothing situation.

In most cases, my company has been prepared to offer a termination settlement as specified in the act even though we do not think it is fair. After all, we and our employees have paid a fortune in unemployment insurance over the years and almost never used it. As a practical matter, I can live with the payment specified in the act to help a person find a new job. However, a person who has failed in a position, perhaps intentionally, should not be able to pocket a large sum of money for doing nothing and walk into a new job. Why should a person who does his job badly receive twice as much pay as someone who does his job well?

A very troubling situation is when someone finally leaves to operate his own successful business. For some time, his behaviour caused serious problems to us as he built up his business on our time. If he will not resign, we have to force the issue. We have to find and train his replacement. We are the injured party, not the employee.

I had two cases where I believe an individual deliberately set out to be terminated and even hired a lawyer to plan strategy before we initiated discussions. In my opinion, severance payments should be seen as damages under the law and paid out on a regular basis until they run out or the recipient finds a new position. During this period of severance an employee should be required to look for a new job, and when the severance runs out the employee can of course start to collect unemployment insurance.

An even greater problem than the amount and method of payment of severance is the poisonous environment in which termination now takes place. Like divorce, termination of a long-term employee is a traumatic experience for everyone, including all the other employees. Through newspaper articles and the advice they give potential customers, some lawyers are systematically undermining the act.

The act sets minimum limits on company payroll and length of service before severance must be paid. Some lawyers tell their clients that everyone is eligible no matter how short a period they may have worked or what they have done to cause their dismissal. The act sets a standard of one week's pay per year of service. Some lawyers state in newspaper articles and advise their clients to expect one month per year.

In situations where employees have individual contracts or collective agreements, business is protected from civil action as long as they honour their agreements. Businesses without labour contracts are fully exposed to the machinations of ambulance chasers.

In the few cases I have dealt with — and I must say I am not a major victim of this problem; I'm simply objecting here on principle — we've had grounds for dismissal for cause, but would rather reach an equitable settlement. If negotiations fail and lawyers get involved, I have little choice but to dismiss for cause since they will sue me no matter what I do. So far, no former employee ended up with more money than the amounts we would have offered in the first place. However, lawyers on both sides did very well, in one case receiving more than the former employee.

The most pernicious wrinkle now being promoted by the legal profession and apparently being supported by the courts is "constructive dismissal." This theory holds that if an employee does not do his job well or if his job no longer exists, an employer cannot give him a lesser job or lower his status below his former peers even if his income is maintained. Essentially, one is not allowed to hurt an employee's feelings, even if he richly deserves it. Under such principles of constructive dismissal, a Premier could not shuffle his cabinet.

If I understand them correctly, the proposed changes to the act are a significant improvement. They reduce time limits for complaints under the act and prohibit employees from filing both a civil action and a complaint under the act. I would suggest that these limitations be broadened in two ways:

First, a person who accepts a cheque for severance pay as prescribed in the act from an employer should not be able to go to the civil courts later for more money. The director should not always have to be involved to prevent separate civil action.

Secondly, the concept of constructive dismissal should either be prohibited or clearly defined. An employer simply must have the right to demote supervisory personnel who perform inadequately and to offer alternative employment when reorganizations occur.

Those of us who do not have formal contracts with our employees depend on the Legislature to set reasonable rules that are fair to all parties. We also depend on you to protect us from predatory professionals who are making a very difficult situation even worse.

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Prescott and Russell): Thank you, Mr Turkstra. I want to congratulate you for your presentation. A man like you deserves to be congratulated for the type of business that you're operating, especially in the lumber business.

With regard to the fact that this law will give or authorize the employer to extend the number of work-week hours, do you think there's a chance that accidents would happen more often and then your WCB fees would increase by the fact that being at work longer hours there's definitely a chance of more accidents?

Mr Turkstra: It depends to a certain extent on the job. A retail sales clerk would not be a problem. I would think that in some of the manufacturing operations the longer hours increase risk when we have overtime and so on. People get very tired. We're not supposed to say this, but especially the older people find they cannot work as long as some of the younger people can. Yes, I would say there is a risk of that. As a policy, in my company we discourage it.

Mr Lalonde: What's your feeling on the fact that we want to privatize the collection of the arrears or the other —

Mr Turkstra: I'm not a lawyer or an expert. My judgement would be that an individual should be able to look to the government to help him force his employer to obey the law, if that answers your question.

Mr Lalonde: But at the present time will be able to hire the private collection agency instead of going through the government.

Mr Turkstra: I would say that most of the people I deal with are not able to deal with that financially. They're not qualified as people to deal with that kind of process. I think they really have to depend on the government; otherwise they'll have no recourse.

Mr Christopherson: Interesting presentation. Two questions only: One is rhetorical and I don't expect an answer. Your thoughts on the other would be appreciated. The first one is, given some of the shots you've taken at lawyers, I just wondered if your relative Herman Turkstra, the lawyer, had a chance to see this before you presented it.

Secondly, on page 4, the third paragraph from the top that begins, "In situations where employees have individual contracts or collective agreements, business is protected from civil action as long as they honour their agreements. Businesses without labour contracts are fully exposed to the machinations of 'ambulance chasers.'" Would not one solution to that be to encourage employers and employees to enter into a collective agreement by forming a union in the workplace?

Mr Turkstra: That's a very deep question. Essentially, I'm one of those people who runs my business very much in detail. I really do not find room in there to share that responsibility and authority with anybody else, so I would rather not have to deal with an official union organization. But if that's what my employees chose to do, that's what I would do.

With respect to my brother, he practises litigation of a different kind and he always disagrees with everything I do.

Mr Christopherson: I'm glad you have answered.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you, Mr Turkstra. It would appear to me, from reading and listening to your presentation today, that you are indeed a very progressive employer. I would suggest also that with your conservative approach with employees and the outlook, it would appear to me that you're looking after your employees. I guess the question I want to ask you is, workplace harmony, getting along with the people who are working for you — like profit-sharing, that progressive move — does that motivate and encourage productivity?

Mr Turkstra: The answer's yes. I think that everything you do to establish good communications with staff at all levels and kind of an open organization and the idea that they have a vested interest in the success of the company, all of that encourages commitment to hard work, and in my case the commitment to looking after the customers, which of course is what we're all about.

Mr O'Toole: That's just excellent. I can't compliment you enough, and I mean that sincerely. I'm sure you had it in here, but how long has your business been in operation?

Mr Turkstra: Forty-two years.

Mr O'Toole: Forty-two years, and you intend to be long. Do you see the world of work and the nature of work — you're trying to respond to customers, right? Have you altered your hours of the business being open or provided service to the customers by having to respond to the demands of customers?

Mr Turkstra: We responded to the movements of the competition and then we did a survey to see whether it did us any good and decided that basically it doesn't. We never open on Sundays. Nothing will make us open on Sundays.

Mr O'Toole: Isn't that the right place to make decisions, in the specific workplace? We were speaking earlier with CUPE workers and those employers and employees don't have the option of, say, closing a hospital on a Sunday. In your case as a person of private business, you're able to make those decisions, it would appear, in cooperation with the employees. You consulted with them.

Mr Turkstra: We don't have a very formal structure so it's very hard to say. Do we talk about it before we do it? The answer's yes. We talk to the managers, the managers talk to their people, and we have never had any problem whatsoever with employees having a problem with our hours.

Mr O'Toole: I think the employment standards is really trying to get into that very kind of empowerment for the participants in the workplace.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Turkstra. We appreciate it.

Mr Baird: If I could, just on a point of order, Mr Chair, indicate to Mr Turkstra, all of the Hansard will be going for the full review of the Employment Standards Act. Many things you mentioned aren't in the bill, nor that of presenters earlier today, but that will be going in and there will be a complete review of the act over the next eight months.

GOLDEN HORSESHOE SOCIAL ACTION COMMITTEE

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Golden Horseshoe Social Action Committee. Good afternoon. As you've heard me say countless times, 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit, and please be kind enough to introduce yourselves for Hansard.

Mr Gerald Diffin: I'm Gerald Diffin and with me is Rev Robert Wright. We're going to jump right in. Who we are is part of the package. You can read it if you're interested.

Thank you, Mr Chair and committee members, for the opportunity to comment on the bill. I'm not going to comment on any individual clauses in this bill but will give my opinion on the message this bill sends.

First, if business leaders have requested this type of legislation from the provincial government, it tells me that they aren't skilled enough to compete without exploiting their employees.

Second, the government, by entertaining this type of bill, admits it doesn't have the skills required to govern a province where both business and workers can prosper.

Third, the government spin on this bill and Bills 7 and 26 is that the province is open for business. But what it attracts is business that exploits not only its workers but also its suppliers, customers, the environment and governments that it deals with. This type of business usually doesn't prosper and when it closes creates financial chaos in the community. In the small community I grew up in and worked in for 60 years, the business that had the reputation of exploiting its employees and the environment didn't last very long.

Fourth, when the Premier goes on a sales junket to countries he is hoping Ontario can export to, he is telling them that the quality of Ontario goods is suspect. In my working life I have worked in retail, construction, heavy industrial, some places unionized and others not. Even in unionized shops some people for various reasons are more vulnerable than others and get abused and exploited, but in almost every instance these people get even. Unhappy workers produce products of varying quality. Evidence the days of protest and withdrawing of services of doctors.

To sum up, Bill 49 allows employers more leeway to exploit the most vulnerable Ontarians. My feeling is that government that isn't committed to protect all of its citizens from unscrupulous employers, retail sales people and criminals, supply them with a clean, safe environment and help them to live a healthy and fulfilling life isn't fit to govern.

Bill 49 does nothing to address the issue of abuses in the workplace. Thank you.

Mr Robert Wright: As my friend Mr Diffin has indicated, my name's Robert Wright. I'm a minister and also a community development worker, at present unemployed in both capacities. I shouldn't say I'm unemployed; I just don't get any wages for what I'm doing. I've indicated in the personal comments which I've made by introduction why it is I happen to be in this situation.

I was asked to just reflect a little bit on my experience as a pastor within a congregation that's in the city of Welland. I served there for 26 years between 1959 and 1985 before going west to work with my denomination out there on a regional basis, then had a year and a half in Jamaica.

When I came to Welland in 1959, I found that there were many people who had gone through the experience of the Depression years and the early war years who were subjected to all sorts of exploitation and discrimination. Abuse is the only word that can be used for it. They worked hard to build up their unions and the churches worked with them, other community groups, and business people worked along with them to see that they had unions and the protection which unions could give.

Although the Niagara region has a high percentage of the population who are unionized, there were a lot who fell outside that. So those who enjoyed the benefit of union membership wanted to share that with other people within the community and they worked hard on the legislative front by electing representatives to various levels of government who would represent them and also by trying to see that laws were enacted which would give protection to the most vulnerable.

There are many stories that are very unappetizing of the kind of things that happened in those early days before people had unions, before they worked for those kinds of legislative changes, stories of people who would be forced to make their wives available to their foreman in order that they could preserve their jobs and be able to put food on the table for their families — virtual slavery in the situation. That's the kind of background that we come from.

We worked hard and we worked passionately to see that changes came about. As a pastor, on a daily basis I was having people come who were subjected to terrible conditions in their employment but who were unable to speak out safely because of threats and intimidation from employers. In order to protect their families they had to knuckle under to their bosses and not raise any complaints. So it was necessary to build some organizational, structural protection by which they would not be subjected to that, by which they could have protection.

We worked therefore in setting up different organizations, and I've listed those on the third page of my introductory remarks: a youth home; a cooperative nursery and day care centre; cooperative housing, and that's been well-established through Niagara Peninsula homes; Community Legal Services; Community Resource and Action Centre; Women's Place, all of which are dedicated to enhancing the wellbeing of people in community.

However, we are seeing increasingly these very important institutions in our society being undermined and destroyed. Just yesterday in the Welland paper it was noted that the housing help centre funding is being taken away by the provincial government. This means an agency which was helping people, the homeless people or people who were threatened with homelessness, that service is being taken away from them. The proposed changes to the employment standards legislation are just one more in a long series of attacks on the people of this province and this country.

We've been sitting through the hearings this morning and listening to various presentations, and I listened to everything that's said here from the point of view of the people who are subjected to that sort of attack. I myself, as I said, am presently unemployed because of cutbacks in the various agencies and areas. The type of work I have done all my life is even more badly needed than it has been, yet there isn't the funding to do it.

Yes, there is a new economy. I've heard that expression, a new world of work. But for those who are at the bottom of the economic scale, that new world of work does not bring any hope of a future. We meet people daily who are subjected to that situation. As I say, the changes that are proposed to the employment standards legislation seem to me potentially harming those very people for whom they were set up.

I would make the claim that far more is being done to destroy our country, Canada, by these actions of governments such as the Chrétien-Harris axis than by actions of separatists in the province of Quebec or anywhere else. The attack on our sovereignty as a highly respected country in the world family is coming from the fiscal and corporate separatists who are attempting to destroy the humane and caring social order we have built in Canada.

I've chosen my words carefully because the kind of separation that they are promoting, instead of the harmony of our society, which we have worked for over these years, the separation between the wealthy and the poor, those who are outcasts of this society and those who enjoy increasing affluence and increasing wealth, is doing more to destroy our country than any of the other things I've referred to.

It's because of my commitment to these ideals that I'm proud to be a part of the Golden Horseshoe Social Action Committee and that I'm pleased to be here today with my friend Mr Diffin, who has joined me in this presentation.

The brief of the Golden Horseshoe Social Action Committee is before you, and I think we'll just stop at this point in case there are any questions any of you have. Some people might have bits of disagreement with some of the things we've said.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We have four and a half minutes, so one and a half minutes per caucus, and this round of questioning will commence with the third party.

Mr Christopherson: A couple of quick questions. I want to thank you both for your presentation. I noted that much of yours, Mr Wright, dealt with the issues of the Judaeo-Christian values as they apply to society and how one constructs a society. I wanted your opinion on why you think so many churches in Ontario, churches that normally try to stay at arm's length from the formal political process, have been speaking out more and more about, quite frankly, a democratically elected government's use of their majority to take the province down a certain path. I know they don't do that lightly. Can you give me your thoughts on why you think that's happening?

Mr Wright: You certainly are right when you say it's not done lightly. It's because there is in the basis of our Judaeo-Christian heritage the whole concept that because of the sinful nature of humankind, there's a tendency for the rifts between the poor and the rich to develop greater and greater — the rich to get rich and the poor to get poor. So in the foundations of our faith, there's the principle of the year of jubilee, for instance, which is a time when everything will be redistributed, when there'll be an opportunity for everybody to start over again and sharing to take place.

Of course, in the New Testament, in the beginning of the Christian era, Jesus took up that concept and the whole concern for the poor. Those who were marginalized, in the terminology we use now, got priority. In the Roman Catholic Church, there is the emphasis on the preferential option for the poor, it's called, which is contained in the Scriptures, within the traditions, and it's this kind of motivation which is back of the emphasis which there is.

Just from a practical point of view, I've had ministers say to me they desperately need help because they've never experienced a situation where there was so much unemployment, so much hardship being experienced. They don't know how to deal with it. The various denominations are trying to give some guidance and support in that. I had a Roman Catholic priest who told me that within his congregation he has never seen so many middle-class, middle-income, middle-aged people who are leading lives of quiet desperation because their whole life is being destroyed by what's happening in our society.

Mr Baird: I listened very intently to your comments and I enjoyed your brief and appreciated the time you took to come out. I appreciate more than anything, though, the orange paper that clearly lists the groups that are members of your network. Often we don't find out whom people are speaking for, so I certainly appreciated that, everything ranging from retirees to religious and other social groups.

Maybe just a comment, if anything, on your presentation, as to what our motives are as a government. You mentioned briefly some broader political issues and economic issues and what not and the work you've done on them. Certainly our motivation is to try to turn the province around. We can certainly disagree, as I do with my friends on the committee, as to how we do that, but I think it's very important, just to respond to your comments, that it's very much our goal too.

We may go about it in very different ways, but certainly our goal is to create an Ontario that's prosperous, first and foremost one that creates jobs, because it's our very strong view that the best social program out there is a job. We realize that even a year after the election there are far too many people looking for work, and that's really the focus of many of our efforts. While we may share many of the end goals, maybe the means to the end are somewhat different, but that's very much our goal.

I think we all suffer, as a community, with economic and social programs and very much want to see them rectified. That's basically our motivation as a government. We spoke of the cuts. I don't know if there's a point to getting into a broader political debate. We have one way of doing it. We felt the way that was used, the status quo, wasn't working and that we had to try a different way. I suppose we'll be held accountable to that with the voters. Anyway, thank you very much for your presentation.

Mr Wright: Mr Diffin had a comment on that.

The Chair: I'm afraid Mr Baird used his whole time, so you can incorporate it in your answer to Mr Hoy, perhaps.

Mr Hoy: Perhaps we'll be able to do that. Thank you for your presentation. I appreciated it. It's a philosophical and realistic look at what's happening today as it pertains to this bill.

In my conversations particularly with nurses I find that the stress levels, they tell me, among the public are rising almost to a point of mental disabilities, so I appreciate much of what you said. If you care to make that last comment on the record, go ahead.

Mr Diffin: All I want to say is that I keep hearing, "We have to fix it." We don't agree with what you're doing. We think it's wrong, but you have the position to implement what you do. Are you willing to commit yourself? In a year or two years, if what you're doing doesn't work, will you try and fix it again or will you stay down the same path? Somebody's going to be right in this and somebody's going to be wrong. Are you going to be man enough to admit that you're wrong if you are wrong? I'll admit I'm wrong if I am.

Mr Baird: We're very fortunate that we not only have to admit it, but the ultimate judgement will be made by the people, rightly or wrongly. The people of Ontario will make the ultimate judgement as to whether we've been successful. I do hope though, taking your point well, that we have the courage to admit —

Mr Diffin: I don't want the people to make the decision. I want you to stand up and say that you are wrong. I'll say it if I'm wrong. You will say it if you're wrong.

Mr Baird: Agreed.

The Chair: Thank you both for taking the time to come before us here today.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 504

The Chair: The next group up will be the Canadian Auto Workers, Local 504. Good afternoon. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit between presentation time or questions and answers.

Mr Andrew Paterson: Thank you. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you. I will read through the brief. The brief is not as large as it appears. There are some logistics at the back that you can study at your leisure.

As an introduction, who are we? We are Local 504 of CAW Canada. We represent close to 2,000 families that have members working in the following companies: in Hamilton, Camco, Westinghouse and Brown Boggs; in Burlington, BIW Cable, Hoover, Fisher and Ludlow, Northrop Grumman and Tallman Bronze; and in Dundas, El-Met Parts. I have been the president of this local for some 15 years now. We, as a local, were chartered by the United Electrical Workers in 1937 and merged with CAW in 1993. As you can see, we've been around for almost 60 years.

We understand that our national organization, CAW Canada, has presented a comprehensive brief to this standing committee on resources development. We merely wish to add our support to the CAW brief in its entirety and present some simple views from the local's perspective.

History teaches us, or should teach us, that to understand changes to or introduction of legislation to govern a people, one should be conversant with the conditions extant during that period of change to allow for knowledgeable conclusion as to the necessity and/or justification of the action.

Our position: The written brief and the attendance before this committee are designed to clearly and unequivocally communicate our opposition to the contents of Bill 49. Our opposition to this proposed legislation is based on four crucial points of contention:

Bill 49 dismantles the long-standing guarantee found in the Employment Standards Act against any person contracting out of workplace standards.

Bill 49 seriously limits, and in some circumstances denies, workers access to justice and the proper enforcement of the standards that remain in the statute.

Bill 49 continues this government's destructive agenda of privatizing public services without regard to the consequences upon the community at large and the government's employees who are terminated from employment as a result.

Bill 49 fails to address the desperate need for progressive improvements to the current set of workplace standards found in the statute.

As a background to the circumstances we reproduce here, as you can see, a small synopsis from the Spectator as to the deterioration of real wages in the 1990s.

We now refer to Ontario's stagnant economy: Are labour laws really the problem? What is the rationale for weakening employment standards in Ontario as we approach the 21st century? Underlying the government's proposal is the claim by many businesses, although not all, that labour laws are impeding their efficiency and competitiveness and hence undermining business investment and employment. Relax the constraints and obligations governing employers, the argument goes, and they will be better able to thrive in the competitive marketplace. Investment, jobs and growth will be the payoff. Workers will have to do their jobs in less hospitable and less safe work environments, but at least more of them will be working.

Little evidence beyond the unsubstantiated claims of particular business leaders is offered, however, to support the argument that Ontario's labour laws and employment standards have in any measurable way stood in the way of higher employment or faster economic growth. Indeed, it is highly questionable that Ontario's economic problems have anything to do with the alleged lack of competitiveness and flexibility of business whatsoever.

Ontario's employers are already highly cost-competitive within the Canadian and continental marketplaces, at least with regard to labour costs. It is not a failure of competitiveness and profitability that is constraining our further growth. If anything, it is a failure of the business sector's success to spread through the rest of the economy that is holding back growth and employment. The further erosion of employment standards, by ultimately forcing workers to work harder and longer for less pay, can only exacerbate this problem.

There is a figure 1 on page 46 which indicates the already lopsided nature of the current economic recovery in Ontario. Since the trough in the last recession, Ontario's real GDP has grown at a sluggish annual rate of 3.1%. Only two major sectors of demand have grown faster than this annual rate: business investment in machinery and equipment, annual growth rate of 6.9%; and Ontario's booming exports, annual growth rate of 11.2%. These are the sectors of our economy that are most sensitive to considerations of cost-competitiveness, flexibility and profitability, and it has been in these sectors that our weak recovery has been rooted.

Domestic demand, on the other hand, has been weak and continues to act as a drag on further economic expansion. Consumer spending has grown more slowly than GDP as a whole. This is quite unusual, since consumer spending typically accelerates during the recovery phase of the business cycle. The government sector has been stagnant and during the past year has shrunk notably. Investment in housing and non-residential construction has collapsed. These domestic sectors of our economy, accounting for 85% of total demand, depend not so much on business competitiveness and flexibility as on wage and salary incomes, the taxes that are paid from those incomes and consumer confidence. These have all been undermined by downsizing and layoffs in both the private and public sectors and a continued atmosphere of impending doom among many consumers.

Other direct evidence verifies the enhanced competitiveness of Ontario on grounds of labour costs. As indicated in figure 2, which is attached, hourly total compensation costs, including wages, fringe benefits and payroll taxes, in Canada's manufacturing industry, centred in Ontario, are almost 10% lower than in the US. This represents an improvement of close to 20% since 1991, when an overvalued exchange rate priced Canada's manufacturers out of the newly unified FTA marketplace.

Indeed, the improvement in Canada's cost position is due primarily to the subsequent correction of the exchange rate to a more sustainable level. This suggests again that business leaders are barking up the wrong tree when they call for weaker labour laws in order to ease the competitive constraints they face. The big-ticket, macroeconomic issues such as exchange rates, interest rates and aggregate demand conditions are the dominant factors that deserve the main attention.

Within Canada, Ontario's labour cost-competitiveness has been almost exactly stable, again as illustrated in the attached figure 3. Real wages in Ontario have only kept pace with wages elsewhere in Canada; a continuing small but stable wage premium in Ontario of about 60 cents per hour reflects only the higher cost of living in this province, as well as the concentration of higher-productivity industries here. There is no evidence that changes to labour laws or employment standards enacted by previous provincial governments in any way undermined Ontario's cost-competitiveness within Canada. The recent rebound in Canadian manufacturing output, and to a lesser extent manufacturing employment, has been concentrated in Ontario-based industries, notably auto assembly and parts production. This further testifies to the continuing attractiveness of Ontario as a site for the location of mobile industries.

Perhaps the most notable feature of recent wage trends in Ontario, as well as in the rest of Canada, is the continued stagnation of real wage levels, a development unprecedented in post-war economic recoveries. As summarized in figure 4, real hourly wages in Ontario have increased by a feeble 0.7% since 1992. In contrast, the real value of output per employed person in Ontario, a standard measure of productivity, has grown by over 5% during the same period: over seven times as fast. If anything, workers are receiving far too small a share of the output they produce with greater efficiency year after year. Even many business economists now admit that this weakness in real wages is a dominant factor undermining growth. Weakening employment standards legislation so that for example some workers will no longer receive holiday pay for working on statutory holidays or that other workers will have greater difficulty obtaining back pay owed them by employers will only worsen this problem.

Growing productivity, enhanced competitiveness and stagnant wages — all this translates into a tremendously lopsided distribution of the gains of economic growth. As shown in figure 5, the growth of total wage and salary income has considerably lagged the growth in total GDP, growing by an average of 1.9% per year since 1991 versus 3.1% for GDP. It is little wonder that consumer spending has stagnated. Corporate profits, meanwhile, have exploded by an average of 17% per year during the same time. The argument that the corporate sector is shackled by burdensome regulations is completely at odds with the empirical evidence. Business is the only sector doing well in our present economy, and making things still easier for employers will hardly redress this imbalance.

In sum, what net impact will the erosion of employment standards have on the precariously unbalanced Ontario economy? Any purported improvements in the business sector will be more than outweighed by further weakness in wages and hence further weakness in both consumer spending, especially on big-ticket items like homes and cars, and income tax revenues. Domestic spending by consumers and government, and hence our overall economy, will continue to stagnate.

Of course, business leaders promise that more jobs will be created if their power over their employees is further enhanced. In responding to the demands of a competitive, stagnant marketplace, their lives are probably not made any easier by having to obey the rules and regulations governing fair employment practices. It is always easier to respond to competitive pressure by simply tightening the screws on the workforce than by developing more innovative products, new production methods, new marketing strategies etc. But the experience of the past five years has shown that business profitability and competitiveness do not translate automatically into a vigorous, well-rounded and sustainable economic recovery. Ontarians have been waiting a long time for the trickle-down effect; there is no reason to believe that undermining remaining legal protections in the workplace will do anything to hasten its arrival.

Given all of the above, the case has not been made for decreased protection but rather increased protection.

While we could agree that perhaps the preceding synopsis is all too short, we can reasonably conclude that if there was a need or rationale for change, a government with the welfare of its people as a priority would strengthen ESA rather than weaken it.

By the way, all of our employers named in our introduction are profitable; as a matter of fact, some of them have posted record profits each succeeding year in the 1990s and are heading for record profits in 1996.

We finish with just a thought: Confucius said, many years ago: "In a country well governed, poverty is something to be ashamed of. In a country badly governed, wealth is something to be ashamed of."

I thank you for your indulgence.

Mr Baird: Just a quick thank you for your presentation. I enjoyed particularly the charts in the back of your presentation, certainly something I'll take back.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. There are various economists around the country who pinpoint certain areas of why the economy is going bad, but I'll tell you one that a man on the street told me is causing problems in the economy. I had not met him in many years and I said, "How are you?" He said, "I'm an OPSEU worker and I don't know if I'm going to have a job in the future." That's stifling the economy somewhat.

Mr Christopherson: Andy, thanks very much for the excellent presentation. In the few seconds I have I would just underscore the last bullet point on page 2, where you note, "Bill 49 fails to address the desperate need for progressive improvements to the current set of workplace standards found in the statute." I think the message there is that yes, there need to be changes made to this law, but they need to be progressive changes, which this isn't. Indeed, what needs to happen is a reversal of Bill 49, which is going to take away some of the rights that are already in there now.

Mr Paterson: I thoroughly agree.

The Chair: Thank you again, Mr Paterson.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, LOCAL 3906

The Chair: That leads us to the next group, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 3906. Good afternoon.

Ms Catherine Hudson: Good afternoon. By way of introduction, my name's Catherine Hudson. I'm the president of CUPE Local 3906, which represents 1,500 teaching assistants and part-time instructors at McMaster University. I'm also chair of the Ontario University Workers Co-ordinating Committee, which represents about 15,000 CUPE university workers throughout the province in diverse occupational groups: physical plant, library workers, foodservices, support staff, teaching assistants, sessionals, part-time instructors.

I'm pleased to have the opportunity to make this brief presentation on Bill 49 and bring my concerns about this proposed legislation to your attention. I'll be looking at a specific aspect of this bill in the context of the Conservative agenda for Ontario.

I'll stray from what's written here to note with interest what I learned from the paper yesterday and today about certain proposals being temporarily withdrawn, as I understand it; that is, proposals that would allow employers and unions to negotiate standards for work hours, statutory holidays, overtime and severance. The minister apparently told the Legislative committee that while the provision is being dropped she still supports the idea and it will reappear later this fall when a more comprehensive review of the act is launched. She is quoted as saying, "Given that there will be a fuller discussion about the framework of employment standards during the upcoming review of the act, we believe this provision should be considered in the context of these future discussions." So clearly "temporarily withdrawn" is what I understand from the information here.

I'm going to speak specifically to those aspects of the proposed changes because I certainly think they will reappear in the fall. I would like to take the opportunity to urge the government and this committee not to reintroduce these particular aspects of the proposals in the fall. Currently the law forbids a collective agreement to maintain any provision that's inferior to the working conditions contained in the Employment Standards Act. This measure maintained a historic notion of an overall minimum standard of workplace rights for all workers. Prior to the enactment of legislation that regulated aspects of the workplace, employers and employees were governed by common law. Individual parties to an employment relationship were entitled to enter into any negotiated employment relationship that was not considered illegal. In practical terms, this meant that employers used their superior economic power to impose poor working conditions on their employees.

In the 19th century that started to change. A long time ago it was recognized by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario that this was a clear imbalance of power, and action was taken to begin, at least, the long, slow process of changing that imbalance of power by creating workplace standards in areas such as health and safety and minimum wages for women and children. Various pieces of minimum workplace standards legislation were consolidated ultimately into the current Employment Standards Act in 1968.

The philosophy behind the legislation grew with the inclusiveness of its statutory terms. The law accepted the inalienable right of all workers to labour in a workplace that provided minimum standards of decency. Thus, the legislation now provides basic employment standards for the vast majority of Ontario's workers relating to specifically minimum wages, maximum hours of work and overtime, public holidays, paid vacations and severance pay, among other items.

The Bill 49 proposals, which I'm given to understand have temporarily been put on hold, should they be reintroduced in this comprehensive overview, will erode this historic development in Ontario's labour law by permitting the workplace parties to contract out of important employment standards guarantees. The ESIA proposes to allow a collective agreement to override the legal minimum standards concerning all those aspects of work if the collective agreement "confers greater rights...when those matters are assessed together." Employers would be enabled to disregard this previous floor of rights and have the opportunity to attempt to manipulate such provisions as overtime pay, public holidays, vacation and severance pay in exchange, for example, for increased hours of work. This change, should it be brought back into the proposals, effectively would allow private parties to create a set of employment standards, a task traditionally — and for good reason — reserved for the Legislature.

The question — and this is one of many — of how labour unions and employers are to measure whether or not a negotiated agreement confers greater rights when assessed together is unanswered in the law which introduces the idea. This will become an issue in its own right. Collective agreements which already have enhanced rights could theoretically have concessions imposed on them and yet comply with the new ESA. Parties are being asked to value and compare non-monetary rights, such as hours of work, with purely monetary rights, such as overtime and severance, with mixed rights, such as vacation pay and public holidays.

Thus, by statute, concession bargaining is encouraged and as a result different parties, private parties, will be legislating different sets of employment standards rights for each workplace. What were formerly minimum benefits protected by law will now become permissible subjects for bargaining, labour board hearings, arbitration hearings, as well, of course, as strikes. This is a prescription for poor labour relations and increased conflict. In small bargaining units particularly, with relatively little bargaining strength, the erosion in minimum entitlements will negatively affect standards of living and working conditions for families throughout the province.

For university workers, these amendments, whether temporarily on hold or not, are particularly provocative. Universities are at the mercy of this government. The quality of mercy in this case has been very strained — to the tune of $400 million in cuts to the post-secondary sector so far. To date, the universities have responded by using the tools handed to them by this government, raising tuition as one example. I have no doubt that as employers the universities will also find that these amendments to the Employment Standards Act have handed them yet more tools with which to deal with the crisis invented by the government. Many of us are going into bargaining where we will find out whether or not the concessionary amendments to the ESA will be utilized.

In the context of the overall Conservative agenda this particular aspect of Bill 49 adheres faithfully to the philosophy of privatization, as do other aspects that I'm not addressing here. Employment standards will be privatized since this piece of legislation provides no basic floor of rights on the issues I've highlighted. Bill 49, in some of its other aspects, also coincides with this government's desire to downsize itself and leave matters previously held to be public in the hands of private interests — specifically employers' interests. Government is apparently no longer interested in guaranteeing basic workplace standards for working people. Working people will now have to negotiate those standards for themselves, to the best of their ability and collective strength.

In Bill 49, as in previous legislation such as Bill 7 and the comprehensive enabling legislation of Bill 26, the government has shown clearly that it has no interest in furthering the public good of the many; it has aligned itself firmly with the private gain of a few. In this respect, it is redefining the role of government as it has existed in Ontario for many decades.

To conclude briefly, in the proposed amendments to the Employment Standards Act, as in other legislative changes already completed or contemplated by this government, we are indeed seeing a revolution turning back to the 19th century.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. We don't have much time here for questions, but I noted that you said there would be different sets of employment standards rights for each workplace. If that is the case, would there not over time be a domino effect where eventually we could move to the lowest denominator of employment standards?

Ms Hudson: Clearly, and I think that would clearly be the effect.

Mr Hoy: That's of concern?

Ms Hudson: Obviously of concern, and I'm speaking from the position of a unionized group, to the non-unionized employees, I think collective agreements may be, through this concessionary encouragement by statute, negotiated down to non-union and the general level should decline, I would think.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Catherine, for an excellent presentation. I wanted to ask you about the middle paragraph on page 5 where you state that "the government has shown clearly that it has no interest in furthering the public good of the many. It has aligned itself firmly with the private gain of a few." Could you expand on that in the few moments that we have?

Ms Hudson: In a few moments I don't know how much I could expand on that. I think I addressed this more specifically in my Bill 26 presentation, where it seems that the downloading of the agenda of downsizing itself seems to be specifically aimed at the private good of a small minority.

Generally speaking, if the public services are cut and more privatization takes place, the trickle-down effect is clearly to the vast majority of people, whether they feel it in the form of non-access to services through user fees or the non-existence of services. Try to get through on some of those phone lines, for instance, if you're a parent looking for support from a delinquent spouse. These kinds of things are just disappearing, and they affect broad numbers of people. Who do they benefit? Ultimately, who benefits by this? It's very difficult to see, in the case of this specific amendment to the ESA, who benefits other than employers, and the greater benefit will go to the larger and more powerful on the whole.

Mr Derwyn Shea (High Park-Swansea): You begin with an interesting background of the history, and I appreciate having that put before us. Behind this I have the submission made by the information technology group yesterday in Toronto. As I listen to your presentation, something that I'm troubled by, and I've heard it again more this morning, is the difficulty — I can relate to the arguments that you're putting forward and I can empathize with them in part as they relate to traditional kinds of employment. One can talk in terms of whether you're on the smelter floor, whether you're in the sawmill, wherever you may be, or university office, but there's a significant change taking place.

Like Mr Christopherson, I'll turn you to page 5, because the phrase that suddenly hit me against what they had said was "workplace standards," and indeed the whole issue of "workplace" is now becoming a major concern. The minister is trying to sort of read the future as change of work takes place, and I'm wondering how you address that, because the attempt to deal with what you call concession bargaining is trying to recognize the fact of the traditional modes of labour changing, and the traditional ways of interpreting the standards of employment also being attacked. How do we deal with that in a way that recognizes distance work?

Ms Hudson: Many of my members are engaged in delivering distance education. What standards don't change are standards that people need to pay the rent, need to be able to pay for the groceries. Whether they do that by working out of an office in their basement or they do it by working on the shop floor, guaranteed minimum standards must exist. And I haven't even addressed the issue of enforcement, which is a whole other thing. Whose responsibility is it to guarantee to the public that there are minimum employment standards? In my view and in the historic behaviour and interpretation of government's own role in this province, it has been the government's developed responsibility to guarantee minimum workplace standards.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We appreciate you coming before us here today.

ED GOULD

The Chair: That brings us to Mr Ed Gould as the next presenter. Good afternoon.

Mr Ed Gould: Good afternoon. I'd like to thank the committee for giving me this time. My brief will probably be brief. I don't have much detail; I have four pages here. I'm just here today representing myself. I'm not paid by any business group or union. I'm here on behalf of my family. With what I've been reading in the papers lately and looking over different notes, I think what this government plans to do with these changes to the standards act is just terrible.

Anyway, there was no day care today, so I had to bring this fellow up here. He's the future. So I'm a little bit upset at that. I can understand why some of the women with no day care can't participate. The other thing is that I don't see anything here on this agenda about evening. I had to take time off work to come here today. Unfortunately, my daughters and my wife had to work and their employers wouldn't let them have time off. So I can definitely see how this standards act could be changed and could be detrimental to the workers of this province in the future.

I'm also here because when I first called up to make some time, I realized that the Niagara region was basically cut out. There was no time given or dates or anything in the region of Niagara, and there's over 400,000 people there. But like I said, I'm just here today representing myself and my family.

Bill 49, as far as I'm concerned — I've got the act here; I was going through it. It would be nice if they put it in plain English, just plain English. Common sense would be plain English. Could you tell Mike that — plain English? Because it would be nice for us plain people.

Anyway, I'd like to say that basically Bill 49 would weaken workers' rights all across Ontario. Big, powerful corporations that make profits, that have the dollar advantage, along with the law firms to back them up when it comes to stepping on workers on the shop floors and across the hallways of the offices — I believe the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Elizabeth Witmer, is wrong when it comes to the Employment Standards Act and making any kind of changes. It took many years for workers to build on the previous act, and I hope this one doesn't pass.

I can just see by going through this here right now that you're putting a ceiling on claims. I don't know if you're a worker or not, but when you don't have money, it's pretty upsetting. If you can afford a lawyer, you're stuck with somebody else defending for you. Maybe they decided to defend for a little less. I notice there's something about a cap at $10,000, rather than the whole amount. I notice that you're trying to squeeze the time from two years to six months, which I believe is basically really inappropriate, considering looking at the Small Claims Court. Really, can this be true that workers deserve less? Is this government willing to give us less protection as workers? It's shame on you.

I actually believe that you should be stepping forward into the future and looking at the common sense. The common sense would tell us not longer hours of work, but shorter hours of work. You can obviously see if 300 workers working three shifts could be combined into 200 workers working two shifts, it would be a net loss of 100 jobs. It will be hard to explain that there will be 100 people out of work because other workers are working 12-hour shifts or 10-hour shifts. I believe the unemployment in this province is a shame and a shambles. You've got the 10% unemployed out there looking for jobs. I think it's this government's duty to actually shorten the workweek to 32 hours, which would better shorten the UI lines in this province. The old 48-hour week hasn't worked. A mandated reduction by this government would immediately, at once, put thousands of Ontarians back to work — thousands — and the level playing field would be 32 hours a week.

I believe this government is playing fastball in a pool of sharks. We as workers are being left in the water without a life support system to defend our rights. Shame on you again. What about the persons who can't defend themselves because of human barriers? I see nothing in this bill about that at all.

The word "housekeeping": That's a shame. It's just a new buzzword which is only a play on words by this government concerning the Employment Standards Act.

This word is being used to reduce workers' rights in this province by the Mike Harris government. Shame on you again. And let me tell you something. If I was to tell you today that tomorrow you're coming to work at 4 o'clock and you don't have an option, what would you do today? Can you answer that question? Because my daughters are going through this right now, for all this part-time work that you guys are making.

Again, you want to decrease the size of government; you're going to leave a pool of workers out there trying to defend themselves with millions of dollars lost in wages. I can personally sit at this table here and talk about incidents with my daughters and my entire life.

And now you want to turn it over to private collection agencies that will charge money to find money that I already should get? It's a shambles. It's a disgrace.

Like I said before, I'm sitting here for my family. They couldn't be here today because they couldn't get time off work. I don't see that in the bill there, where it says I can demand time off for family activities or even coming here today and speaking on this.

What about public holidays? Under the past, at least you had them. What about the protection for any worker who doesn't want to work Canada Day? Would you defend Canada Day off, with the employer saying, no, you are going to work Canada Day? Can you answer that today?

Where's the protection for employees who are abused concerning shifts? I also believe that the crimes that some of these corporations are leaving in businesses to individual employees, the fines are not big enough. I think they should be tripled so they'll stop doing it.

It's only the government with law and order that's able to enforce Ontario labour laws. What you're doing as a government is you're putting the wolves in charge of the chicken coop. That's what you're doing. And that's my short brief.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Gould, for your presentation. We had someone earlier who came forward saying they didn't represent any particular organization, either corporate association or union, but did go on to espouse the virtues of this bill. It's good to see a private citizen come forward and make the similar case that they don't represent anyone other than their own family.

I think it's also, quite frankly, sir, a good example and lesson for the government members to begin to see some of the frustration that is beginning to take hold as the lack of common sense in the Common Sense Revolution is beginning to become clearer and clearer to the general population.

I don't know that I have any particular questions for you, other than to say that there's very little you said that I and my colleagues don't agree with in terms of the impact of the overall agenda that this government has for the people of Ontario and its implications for the average working person and their family. All I can say to you quite frankly is that we will continue to share those beliefs and will continue to do what we can.

You talked about the lack of the legislation helping you and your family to be here today. You need to know that this government not only thought this was only minor housekeeping; they didn't think this bill was important enough to have public hearings. They were going to ram it through in a few weeks before the summer recess of the Legislature and it was only because we pushed them and embarrassed them and forced them to admit that there's more here than just minor housekeeping that we even got these public hearings. So there's a lesson to be learned in terms of the process around Bill 49, not just the substance. I thank you, sir, for taking the time and making your deputation the way you have.

1430

Mr O'Toole: Thank you, Mr Gould, for your sincere presentation. I sense a degree of frustration. I just want to ask a couple of specific things and maybe draw some things to your attention, outside of rhetorical comments.

In the act, those workplaces that have a collective agreement would not be able to negotiate less than the current standard collectively, when you look at it. When you're looking at overtime entitlements, it could mean time off in lieu, depending on the workplace, which could address the issue of your daughters and your family needs and individual needs, as opposed to setting provincial standards that "thou must."

Many workplaces are changing, would you agree, today? Firemen work 12-hour shifts; police, nursing, public service, the service sector industries, universities — I'm not sure what they've been doing for the past four months. My daughter goes to university. She only goes six months. I'm not sure what they're all doing for the other six months. Do you understand? The world of work is drastically changing. Would you make that concession?

Mr Gould: I would certainly say that it's changing, but not for the better, sir. I would also like to remind you —

Mr O'Toole: No. We've only been in for a year. We're trying to improve it.

Mr Gould: — I'm not speaking here on behalf of unions. My daughters do not work in any unionized facility. They work in places where they can't stand up to their employer now because their shifts are changed daily. They don't know next week what they're working. They don't know whether they're working the holidays. That's why I'm here. I'm upset. They couldn't come here today because, I'll tell you, one of them would rip the skin off your back.

Have you ever been terminated at 9 o'clock in the morning on Friday? You go in, everything's peachy, and then that's it on Friday morning. Then you've got to go through and find lawyers and you've got to go through the department, which quite frankly wasn't good enough in the past.

Mr O'Toole: It's frustrating, there's no question about it. I guess the other thing I wanted to talk —

Interruption.

The Chair: Sir, that's the last outburst I will tolerate from you.

Mr O'Toole: I have five children and they're all working. In fact, they were laid off and the rest of it too. It's difficult. There aren't enough jobs.

Your point I would like to perhaps pursue there would be, you mentioned a 32-hour week, which is widely touted in much of the labour literature you read. Would you be prepared to take a proportional reduction in pay? Let's say, as an employer — and I think unions have a challenge to examine alternative work week arrangements.

For sure, job security, that's their mandate. I worked in a workplace, and I'll tell you, if you took one hour's overtime entitlement away from the employee, you'd be in trouble. They want the 48 and 50 hours a week. I've worked for a large company, both hourly and salary, and if you were to entitle people to 32 hours a week — what's happened in the last 30 years since employment standards is, both members of the family are working, and they're working to pay the taxman to keep the social system and all the other demands of society in place.

So it's changing. I think you have to look at it realistically. The world of work is changing, and the regulations that guide that through the process have to respond.

Mr Hoy: I want to thank you for your presentation today. I did take note that you are concerned with the cap at $10,000 as a maximum. It gives me concern as well. We had a presentation the other day where the people were owed $23,000, not executive-type employees. It was suggested that perhaps those were the only type of wage earners who would go over that cap, so it's clearly not the case. People on incomes substantially less than what we'll call the executive wage can make claims for more and have in the past made claims for more than $10,000.

As well, there's been a great deal of concern about the enforcement of the act. I think, clearly, from your statements, that would be something that you would want, and certainly from your whole presentation, one can see that you are interested in maintaining minimum standards. I appreciate your comments.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Gould, for taking the time to come before us here today. We appreciate it.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, LOCAL 1005

The Chair: The next group up will be the United Steelworkers of America, Local 1005. Good afternoon, gentlemen. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit. I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter, please.

Mr Bob Sutton: I'm Bob Sutton, chairperson of the committee. This is Gary Howe.

Mr Gary Howe: Local 1005, United Steelworkers of America represents over 10,000 active and retired members at Stelco's Hilton works in Hamilton. On behalf of these members, the local is pleased to have the opportunity to present our concerns regarding the proposed changes to the Employment Standards Act as proposed by the Minister of Labour in Bill 49.

When introducing Bill 49 on May 13, Labour Minister Elizabeth Witmer made the following statement: "...encourage the workplace parties to be more self-reliant in resolving disputes and make the act more relevant to the needs of today's workplace." She also stated, "They will also focus ministry attention on helping the most vulnerable workers." Nothing can be further from the truth than these statements.

The changes proposed — and they are major changes — will clearly benefit employers and deny justice to both unionized and non-unionized employees in this province. There is nothing in these proposed changes that will protect the rights of the most vulnerable workers. The changes will, however, make it easier for employers to deprive workers of their basic rights. The existing employment standards, which we consider minimal, have protected Ontario workers for several decades.

Mr Sutton: I want to comment here that in putting this brief together, our local's PAC only commented on a few of the issues. Quite frankly, we just don't have time in 15 minutes to present all of our concerns, so we've kept things short and are just dealing with a few issues. Go ahead, Gary.

Mr Howe: One of the major concerns that the local has with Bill 49 is the fact that it will allow companies to pressure unions to negotiate away minimum standards, providing the contract provides greater rights when all standards are assessed together. Will severance pay be negotiated away during good times, when workers feel they will never have to depend on it? This amendment will also allow employers to pressure unions to negotiate away rights which many new employees may be expecting to be part of their employment contract.

Mr Sutton: I want to comment on this too. A person takes a job and they can pick up the Employment Standards Act and they know what they should have at the workplace. However, if you switch jobs, maybe get a little better wage increase or you change jobs for a reason, you work there for five or six months and it gets to be summer, they're really busy and all of a sudden you find, "Hey, the union here has agreed to seven days a week work when we're busy," and you've got no way to balance your family and work life. There are just things you've grown to expect that may not be there, thanks to this kind of a bill.

Mr Howe: One of the most bitter strikes in recent Ontario history was the Radio Shack-Steelworkers' strike in 1981. One of the main issues of this first-contract strike was a wage increase of 10 cents an hour above minimum wage. If 10 cents an hour over minimum wage can be such a major issue, it would be easy to see all of the other standards, such as vacations, hours of work, statutory holidays and severance pay, becoming major bargaining issues as many employers try to reduce these basic rights. If Bill 49 is passed, Ontario will be the only province which will allow basic employee rights to be negotiated to below the legislated minimum.

Mr Sutton: Just on this Radio Shack strike, if, for instance, they were successful in getting a dime, that would be $200 a year. What would be stopping Radio Shack from also putting on the bargaining table, "Hey, we're going to take away the minimum vacation?" At that time, it was less than $4 an hour minimum wage; that would only be $160. "So you guys can have a dime raise, providing you give up a week of your vacation." That's the sort of thing that's going to be wide open, and there will be all kinds of bitter disputes over it.

Mr Howe: Unions may in the future, when trying to achieve some improvements to employment standards, find themselves being met with an employer demand to reduce one of the other standards to below the provincial minimum. The changes proposed in Bill 49 will cause greater labour-management conflict, rather than harmony.

Presently, the act allows an individual to make a complaint under the Employment Standards Act which is handled by the employment standards branch. The adjudication system is without cost to the parties. The orders are enforced by the legal department of the Ministry of Labour. An individual is free to file complaints with the employment standards branch without the approval, assistance or financial help from their union. The complaint is handled by the regional employment standards officer, who has the investigatory powers, who can conduct an inspection, audit or examination. The employment standards officer may attempt to mediate a settlement or make a binding decision on the matter in dispute. The system also permits unions to choose when they wish to devote time and resources to assisting employees in the resolution of alleged employment standards violations.

Bill 49 changes this. An employee covered by a collective agreement is not entitled to file a complaint. The complaint must be processed by the union through the collective agreement, grievance and arbitration procedure. The bill contemplates that an arbitrator paid by both the union and an employer will have all the powers now exercised by the employment standards officers, referees and adjudicators. This, unfortunately, is inaccurate. Arbitrators do not have the investigatory capability of the employment standards branch and will not be able to match the consistency of results that the act has had under public enforcement.

Mr Sutton: Just to show you something here, I've got a press release dated September 4, 1994. It's on the last page of the brief. I'll read the fourth paragraph:

"Under the Employment Standards Act, an employment standards officer has the right to request and receive access to any business records, including all payroll and employment records, that are now related to an investigation of a possible violation of the act."

Is this government prepared to let the unions have that kind of power, that we can walk in and look at our companies' business records? I don't think so, but it's something you've got to keep in mind, because we don't have that kind of power or ability and we can't pursue those kinds of complaints.

Mr Howe: The provincial government, in proposing this change, is not assisting the individual in a case where the union does not have the capability and resources to litigate protracted cases under the collective agreement and Employment Standards Act. These proposed changes do nothing to improve the employees' position where the employer is insolvent or bankrupt and does nothing to restore the recovery amount under the employee wage protection plan, which has already been dramatically reduced by the Conservative provincial government.

For our union, the change from an individual complaint to a union's responsibility to enforce the act poses a real challenge and probable tremendous hardship on unions. The financial, legal and human resource burden on managing every employment standard complaint could be monstrous. The failure by the union to properly address every complaint could also result in a duty-of-fair-representation complaint before the Ontario Labour Relations Board. The government is shifting the cost now borne by the employment standards branch to investigate, settle or determine complaints to unions, without financial help from the government.

Mr Sutton: You'll notice here we also put another press release from the ministry, dated December 11, 1995. It talks about a company that owed 100 workers approximately $5,000 each. That's in unpaid wages, termination and vacation pay, so this was the employees' money. It went to court by the ministry. It was appealed. It was appealed a couple more times and it took seven years to settle. How many unions, especially in a plant-closing situation of 100 people, could afford to go through the court system for seven years?

It's not going to fit together. The unions, especially the smaller unions, can't afford to take on those kinds of cases. Everything that's proposed, whether it goes through arbitration, the arbitrator is going to end up in the same place, where his decisions can be appealed too. You guys are right out to lunch with your ideas.

Mr Howe: In conclusion, Local 1005's political action committee must state that no one concerned with fair treatment of workers or citizens could support the proposed amendments contained in Bill 49. The amendments will harm the rights of the most vulnerable employees, reduce the level of possible compensation and allow employers to escape their employment obligations.

The Chair: There's a minute and a half per caucus. The questioning this round will start with the government members.

Mr Tascona: I'd just like to comment on a couple of matters. I have some experience in labour relations and in fact I was an employment standards officer at one time. I'd just like to comment on your remarks with respect to the September 15, 1994, press release in terms of the powers of the union. If a union is at a hearing in front of an arbitrator, they always have the power to subpoena documents, they have the power to ask an order from the referee, and those powers haven't changed. They'll have access to that information, so the powers are there for the union.

With respect to —

Mr Sutton: Can I comment on that?

Mr Tascona: I'm just going to comment on your comments, because you do have the rights.

With respect to severance pay, you should be aware right now that the Employment Standards Act allows a union to contract out of severance pay minimum standards. That has been in the act for many years and that's not something that is new, and in fact it has been a system that has worked very well with respect to plant closures and allowing unions to get fair settlements, and they actually represent their workers to get the severance pay. So that's been in there, that you can actually contract out of the minimum standards.

I'd like to also comment on your remarks with respect to insolvency. If the federal government would act and strengthen the Bankruptcy Act, then there would be greater protection for the workers, because 67% of the claims aren't paid out because of insolvent employers. I share that view with you, but the thing is you can't ask the province to fund something that the federal government should be doing.

With respect to the large manufacturing case, I had some involvement with that case with respect to one of the parties — it wasn't the directors or it wasn't the employer, but I will say this: That was the only initiative that the government could do, because they had to go after the directors. Because the company was insolvent, they went after the directors. Very difficult case, but it started off at the lower level and went to the Court of Appeal, and we've heard from the garment workers that that's what the employers do out there. They go bankrupt, so the only avenue we have is to go after the directors, and we did that.

Mr Sutton: It's nice that you did that, but you're asking the union to do that on their own?

Mr Tascona: Go to the federal government and make them change the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr Sutton: We've got as good a chance of going after the provincial government.

Mr Tascona: You've got another government. Go ask them.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation today. We kind of walked into the conversation of disclosure from the company to the union in certain situations. I have some experience at disclosures of information and I can't go into that, it would take too long. But a lot of times certain information was blacked out and wasn't provided, in order to protect the competitive nature of that business with another. So I can understand your feelings in this regard, that they want to have some privacy in the competitiveness that evolves, and then also your comments about complaints on union representation before the Ontario Labour Relations Board. I noted that as well.

Mr Christopherson: I want to thank you both for your presentation. Consistent with the history of Local 1005, and I notice you're celebrating your 50th anniversary, you're in the forefront in this community of fighting for not just organized workers but unorganized workers too.

I just want to point out that the government has done this before on the issue of the bankruptcy and that unions ought to go to the federal government. In fact, yesterday there were a couple of times when the government, in my opinion, was trying to blame a union representative for not going after the federal government rather than accepting their own culpability in slashing away, as you point out in your document, the employee wage protection plan which was there already in place, and they took it away when they came into power. So I feel they continue to have absolutely no credibility on that issue, and I think they ought to be ashamed of themselves for suggesting either going to the federal government or somehow the unions haven't done their job because they have decided to take away a right that was already there.

1450 I want to ask you one quick question. Local 1005 is still the leading labour organization in our community, and you can stand up for yourselves any time, anyplace, anywhere and have and always will. I believe one of the reasons they pulled back from the encouragement to concessionary bargaining was that they were hoping the unions like yours would back away and leave the unorganized out there struggling on their own. Can you tell me why that's not going to happen, why it's important for an organized local like yours, a leading local, to fight for unorganized workers?

Mr Sutton: One really clear example in Hamilton Dofasco's a non-union plant. However, everything we have the employees at Dofasco have, the same wage, same benefits, same everything else. It's important that stays that way because it keeps the two steel industries competitive, as well as the fact that that's the way Dofasco keeps the union out. We have to speak for ourselves and, unfortunately, we have to speak for Dofasco workers too.

The Chair: Thank you both for taking the time to come before us here this afternoon. We appreciate it.

NIAGARA SOUTH SOCIAL SAFETY NETWORK

The Chair: The next group up is the Niagara South Social Safety Network. Good afternoon. Again we have 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit, if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter, please.

Mr Don Comi: My name is Don Comi. On my left is Connie Grundy and on my right is Nancy Bousfield. We are all members of the Niagara South Social Safety Network. Thank you for allowing us to make a presentation today. I have a comment I would like to make at the end of it.

The Niagara South Social Safety Network is a body of individuals and groups who have joined together to assist one another. We assist one another not only with direct and immediate help but also by working collectively to change unjust conditions and so enhance the quality of life for ourselves and others. A basic concern of ours has been the effect of downsizing and cutbacks on people within our communities. We are committed to working in solidarity with each other in the struggle against unjust social conditions and to working towards positive social change in our community.

We are also committed to realizing the principles of healthy communities. Healthy communities are characterized by wide community participation and the involvement of the social, health, economic and environmental sectors in working towards the goal of a healthy community. Access to a satisfying job and a decent wage are basic to a healthy community. Our commonsense observation is reinforced by the research literature that strongly and clearly relates the health of our people and the health of our economy.

Full employment is basic to a healthy community. A major component of healthy communities is the provision of free collective bargaining within an environment which provides safe and fair working conditions. It is well known that when such basic employment standards are enforced working people will be protected from social and economic injustice and society will be healthier and the economy will flourish.

We are therefore greatly concerned about changes proposed to the Employment Standards Act which are being initiated under the guise of deficit cutting and debt reduction, but which we feel are actually designed to augment already excessive profits of multinational corporations and, even more fundamental, remove controls over the ever-increasing power of these corporations who determine the wellbeing of governments and the people they represent. In addition, we are concerned about shortsighted small businesses who support further deregulation of employment standards without thought to the harm this will do to the profit levels when workers' incomes are lowered and working conditions are harsh.

To understand the present situation more adequately, it is necessary to be reminded of how the present employment standards came into being. As industrialization developed in Canada, in common with other nations, exploitation of working people increased. Power was concentrated in the hands of owners and, as enterprises grew even larger, the personal element was removed from relationships. This distancing in human relationships made it easier for exploitation to develop.

As the union movement grew and as more progressive representatives were elected to parliaments, people worked with increasing enthusiasm towards the humanizing of the social and economic order. A major component of that movement was the development of a code of minimal standards to be followed in the workplace and procedures for enforcing those standards. In 1977, under the Progressive Conservative government of that time, the employment standards legislation was passed which pulled together under one act a number of employment standards.

The experience of people within our membership indicates that present employment standards still tend to be biased in favour of employers. What is needed is not weakening but enhancing protection for workers, especially those of minority status, immigrants, women and workers represented by smaller or weaker unions.

We feel that the changes being proposed to the employment standards legislation will in fact increase rather than decrease the exploitation of working people by unscrupulous employers. This drastic regressive step, along with cuts in social services and changes in labour legislation, will lead us back into the harsh conditions experienced during the previous 1930s Depression. We therefore urge you to reconsider the proposed changes and instead put in place legislation which will enhance the wellbeing of the citizens of this province.

An example of how this plays out in personal life is described below. Contrary to commonly held myth, people want to work. They want real jobs. In this time of high unemployment, workers are already vulnerable to abuse by employers. The labour ministry tends to be weak in standing up to employers for the rights of labour, let alone reducing their role further. Non-unionized workers in particular often have no other recourse. We know of a situation in which employees who are mechanics are not being paid fairly according to current legislation regarding overtime and holiday pay.

The following is another example of injustices to employees and danger to the public. A large, multinational company has bought out and amalgamated smaller, locally operated bus lines. Some bus drivers have been hired back at reduced wages. The bus company now operates about 95 school buses, many of which are aging. It has very recently been advertising to hire mechanics at below-average wages. About three people will be responsible for maintaining the fleet of buses, one or two of whom will be licensed mechanics.

However, we know experienced licensed mechanics are unwilling to accept this heavy workload at these below-average wages. They say the company will not find experienced, qualified mechanics at these wages. Yet these people have a responsibility for maintaining a very large fleet of vehicles in which our school children are transported. Finding qualified employees to ensure the safety of children should be a top priority. This example illustrates the dangers of privatization and deregulation.

It is also unfair to hold the mechanics responsible for the safety of vehicles when employers hire an insufficient number to maintain a fleet. They may not even get to inspect or work on that particular vehicle. Yet if a person on social assistance or unemployment turns down such a job offer, they may lose their benefits. If they quit because of an unsafe workload, they may not be entitled to UI. And what of the likelihood of intervention and assistance if they complain about their employer to a labour ministry that is weakening employment standards still further? Where do they go?

We would also point out that the decision to implement workfare further endangers effective implementation of humane employment standards. Programs being proposed leave greater possibilities for exploitation of people who are at the bottom of the economic scale, unable to fend for themselves in many ways and forced to place themselves at the mercy of supervisors of projects whose primary aim will be to get the most work out of the employees with the least possible safeguarding of working conditions. We need work, not workfare. We need safe, decent working conditions at a living wage with the protection of free collective bargaining.

There are other alternatives. In particular, we would urge you to give consideration to the proposals put forward by the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives who in their Alternative Budget have shown that debt reduction can be achieved as well as greater self-reliance with greater control by Canadians over their economic wellbeing without reduction of social programs. This can be achieved by committing our economy to measures such as full employment policies, along with a fair taxation system.

The housekeeping changes proposed for the Employment Standards Act are in fact another thrust of the wedge set in place by Bill 7, aimed to bring Ontario in line with the structural adjustment programs being imposed on governments by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund for the giant transnational corporations whose agents they are.

Specifically we reject the notion that the proposed changes will increase self-sufficiency and flexibility for anyone except employers. There is in our society an increasing reliance of employers on low-wage, part-time and casual employment, especially for younger people. Workers such as women, immigrant groups and unskilled or semi-skilled employees are often without union protection and are therefore particularly susceptible to unscrupulous, unhealthy and dangerous conditions set down by employers.

By contracting out enforcement and collection processes, such workers are put at a great disadvantage. Workers' livelihoods and wellbeing are much too precious to be put up for ransom to privateers whose sole concern is maximizing their financial profits.

By including employment standards within the collective bargaining process, badly needed resources of unionized working people are tied up with this process and not what they should be doing. Rather, the establishment and maintenance of such standards are rightfully a responsibility of the whole community, working through the democratic process to set in place policies which will safeguard workers' rights. Similarly, those who do not have the protection of union organization will be in much more vulnerable situations.

This applies also to the proposed shortening of the period of time for laying complaints and processing them. The most vulnerable in society become even more susceptible to abuse from a system over which they have decreasing control, as well as decreased protection from that abuse. It is our understanding that the justice system is working towards a unified two-year limitation date. We support a two-year limitation period for all legal matters. We do not support a six-month period which denies workers fair access to due process.

The kind of intimidation which legislation of this sort brings into employer-employee relationships drastically increases a sense of insecurity, the potential for greatly increased suspicion and friction between employers and employees, results in increased labour unrest, productive inefficiency and contributes to general economic decline. Increased labour unrest leads to productive inefficiency resulting in general economic decline.

In closing, we urge you as strongly as we possibly can to abandon your proposals to set the clock back in regard to employment standards legislation. Groups within our network, including community outreach workers, other community activists and unions are committed to resisting draconian dehumanizing changes to our Employment Standards Act and to establishing a process for education and advocacy which will encourage and facilitate informing workers of their rights and acting with them to correct the many injustices which are bound to result from this legislation. Thank you.

I'd like to make one other comment. I made this comment to the committee that was holding hearings on the CPP, changes to the legislation: It seems that every day Ontarians in particular are being hit with changes and cuts by the federal government, the provincial government, the municipal government, the regional governments — every day. It's like a fire truck going down a road and every building on the street is on fire and, "Which one do we try to put out first?" It's you guys who are lighting the fire. Maybe it's time we took your matches away.

The Chair: That leaves us about 30 seconds per caucus to make a brief statement. Let's see, it would be the official opposition can start the round this time.

Mr Lalonde: Just a quick question. You stated on page 5: "Some bus drivers have been hired back at reduced wages. The bus company now operates about 9 school buses, many of which are aging."

Mr Comi: Right.

Mr Lalonde: That's practically impossible because they supervise this very closely.

Mr Comi: Who does?

Mr Lalonde: The ministry. You're not allowed to have a school bus on the road that has more than so many years; I believe it's five or six years. I could tell you that I'm definitely in favour of workfare for those who are capable of going back to work. That is the 30 seconds.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for an excellent presentation. I appreciate it very much.

With the very short time I have I'll just point out that one of the things you say that I think is extremely profound is also supported by somebody on the other side of the ledger. You say, and I quote: "In this time of high unemployment, workers are already vulnerable to abuse by employers. The labour ministry tends to be weak in standing up to employers for the rights of labour, let alone reducing their role further."

Yesterday we heard from the Markham Board of Trade, which proudly said, "The Markham Board of Trade applauds the government's decision to significantly reduce its role in the administration and enforcement of the Employment Standards Act." There's no need to question whether or not what you are saying is the reality and the truth; it's very clear for everyone to see. Thank you very much for being here today.

Mr Baird: I appreciate the time you took to prepare your submission and for coming today. Just a quick remark, though, on your last comment about governments of all parties at all levels. All three parties in this province have governed the province over the last 10 years and have gone through difficult times. Local and municipal governments are doing the same thing. These governments are all elected by the people who reside there, and I think there are many problems; you mentioned the CPP problem. People have elected governments of all parties, Conservative included, that have done a bad job of managing this province and many jurisdictions within it. To ignore the problems that are there and just hope they'll go away is not the answer. I think there's an earnest attempt by all parties — I know the two previous governments certainly took some very difficult decisions to deal with those problems, and that's certainly our motivation. I just want to put that on the table, because I appreciate the angst that it's causing.

Mr Comi: I'd like to comment on that.

The Chair: Very briefly, please.

Mr Comi: If you check your own records you'll find there are many corporations that have not paid their taxes for many years, that have deferred taxes; but, damn it, if you go and collect those taxes off those people and if they don't pay their taxes, take their business. If I don't pay my taxes, the city of St Catharines will come and take my home. If the government does not have the gumption, for lack of a better word, to get off their butts and collect the taxes that are owing, then it's time they started looking at something else instead of hurting the little guy. The corporations that are profiting — these are profiting corporations that are making billions of dollars a year — are not paying their fair share. It's time they did. If the taxes were collected there would be no deficit; there would be no debt.

The Chair: Thank you for your comments. We appreciate your making a presentation today. Is Mr Hart in the room? No.

Interjection.

PETER CASSIDY

The Chair: I'm aware of the scenario, thank you, Mr Cassidy, but I just figured I'd ask once. In the absence of an answer you're welcome to take his place, as it were, so please join us. We have 15 minutes for you to divide between presentation and question-and-answer period.

Mr Peter Cassidy: Mr Hart was unable to attend today and I was asked at the last minute to substitute for him, and there is also the situation that apparently there have been some changes in the matters before this committee, which is something I wish to speak on. Partly because of that, I do not have a written brief that I can hand to all members of the committee now. I have some notes I can provide to the Hansard reporter for transcription later.

To explain myself, my name is Peter Cassidy. I'm a consultant working with community groups, unions and individuals here in Hamilton and throughout the province. I used to be a lawyer with McQuesten Legal and Community Services, a legal clinic in the east end of Hamilton. Before that I used to work for a living.

I appear before you today as a self-appointed representative for the rich and powerful of this province. I would like to start the same way I did when I had the chance to present on Bill 26: by congratulating Mike Harris and the Progressive Conservative Party for putting revolution on the agenda. You are to be congratulated for your brilliant strategy of wooing the voters of Ontario by promising the impossible: doing away with the deficit while cutting taxes. You're worthy of nothing but praise for the way you managed to ram through the early part of your agenda, the cuts in welfare, the gutting of labour legislation, the slashing of transfer payments to municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals. We're now poised for even greater success in the Common Sense Revolution: Hospitals are closing; pregnant women are unable to find doctors; plans are under way, apparently, for superprisons for adults, boot camps for the young; and one of my personal favourites — one of the members spoke on this — is work camps or the equivalent for those on welfare.

I must warn you, comrades in the revolution, that the revolution is in danger. The peasants are revolting, as I always say. Hundreds of thousands of people are marching through the streets of Ontario demanding that the revolution slow its pace. Will the government of the day listen to the people? Incredible as it may seem, there's actually a chance that the government may listen to people, particularly as we look at what is happening with these proposed changes to the Employment Standards Act.

First of all, why hearings? We didn't need hearings to cut welfare. We didn't need hearings to attack the poorest and most vulnerable in the province. We didn't need hearings to roll back labour laws to pre-Second World War days, though I understand Mr Christopherson was able to hold some hearings hinging on that. Why do we need hearings on cutting the standards of working people?

I know there are some people in what's called the opposition, or the alternative government or whatever, who still believe there's some sort of pre-revolutionary idea of public debate and discussion on legislation. They just don't seem to understand that with the Common Sense Revolution there is no room for discussion and debate; there is no room for thinking. In the words of a great poet, describing a situation somewhat similar to this government:

Yours is not to reason why,

Yours is but to do and die.

If holding hearings on changes to the Employment Standards Act is not bad enough, it turns out that these hearings may actually not be the sham we in the corporate elite thought they would be. There's actually, it seems, some chance that these hearings may result in changes to the proposed amendments, and not just minor cosmetic changes. They might actually result in substantive changes to the legislation. Imagine my shock and horror when I read in the paper today, "Province Delays Plans to Lower Job Standards." I find that shocking. I find that incredible.

It seems that what may be happening is that the government or some people in this committee have been listening to people and have decided that maybe they want to stop and think about it. I know there's something in there about bringing these changes in later, but let me say on behalf of the business community that we do not accept any delay. We insist that you follow through on the basic mandate you have to lower the living standards of the people of Ontario promptly, without delay, without thinking. That should be done.

Some of you wonder why these changes are so important to employers. What is the meaning of the Employment Standards Act? For those of you who believe that you have some role to play in thinking about these things and analysing them, let me say that employment standards essentially set the minimum that any employee is entitled to receive and that any employer has to provide, which means, by what we in the business community call the rising tide effect, an increase in the minimum affects everybody — raising them, and a decrease in the minimum affects everybody — lowering them.

As a simple example, if every employer in the province is required to provide a minimum one-week vacation to certain employees, that is the minimum. Every person thinks they're entitled to at least one minimum vacation, and those who can, try to get more than the minimum. So some people get two weeks, some people get three weeks and those in a particularly strong bargaining position get four weeks. Of course if you raise the minimum, if you raise that one week to two weeks, then those on two weeks want to move to three and so on. What we as the employers of the province expect is that you will lower the minimum, lower the floor, and that, we expect, will have the effect not just of lowering those at the lower end — if you take away, for example, people's right to vacation, which we urge you to do — people should not have a right to vacation. They're here to work. If you take away the right to vacation for anybody, then not just those who get the minimum of one week now will drop to zero, but those at two weeks will drop to one or zero, those at three will drop to two or one or zero and so on. That is what we want. We want you to move ahead as promptly as you can in lowering the standards.

How, you may ask, do the proposed amendments to the act do it? One of the key ways, as I understand it, had to deal with provisions where there is a collective agreement. Essentially speaking, instead of setting out separate minimum standards for such things as vacation pay or hours of work, they could all be bundled together and any one of those particular individual standards could be lowered so long as, theoretically, "the collective agreement confers greater rights...when these matters are assessed together."

We employers of the province are not stupid. We know what that means. With that amendment, we could go to the unions and bargain and say: "Everything is on the table. You have no minimum rights to any one of these things. The question is not whether or not you want to give up any of these rights. The question to what extent can you resist our demands that you give up these rights."

We anticipate that if these amendments were to come through, we could find some unions that would give up certain rights here — perhaps hours of work; some give up overtime and some give up vacation — and essentially throughout the province we could then have it clearly understood there are no minimum standards. They could all be gone.

Of particular note, of course, you'd be dealing with the clauses and the proposed amendments dealing with enforcement of these standards. Where a collective agreement is involved, the employment standards branch would be under no obligation to enforce the act. Let us say a union managed to resist the pressure from an employer to give up the minimum rights of vacation, hours of work, things like that. We, the employers of the province, could still go ahead and violate these rights, confident that our friends in the government or people in the employment standards branch would not intervene. You've got a collective agreement. Go and deal with that in the grievance and arbitration process. Of course, we employers well know how to play the grievance and arbitration process for endless delays and costs to the unions and the workers of the province. If we happen to lose the grievance or the arbitration, hey, there's always the next round of bargaining. We can come back again and still try and chip away at those rights.

If these proposed amendments give us employers so much edge in dealing with the unions, what greater rights would they give us with the unorganized, be it the working poor or middle class? Again, we can read the message of the proposed amendments very clearly. We understand what you're proposing. There will be no real standards. There will be no real enforcement of the standards. We can make passing mention, for example, of proposed amendments dealing with collection, that is somebody is in a position where they actually could somehow or other try and make some claim to money owed them, that's going to be settled somewhere down the line for much less than you got. If you happen to think you have a claim for $1,000 or so, let's realize you're probably not going to get that $1,000. You might be lucky, when you've got a private bill collector and you've got an offer to settle, if you take $500 out of that. Let's recognize those rights are paper rights. They're not going to be enforced. They're not going to be carried out.

The basic points I'm making are very simple. We, the employers of the province, will not tolerate any delays in lowering the standard of living of the working people of this province. Your job as members of the committee dealing with these proposed amendments is not to listen to the people of Ontario, not to listen to the injured workers' groups or the unions or the various agencies and people who come and talk to you. Your job is not to reason why; your job is to do and die. If need be, I would strongly suggest that you purge that wet, Elizabeth Witmer, from the cabinet, that you purge members of the government caucus who show any independence of spirit and thought, who show that they want to think and consider and hear what's going on, and that you go ahead and complete the agenda. Complete the revolution. Carry it out. We, the employers of the province, want you to do that. Yours is not to reason why. Thank you.

Mr Christopherson: I can't think of a question. All I can think of is a comment, and that is that I was the one who led the charge to force the minister and the government to take their act on the road. I may have to do the same with you and yours. I think you've got a great message there, and it would probably be a lot funnier if it weren't so true. I think that's an excellent way to get across a very clear message the people of Ontario need to hear. Thank's Peter.

Mr Tascona: I have no questions.

Mr Lalonde: The fact that this bill will authorize the employer to have the employees work longer hours, what impact will this have on family activities?

Mr Cassidy: I think that's a very leading question. Tremendously devastating, yes.

1520

Mr Lalonde: I'm glad to hear that.

What's your feeling about having privatization of the collection of back time, overtime, severance pay instead of the government handling it the way it is at the present time?

Mr Cassidy: That's an excellent point. Part of what I spoke on is obviously is that in privatization, which is talked of here, people end up last in their rights. What I think is also very important is that, basically speaking, we're looking at government's abandoning their role, which of course the employers of the province would prefer. The employers of the province would prefer that government not listen to any complaints, so that, for example, if the members of this committee were to pass standards on vacation or hours of work or maternity leave, whatever, they would not have any right to enforce those standards, they would not have any responsibility of enforcing the standards either as elected representatives or through the employment standards branch of the ministry. That would mean that whatever standards the MPPs passed were irrelevant and meaningless. Basically speaking, they're now left up to private companies to enforce those, the employment standards branch, the government agents, playing a role in that.

Mr Lalonde: When I look at the past, since the government only collected 25% of what was supposed to be collected in the past, I think there should be a cap on the percentage to the company, the parent company, that would come up with an agreement to settle faster, instead of 75% that they're entitled to. You can rest assured that the companies are going to try to resolve the solution as quickly as possible.

Mr Cassidy: In my situation, I think that if you set standards there should be somebody who's keeping them. I can't imagine an employer who would say to his employees: "Here are the basic minimum standards I expect. By the way, I'm not going to bother enforcing them. If they're violated, then 75% of the time I'm not going to bother." I just can't imagine any government or any committee saying, "We're going to set standards," and then say, "We're not going to bother enforcing them."

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Cassidy. We appreciate your coming before us here this afternoon.

ONTARIO PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES UNION, LOCAL 546

The Chair: Our next group up is OPSEU Local 546. Good afternoon.

Ms Victoria Biocca: Good afternoon. I'm Victoria Biocca and this is Dale Moreau. We're here on behalf of our members of Local 546. For your information, our document as submitted cannot be read in full; we will skip over certain sections. You should have no trouble, however, in following along.

Ms Dale Moreau: We appreciate the opportunity to present our views on Bill 49 and the potential impact on the enforcement of employment standards in this province. As the front-line enforcers of the Employment Standards Act, we provide the public services that ensure employers comply with a minimum set of legislated standards. We believe this enforcement should be cost-effective and efficient. These activities should not restrict economic growth in the province. However, we believe these standards put non-unionized workplaces on a level playing field.

The issues surrounding amendments to the act before this committee are serious issues that will affect all working people. The act currently protects approximately 5.8 million workers in the province of Ontario. In 1994-95, the employment standards program received 700,000 inquiries regarding the act, the number of employees was assessed was about 48,000 and the dollar amount was more than $64 million — wages not paid by employers.

These assessments were compiled by a total of 104 employment standards officers province-wide. It is interesting to note that there exists a case backlog of more than six months in some areas. The ministry has already eliminated 34 positions in the program. The ministry also intends to terminate another 12 positions, resulting in fewer officers, less support to conduct investigations and a longer case backlog.

Regarding the employee entitlements, the changes proposed in Bill 49 are biased in favour of employers at the expense of employees. Under the current act, an officer can make a compromise settlement to a claim when both parties agree to the compromise. The proposed changes will allow a private collector to coerce the parties into a compromise settlement.

Bill 49 amends the act to allow a series of waivers. This is a key feature to this bill. Bill 49 takes what are supposed to be minimum standards and turns them into a starting point from which to begin the bartering.

The waiving of minimum standards is also proposed for employees represented under collective agreements. Bill 49 proposes to allow collective agreements to override the legal minimum standards. The proposed changes in Bill 49 will support the offenders in the areas where the employees are the most vulnerable. For example, a large corporation has asked to increase the legal hours per week. The employer offers to increase the hours of work per week from eight to 10. In exchange, the employer suggests three weeks' vacation per year instead of two weeks' vacation.

Overtime and vacation pay can be quantified. How does one quantify the damage caused by having to work longer days? How can an officer assess a non-monetary standard with a monetary standard to determine if this confers a greater right or benefit? How can one quantify the damage of having to work even longer hours than already exist and the resulting damage on personal and family lives? Bill 49 will push employees' rights back to over a century ago when politicians protested against businesses because the employees were forced to work such long days. We cannot go back to this time.

Bill 49 is proposing that any employee who commences a civil action through the courts cannot file a claim for the same issues. This would include claims for termination and severance pay if the employee has filed a suit for wrongful dismissal. This is a gross injustice to employees. Bill 49 erodes the employees' minimum rights to such a degree that they will have no alternative but to use the court system.

Bill 49 will also reduce the time limit that an employee can file a claim. Under the current act, employees have up to two years to file a complaint for any moneys owing. Under Bill 49, employees now have six months from the date of the complaint. There are very few employees who file complaints against their employer while still employed.

The Ministry of Labour stated in the expenditure reduction strategy report that by reducing the time frame to file a complaint, this would improve the turnaround time on investigating claims. This is not true. The two-year time limit is a must for employees with the high unemployment currently facing Ontario. Employees would not complain to their employers of a breach of their employment rights in fear of losing their jobs. The ministry does not promote employment standards. Customer service is not a priority within the ministry, as evidenced by the cutting of staff, discontinuing telephone inquiry units in some areas, guides no longer being produced and, finally, eliminating the officers who would actually investigate the complaints.

Bill 49 would also give employers an outright licence to steal from their employees' paycheques. Employees who are owed moneys beyond the six-month time limitation will be forced to pursue civil legal action or drop their claim altogether. The ministry acknowledges that reducing the time limit from two years to six months will cause more activity in the provincial courts, where employees will now have to bear the costs, in addition to the public expenditure already existent.

The act does not have a ceiling on claims. Bill 49 proposes to limit the dollar amount of the claim to $10,000. The ministry's reasoning, as noted in the report, is to lower the caseload, as higher-paid employees would use civil action to collect. The assumption must be made that when employees file claims in excess of $10,000 they are higher-paid employees. This is not so. For amounts over the $10,000, usually it applies to commission salespersons, violations that have accumulated over a two-year period or long-service employees who are owed termination and severance pay.

For example, a 12-year employee of a manufacturing business earning $33,800 a year, or $650 a week, is laid off, not given notice of the layoff. The employee's entitled to eight weeks termination pay in lieu of notice and 12 weeks severance pay, a total of 20 weeks; $13,000 is owed under employment standards. The poverty level for a family of four in Metro is $31,000 per year; $33,800 a year is not a lot of money. Why would anyone assume that this particular employee is higher-paid when family size or the family's financial status is not considered in the ministry's statistics? This is absurd. Why would anyone assume that this particular higher-paid employee would pursue his or her claim through the civil courts? The employee would be forced to choose between filing a claim with the ministry for $10,000 and forfeiting $3,000 from his claim or retaining a lawyer, pursuing it through the courts and winding up with less than $10,000 after a lengthy and costly civil action. This constitutes a windfall for the employer if the employee chooses the employment standards route — a licence to steal $3,000.

In addition, the act does not have a minimum amount on claims for the violations of the act. A worker will not be able to file a claim with the ministry under the new, proposed, unannounced minimum amount. The Ministry of Labour's report sets the minimum amount at $100. The ministry's only explanation for setting a minimum amount is to eliminate approximately 800 to 900 cases per year. This is outrageous and an extremely dangerous trend affecting 5.8 million workers only to reduce the caseload by 900. With regard to employees who handle cash, for example, every six months an employer could automatically deduct $50 from an employee's paycheque for cash shortages — twice a year. The employer could deduct moneys under the minimum amount every six months. It's a new double standard for the employer — an outright licence to steal.

Ms Biocca: Regarding the enforcement of the act, Bill 49 is forcing employees to use means other than the employment standards branch. Why would such an option be considered? Will cutting jobs in the branch save money? The answer to this question is no, as the alternative most likely to be pushed on to employees is the court system, a system which is already failing our society due to backlogs of cases yet to be heard. Forcing employees to use the provincial court system will only cause more problems.

In addition to the problems this will cause the system the employees will suffer unimaginable delays in getting their entitlements, and when a judgement is rendered, the collection function will still have to be addressed. This is not a proposal that will save the province any money. The branch is far more expeditious and cost-effective in enforcing the act. Any changes to the act should focus on more enforcement measures to secure the minimum standards in an even more expeditious manner.

Another change which would result from Bill 49 is that unionized employees will not be able to file a claim. Unionized employees will be forced to use the grievance procedure under the collective agreement to enforce the legal rights. The proposal virtually demands that every collective agreement have the act included in it. How could such a proposal retain the consistency of decision rendered on the employment standards cases? This will cause the erosion of the minimum employment standards and it is already a minimum.

Aside from investigative and enforcement problems the union can be faced with complaints concerning fair representation by its members. Although this already occurs, when you consider the scope of adding the enforcement of the act into the grievance procedure, such complaints against unions will increase. Again, on reason for this would be inconsistency in decision rendered. This could well mean that a failure of enforcement of the act constitutes a breach of duty of fair representation. This proposal is an impossible reality. The mandate of an officer cannot be the mandate of either an employer or a union. The mandates of employers and unions are quite obvious. Whose mandate equals that of an employment standards officer? Furthermore, any determination made by an officer is subject to an appeal by either the employer or the employee. How is this right of appeal preserved through Bill 49? How is any right of a unionized employee preserved through Bill 49?

Regarding the proposed changes to enforcement, any attempt to empower others to enforce the act will result in a breakdown of the minimum standards. This would inevitably occur as consistency in decisions cannot be maintained when so many different parties, all with different mandates, are making the decisions. Why would an employer adhere to the standards when there is no consistency and cases are thrown out? The minimum standards of employment cannot in any way be eroded. "An employment standard shall be deemed a minimum requirement only." This is the law and it must be enforced.

The next item of review is the proposal to use private collectors. For informational purposes, the branch did give its own collections unit, but for a short period of time. The unit had been formalized about 1990 and was disbanded in March 1993. The collections unit history of collections is illustrated. The ideal solution regarding collections of employment standards is to reinstitute this unit. This would result in a more efficient and expeditious finalization to a file. The arguments in favour of an internal unit far outweigh any other proposal, whether collections be done by an officer or a private agency.

As it is today, the employment standards officer is responsible for collections. Every claim and file is in essence a collection file. In 1994-95, out of 9,468 assessments, only 2,771, or 29%, went uncollected. Therefore, 71% was collected. Of the 2,771 uncollected assessments, 1,035, or 11%, were due to the employer's refusal to pay. However, most of the time these files are collected through payments made on orders to pay and this collection is not recorded. Furthermore, on the files where the orders were not paid, this is not to say this is still uncollected.

In addition to this argument, when you consider the assessments uncollected of 2,771, and 1,035 is explained by employer refusal, the remaining 1,736 assessments are due to bankruptcies and insolvencies. These are the largest dollar assessments. How will a private collector or any other body collect from an insolvent corporation? "You can't get blood from a stone" is the most obvious statement heard by an officer when investigating these files. Therefore, when the numbers are reviewed, the number of insolvencies that have occurred over that time period must be considered separately, as these files constitute the highest dollar figures and the lowest collection possibility, if any at all. In these cases, if the officer has not collected any moneys, then the use of a private collector will be fruitless.

The focus of any review of these numbers must be the higher number of insolvencies and that these files represent the largest assessments of uncollectible moneys. When this is considered, the figures support that the officers are very effective in the enforcement and the collection functions. Nevertheless, Bill 49 proposes to give the collection function to a private collector. This proposal has many flaws.

One is that if the money collected is less than the amount owing, this amount can be apportioned among the collector, the employee and the branch. This is a serious problem, as we are already dealing with a minimum standard. The employment standards is a minimum only. To allow less money to be collected is a violation of this section. The act is defining a minimum standard and then reduces the minimum further. The employees cannot be expected to accept any less than their full entitlement as assessed by an officer.

It should be noted that the officers have a high success rate of collection at 71%. When you consider the other 11% that may be collected and is unreported, the success rate is even higher. The other 18% are insolvencies which represent the highest dollar assessments and are virtually uncollectible by any body or any organization.

In conclusion, our main concern is the impact Bill 49 will have on the vulnerable worker. The regular wage earner will not be at these hearings. They are too concerned in earning a day's wages to support their families.

Our second concern is that the bill is to promote self-compliance. In today's society people are more prone to challenge a law than to abide by it. Society has become less respectful of laws. As a result, Bill 49 must be reviewed and, as previously mentioned, changes should focus on more enforcement measures and strengthening the Employment Standards Act.

The Chair: Thank you. We only have a couple of seconds left. I'll allow a brief statement or comment by each of the parties, starting this time with the official opposition.

Mr Hoy: Thank you very much for your presentation. You mentioned the $50 deducted from one's cheque. In the paragraph prior to that —

The Chair: Forgive me. I had put a checkmark beside it. It should have been the government that started the round. I'll let Mr Christopherson finish. You go first and then I'll have John make his statement.

Mr Hoy: So you're going to let me —

The Chair: Yes. My apologies. Keep going. You're in the middle of your question, which I've interrupted.

Mr Hoy: Okay. You mentioned the $50 taken off a cheque, and the minimum amount in a government report was $100; it suggested that it be $100 for what we'll call frivolous claims. The reason given was to eliminate approximately 800 to 900 cases per year. What dollar value was assigned to those 800 or 900 cases? They wouldn't all be $100. Do you know what range?

Ms Moreau: I have no idea. It came out of the ministry's expenditure reduction strategy report. Where they arrived at the 800 to 900 cases, I have no idea.

Mr Hoy: So they could have been in excess of $100?

Ms Moreau: It could have been in excess of $100.

Mr Baird: Thank you very much for your presentation. We certainly appreciate it. I do feel it incumbent upon me though to put on the record that of $64 million that was assessed last year, only $16 million was collected, and that the idea for re-establishing a cap was one that came out of a special Employment Standards Act review committee on which half the members were employment standards officers. Your colleagues were the ones who recommended we do this last fall. I think it's important to put that on the record in addition to the fact that I guess we feel we've got to do a better job than that 25%.

I don't point fingers on the 25%; the 25% was roughly the same amount before the collections division was disbanded. It went down and then it went up again to 25%. I just think we've got to do better. The policies are probably just as much to blame as anything, not necessarily the people. So I guess we just feel we've got to try to do a better job than that, seeing we couldn't do much worse.

Mr Christopherson: Let me say to the presenters that I think what they may have just finished doing is presenting arguably the most powerful and important brief we may receive in terms of casting some real light on the implications of Bill 49 from the real experts in the field. I want on the record to say how much of a positive contribution I think this makes to our procedures and that I'm confident there will not be any repercussions for these workers in terms of coming forward and stating what they have today on behalf of their colleagues. I can assure the presenters that we will be monitoring that confidence I've expressed very carefully. Thank you on behalf of the workers of Ontario.

Mr Baird: On a point of personal privilege, Mr Chair: I would just concur with the member for Hamilton Centre without any hesitation, on exclusively the last part of his remarks.

The Chair: Thank you, and we appreciate you taking the time to make a presentation before us here today.

PROVINCIAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN OF ONTARIO

The Chair: With that, our next group up is the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario. Good afternoon. As I'm sure you've heard me say to the last group, we have 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation time or question and answers.

Ms Phyllis Kerkhoven: I'm Phyllis Kerkhoven. I chair the economics committee for the Provincial Council of Women of Ontario. I would like to compliment the last group. They had the numbers and the information that we were not able to get, so ours is a more general presentation.

The Provincial Council of Women represents over 80,000 persons in Ontario through our local councils, federated societies, affiliated groups and individual members. The council of women is a non-sectarian federation of organizations of women and of men and women. These organizations have fundamental principles that are in harmony with the avowed aims of the council of women: "...to work for the betterment of conditions pertaining to the family and the state." The motto of the council of women is: "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you." We've been around 100 years. Those are the exact words.

Our membership includes many different types of organizations, from church groups to ethnic groups to business groups and educational groups. We welcome this opportunity to respond to the standing committee on resources development regarding the Employment Standards Act.

The Provincial Council of Women of Ontario is concerned that a fundamental piece of legislation which sets out vital minimum standards for all employees in the province of Ontario is being amended in what appears to be a reduction in these minimum standards. In section 3 of the current act, "No employer, employee, employers' organization or employees' organization shall contract out of or waive any employment standard, and any such contracting out or waiver is null and void."

You have something in section 4 that says you can do things but they have to be better than what the minimum standard says. You seem to have created a conundrum here.

Limits have been set on the amount an employee can claim which, taking into account today's wages, would appear to be inadequate. The time frame whereby an employee can initiate a complaint has been shortened. Should the employee be successful in his or her claim this amount will be collected by a collector, which would reduce the moneys ultimately received by the employee. Also, if the employee is not represented by a union or other group, he or she must pay all costs of the investigation. When we look at the fact that the employee is probably no longer employed and does not have the financial resources to initiate an investigation, we foresee that many justified actions will not be taken.

This legislation was initiated to protect employees and offer minimum standards which would be adhered to by all employers. Roadblocks are now being erected which many employees will not be able to surmount. The proposed amendments appear to be ambiguous and unclear to the average person. Should an employee wish to follow through on his or her concern, an expert will have to be retained and paid for by the employee. This cost will also be deducted from any award the employee might receive.

We are concerned that compromise agreements can be made by unions and employers which do not take into account the fundamental principles of the legislation which states that employment standards cannot be waived.

All in all, we feel that the protection offered by the Employment Standards Act is being amended and the amendments are not in the best interests of the citizens of Ontario.

The Chair: Thank you. That leaves us plenty of time for questions. This time we'll start with the official opposition and we have three and a quarter minutes per caucus.

Mr Hoy: Thank you very much for your presentation. I do note that you have men in your organizations but I would say that you primarily are representing the women. Correct?

Ms Kerkhoven: Yes. Some of our affiliated groups are men and women.

Mr Hoy: Over yesterday and today we've heard about the lack of protection this bill would give to particularly women because of their workplace, the type of work they do and oftentimes not organized or unionized, and other vulnerable persons. So I appreciate the comments that you've made here.

The service sector is one that people believe is going to grow, and in the food or agrifood business I happen to believe that's true as well. In that sector many people are not organized or unionized and I believe, although statistically I don't have the figures, many of them are women. Would you agree that the service industry, if it is to balloon, as people think it will, first of all has many women and they would be subjected to vulnerability under this act?

Ms Kerkhoven: Yes, I would. You also have to realize that these people are probably not used to making things like presentations. Their use of the language might not be quite as good as ours and they'll have a real problem.

Mr Hoy: I have no other questions.

Mr Christopherson: I had a chance to read your presentation while the official opposition was making its comments. In light of the organization that you represent, do you agree with some of the presentations we had in Toronto yesterday that in many cases people who have no other rights except those contained in the Employment Standards Act are new Canadians, visible minorities, the majority of them being women? Certainly we saw a disproportionate impact of Bill 7 so far, which is the new Ontario Labour Relations Act the government rammed through the House, where a lot of the cleaners in Ontario have lost their union agreements and their wages have been slashed by 30%, 40%, 50%, and their benefits, and a disproportionate number of women were impacted as a result of that. Do you agree that this is a likely outcome of reducing the minimum standards contained in the Employment Standards Act?

Ms Kerkhoven: Yes, we do definitely, and we're not just looking at the actual person employed. This is going to affect the whole family because that wage is not coming in. It's the whole picture that we find very depressing.

Mr Christopherson: I think it also needs to be said that we can't talk about this in isolation. When our caucus looks at all the measures of this government, the cuts and the decisions they've made about where they will cut, overall there has been an increasingly disproportionate, negative impact on women and children. I hope that your council would continue to articulate that reality because it's an important part of the public debate that needs to happen over the next few years. I thank you for the work you're doing.

Ms Kerkhoven: Thank you. We intend to.

Mrs Fisher: I appreciate your attendance here this afternoon. I think you're especially right when you say that often individuals won't come forward because they're afraid to speak.

We had the experience yesterday afternoon in Toronto, however, to have a woman present on her behalf, along with another woman, each having the same cause — unpaid wages owed to them — whereby for the past number of months, as a matter of fact over a year, the process that was in place by government wasn't meeting their needs. They were unable to collect. It was a very impassioned plea by an individual for us to listen up and it was also inherently expressing that perhaps government doesn't have to do everything, be everything such that somebody can be protected. As a matter of fact, in her case it was interfering with her ability to recover her funds.

We had a presentation made just previously with some statistics that were there for 1990 to 1993, and for whatever reason that collection agency was then dissolved, but we also know that more recent statistics indicated that we were able to recover only 25% of the funds on behalf of employees in the last year. Do you think there's room to try, for those people who don't have that representative group on their behalf, perhaps the private collection system where the success rate might be improved?

Ms Kerkhoven: It sounds good, but the employee or the person trying to collect is not going to collect the full amount he or she supposedly would have gotten; it's going to keep reducing and reducing. If there was something in the amendments to bump up the thing for the costs of collection and then start the process of reducing, whatever, that would make much more sense.

Mrs Fisher: I just have one comment to make to that: It says a possible reduction to 75%. Some people will have you believe, as has been stressed for the last two days of these hearings, that this will be the rate all of a sudden. I'm not so sure we should all be so naïve as to believe that will be the rate. Perhaps it will collect 100%, perhaps it will collect something less than that, but not less than 75%.

In the case of this woman, she had no access to any of it. She'd have been grateful to see 25% of it and hasn't been successful, while waiting for her three kids to be fed. I'm not so sure, given our history, that we're doing anybody a favour by not trying something different or something new. When she was in Toronto yesterday she very passionately asked for our support and in essence was saying: "Get it out of your hands. You're not doing a good job on my behalf. Please, somebody, help."

I don't know. As a woman it struck me that perhaps we were where we didn't belong and we should be giving some other option a chance to be tried.

Ms Kerkhoven: Then maybe humans should be considered like in manufacturing: They're an object rather than a service. When you buy materials you must pay for them. This is the same type of thing, and there's no reduction to 75%. If you owe, you owe, plus interest.

Mrs Fisher: I'm not saying the moneys weren't owed to her; I know that. I'm saying that anything that had been done on her behalf to that point wasn't successful. Basically she was saying that we as government were in her way as well because we were unable to do for her what she needed. It seems to me like that's not an unusual situation.

She was brave enough to come forward as an individual to present the case. Many haven't. Many do it in groups, and there's nothing wrong with that as well; I think we have to hear from everybody, but if we had more of those individuals step up to the table, which does take some fortitude that a lot of people lack, perhaps the reality of the problem would be more obvious. I just thought I'd ask the question.

Ms Kerkhoven: We were primarily concerned there would be more people who would not come forward because it would not be worth their while at all.

The Chair: Thank you very much for taking the time to come before us to make a presentation today. We appreciate it.

NORMA LAFORME

The Chair: The next individual is Norma LaForme. Good afternoon. That helps us get back on schedule, in fact even slightly ahead of schedule. As you've heard me say, we have 15 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation time and question-and-answer.

Ms Norma LaForme: Thank you. Just a bit of background about who I am: I live in Hamilton and for the past two years I've been working part-time for an organization in Hamilton dealing with disability issues. I've been active in the community, advocating for rights of people with disabilities as well as other people I see as vulnerable. Basically I give my two cents in. I believe it's important to tell people what you think and what you believe.

I would like to thank the standing committee for granting me this time slot at these proceedings. I have requested to be here today because I am concerned with Bill 49 and how it will affect people with disabilities in Ontario.

As I read notes on Bill 49, I considered what will happen with the new bargaining rights that employers will have in Ontario. For instance, what if a person with a disability has a job where the union is negotiating with the employer that the people will work longer hours per day for more vacation time. If a worker with a disability must keep a fixed schedule and is unable to work the extra hours, this would have an adverse effect on the person's health and he or she may need to refuse. What will stop employers from firing a worker with a disability so they can hire a worker who could work longer hours? I would question any employers who want their workers to work longer hours, because this would be more stressful on the workers and, as a result, employers may have more problems with absenteeism. People with disabilities want to work so much that they may agree to employment conditions that may affect their health or put them at risk.

Another concern about changes in employment standards is the new time limit that workers have to complain about a violation. Presently workers have up to two years to complain about an incident, and workers tend to complain after they have found new employment. If you make workers launch a complaint within six months, they may face harassment and/or job loss at the hands of the employer. Workers with disabilities may not complain, as they fear losing their jobs, as well as the fact that it is still difficult for workers with disabilities to find jobs due to the discrimination they already face in our society.

If people do not complain about human rights violations, they may be working in conditions that are hazardous to their health or they may be taken advantage of by working longer hours for less pay. Shortening the time that workers have to complain will make it possible for employers to abuse their workers. When the person does make a complaint, the ministry has two years to investigate and the employer will have two years to pay the worker. So not only does the worker have the stress of applying to the employment standards for unacceptable conditions; they may also have to wait up to four years for their settlement. Tell me, where is the justice in these changes to the Employment Standards Act?

The new $10,000 maximum cap under the Employment Standards Act will make it even more difficult for employees to receive all the moneys they are owed. If workers are owed more than $10,000, they may have to obtain a lawyer. Workers may also need a lawyer if the amount they are owed is under the minimum cap.

Workers who have a disability may be too intimidated to go to a lawyer because they cannot afford the legal bill and then cannot access help from legal aid for employment-related issues. If the worker does go to a lawyer, they may be intimidated because of the power imbalance between themselves as workers and the employer. A worker who cannot afford to lose the money they are owed may give up on fighting for their money because of these changes.

The Ministry of Labour should continue to be the mediator in all employment standards complaints to ensure that there is a mediator between the worker and the employer. These cases should not be in our backlog of the court system where the courts may not know a lot of the details about the employment standards. This is not justice; it is the Ministry of Labour not doing its job as a mediator.

Under the new Bill 49, if the situation can be resolved through the courts, the ministry will not investigate the claims. The problem with this is that employers who have frequent employment standards violations will not be on record with the Ministry of Labour. If this happens, workers will find it difficult to prove a history of abuse of employment standards by the employers, which in turn will make it difficult to tackle a problem systematically.

Another issue is that workers will have to decide between taking the person to court or filing with the ministry. If the person needs a lawyer to explain the difference to them, this may cost the worker a great deal of money before they even decide the best course of action. If the worker has a disability, they may not have that money to spare and this will likely be another barrier to the person filing a complaint with employment standards. We live in a society where all people are supposed to be free from abuse. However, if employers are given a ticket to do whatever they wish, workers are going to suffer from abuse by employers.

Bill 49 allows the government to use private collection agencies to settle the dispute between workers and employers. The problem with this system is that collection agencies will likely push people to reach fast settlements without getting all the money they are entitled to. As a result, employers will pay the workers only a fraction of what they are owed and employers will once again get away with not paying their workers all the money that they owe people. I want to know, what type of justice is there where dishonest employers will not have to pay their workers all the money they are owed, all because some people want quick settlements? The Employment Standards Act is supposed to prevent the abuse of employees, not add to the abuse of employees.

Finally, the section of Bill 49 around negotiating employment standards in a collective agreement is not an effective way to go. If Bill 49 is passed, employers and unions will negotiate hours of work, public holidays, overtime and severance pay that may be lower than the standards. This relates to my first point I made, that if people are forced to work longer hours for less pay, their quality of life will decrease and their stress level will increase. This will lead to more accidents in the workplace, more careless work practices and a less equitable society. All of this relates to workers with disabilities, because less equity in our society leads to fewer opportunities for people with disabilities to become fully employed. Employment standards means that there is one standard for everyone; it does not mean having standards that are on a sliding scale and what is good for one person is not good for someone else.

As a person with a disability, I am concerned because I have a university education, experience working with people, experience working with different issues, and yet I have not been able to secure a full-time permanent job. I look at my friends and family who have worked most of their lives and now have money to travel and enjoy life and I wonder if I will have half as much as they do when I am their age.

I want to work, but I want to work for people who will be fair and equitable. Bill 49 does not encourage business practices that are fair and equitable, and I hope this bill is not passed. Employment standards should be strengthened, not watered down. Winston Churchill once said, "One can judge a society by how they treat their most vulnerable people." Our society should be creating opportunities for all people by ensuring that employment standards protect workers from harassment and give them working conditions that are fair and equitable. Workers with disabilities need strong employment standards so they will have equal opportunities in the workforce.

The Chair: Thank you. You've left us about a minute and a half, so 30 seconds per caucus. This time we'll start with Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: I don't mind starting, but I think your rotation is off again.

The Chair: Forgive me. When we dropped the —

Mr Christopherson: Oh no, it would be because we dropped the last one.

The Chair: That's right.

Mr Christopherson: My apologies.

The Chair: We're even now.

Mr Christopherson: You're right, we are.

I just want to say for the benefit of members of the committee that Norma is a well-known and highly respected representative of people with disabilities in this community and I don't think I need to say much to convey the fact that I think it takes that much extra to come forward when we know how difficult it is for able-bodied persons to come forward. This can be a rather difficult, stressful process to go through and Norma is there every time there is a public community issue here in Hamilton. I know that you would all want me to thank her for continuing to show the courage and leadership that she does on issues that affect the disabled in our community. Thank you, Norma.

Mr Baird: I just would echo the comments of the member for Hamilton Centre. We appreciate your discussion here today and we'll certainly take your brief back with us and keep it in mind in our deliberations. We appreciate the time you obviously took to research and prepare your brief. Thank you very much.

Mr Hoy: I also want to thank you for your brief. You mentioned quality of life. Those institutions such as government must provide equally for people and those who are considered to be vulnerable but no less active, as you are. Thank you.

1610

Ms LaForme: I just want to comment. I think quality of life is partly the concern of the government, but as a society of people in community working together, we need to work together to ensure — we live in one of the richest countries in the world. Our quality of life should be going up or staying at the same peak where it has been for the past few years. It shouldn't be going down.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms LaForme. I think all the party members would agree, it's certainly our goal to exploit the advantages of living in the greatest province and the greatest country in the world. Thank you for adding a very different perspective to our deliberations here today.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES NIAGARA DISTRICT COUNCIL

The Chair: The next presentation will come from the Canadian Union of Public Employees, the Niagara district council. Good afternoon.

Mr Pasquale Perri: Good afternoon. I thank the committee for allowing us the time period. I am Pasquale Perri. I am the president of the Niagara district council of the Canadian Union of Public Employees. It's a voluntary group — unpaid — elected to represent over 6,000 CUPE members in 15 locals throughout the Niagara Peninsula.

We are workers who care for the sick, the elderly and the children. We clean and repair your roads, pick up the garbage and work in sewage and water treatment plants. We clean your schools, look after the students, take care of the mentally and physically handicapped and provide child protection services. We administer the terms of the provincial welfare act and the Workers' Compensation Act. We help run the hospitals, the senior citizens' homes, the libraries, humane societies and sexual assault centres.

Our jobs demand a minimum of 35 to 40 hours per week to fulfil our employment responsibilities. Then we volunteer our time and energy to represent the members of CUPE.

It is stated that the Employment Standards Act applies to every contract of employment, oral or written, expressed or implied. It is stated the Employment Standards Act shall be deemed to be a minimum requirement only.

Just as an employer has obligations to his workers, so does a worker have obligations to his employer, so does the worker have obligations to his employer. This legislation should protect those who cannot protect themselves. This is our understanding of why the Employment Standards Act was created. To dilute this act is morally unjust to every worker in the province of Ontario.

To propose amendments under the assumption that all workers in Ontario can read, write and communicate to the extent which is now expected under these amendments does not accurately reflect the current workforce, whose skills and abilities have not been considered. The emotional and financial stress a worker faces with the proposed time constraints in applying for financial redress will be devastating. Just to show what some of the workers in the workplace have to face, there are a lot of functionally illiterate people in the workplace and there are also people who aren't. In some cases, workers will be dismissed without any income. In other scenarios the workers will still be working for the employer, more than likely unaware of what options are available to them or unaware of the fact that the clock is ticking.

Should a worker be successful in obtaining redress, he or she will be facing the distinct possibility of losing an unknown percentage, maybe as high as 40%, of any moneys awarded to a third-party collector. Is this fair? Is this just? I see a few people shaking their heads. I have worked as a collection agent.

Who does the worker turn to? Prior to these proposals, the provincial government, through its employment standards officers, was responsible for policing the act. Under the proposed changes, this duty is being forced on the unions and trade unions and the ordinary worker. What about the new workers, the student workers, the illiterate workers, the English-as-a-second-language workers and those workers who barely meet the standard set for literacy? Who is responsible for them? Is this fair? Is this just? Is this in the true spirit of the Employment Standards Act?

The worker is now facing the distinct possibility of losing the right to file both a civil complaint and an employment standards complaint. This is a right the workers of Ontario have possessed for many, many years. Why the change? Who benefits? Is this streamlining for the worker, the employer or the government?

These are some of our concerns. There are many other concerns. However, we anticipate these will be addressed by other presenters.

For a housekeeping act, these amendments go far beyond dotting the i's, crossing the t's and clarifying any ambiguous language. When you decrease the time limits, minimize the maximum benefits and declare a complaint must be filed in a specific manner or it will be deemed unacceptable, this is not housekeeping.

To try to delude workers into believing this is an improvement act is an insult to workers throughout the province. If the government were to follow the true spirit of the Employment Standards Act, it would recommend the following amendments: that a worker have five years to claim redress as financial institutions have five years to collect overdue debts, give or take a year or so; no maximum monetary ceiling on claims by workers; that a complaint filed under the act will be accepted in person, verbally, written, faxed, electronic data send, by telephone or in the first language of the worker; that a worker may pursue both his or her employment standards and civil remedies at the same time.

It is our belief that the present Employment Standards Act protects all workers, both union and non-union. Any changes that limit the ability of workers to exercise rights to redress, both in time limits and amount of moneys owing, is an attack on all workers in Ontario.

To unload the responsibility of policing the act on untrained union workers is a direct contravention of the government's responsibility. Based on changes proposed, it is our opinion that the government has abdicated its responsibilities to workers in Ontario. With no teeth in the act to assist those who will handle the government's unwanted duties, any measure of success will meet with limited results.

This act was intended to solve problems in the workplace without undue hardship to the worker. The proposed amendments reverse the process and penalize the worker. We must remember the employer has purchased the services of the worker. When the services are not paid for, this is a direct violation of the Employment Standards Act.

The Niagara District Council of the Canadian Union of Public Employees strongly opposes the proposed housekeeping amendments in Bill 49, An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Perri. You've left us about two and a half minutes per caucus. This time the questioning will start with the government benches, and I believe Mr Ouellette was the first to put his hand up.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Thank you for your presentation. I'd like to get into some more detail about the collections process. Currently 60% of the individual pays without an order, which means that 40% require an order or something to take place. Of that, 37% are just refusals to pay. What we're looking at here is paying up to 75%; the recipient, the employee, would receive 75%. Remember — I'm sure the figures are bouncing around they're just as confusing for you as they are for me — we're averaging 25 cents on the dollar. The employee is guaranteed 75 cents, and the collection agency can then bargain on the remaining 25 cents on the dollar. Being as it's not working now, we're not collecting 100%, how would you see us being able to improve that ratio?

Mr Perri: Number one, if there was language in the legislation that forced the employer. What I see here and what we've gone through in all of our debates is, when you allow an employer not to pay and then you tell the employee that he can collect up to 75% —

Mr Ouellette: That's taking place now.

Mr Perri: Hang on a second here — you're penalizing the worker. Now you're saying to us, "How do we improve collecting that 75%?" Well, I'm sorry. As a worker I went in and we've been told — and I've done some grievances and everything, and they always tell us, "You were hired and without signing a contract you have guaranteed us 40 hours a week," if that's what your work period is, or if it's 35 hours a week. "You have signed this agreement with us, written or verbal. That's what you've done."

If I start abusing things where I'm not in at work and everything, I'm fired or disciplined. But as a worker, if my employer doesn't pay me and I go through an employment standards procedure complaint, if the employer doesn't want to pay me, now you're telling me I can take 75 cents on the dollar and say thank you very much. Where's the justice here? Now you're asking me how to improve the increased collecting of the debt.

Mr Ouellette: No, what I'm saying is that —

Mr Perri: But you're asking how to improve it.

Mr Ouellette: Right.

Mr Perri: Why should I accept 75%? To improve it so that once an employer is fined under the act and he owes that claimant $100, he has to pay that $100. There's no wavering on how much you'll accept. You owe us $100; give it to us. That's why I said there's no teeth in the legislation to police the act.

Mr Ouellette: The legislation is not working the way it is. We're making here a serious attempt at rectifying the situation.

Mr Perri: If the employer owes me $100 and the employment standards officer says, "You owe him $100," he gets that $100, not 75 cents.

Mr Ouellette: That's right.

Mr Perri: Then why are we here?

Mr Ouellette: That's right. It says that now.

Mr Perri: Then why aren't we collecting it? There is no teeth in there. I'm sorry. When there are other things —

Mr Ouellette: Obviously the former government wasn't able to do it.

Mr Perri: Listen, folks, we're not here to complain about the other government. We're not here for the other government.

The Chair: We're going to move on to the official opposition.

Mr Lalonde: You seem to be concerned about the collection agency. You've just said yourself that you are in the collection —

Mr Perri: I was.

Mr Lalonde: What was the fee at the time that you were in the collection business?

Mr Perri: It could be as high as 50%. It's what you negotiate.

Mr Lalonde: What was the percentage?

Mr Perri: Remember, when I call you and I say to you, "You owe this company X amount of dollars" — let's say you owe them $28,000 — over the phone I could say, "Give us $14,000 and we'll resolve it," and most companies will write off the other $14,000 as a loss. Now I can negotiate with that company how much I want to collect the money for. So it all depends. But the point is, why as a worker do I have to negotiate for the money that's owed to me?

Mr Lalonde: I do understand your concern on this one because there is no cap on the percentage, except we guarantee 75%. But if there's a settlement under the amount that is owed by the employer to the employee, we're not talking of a percentage.

Mr Perri: Yes, but you're still eliminating the employer's responsibility. I'm sorry. No matter how we talk, we still eliminate the employer's responsibility.

Mr Lalonde: What other avenue do you think the government should take to ensure that the employees are getting their fair share?

Mr Perri: Strengthen the act, not dilute it.

Mr Lalonde: The actual ones?

Mr Perri: Everything.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. You raised a question rhetorically, on page 3, stating that: "The worker is now facing the distinct possibility of losing the right to file both a civil complaint and an employment standards complaint. This is a right the workers of Ontario have possessed for many, many years. Why the change? Who benefits? Is this streamlining for the worker, the employer or the government?"

Can I just press a little bit and ask what you think the answer to that question is, when you look at this?

Mr Perri: It's not the worker who's going to benefit.

Mr Christopherson: Why?

Mr Perri: Because there are time restraints, the whole works. The only person who's going to benefit, no matter what — and what really irks me the most is that if I don't live up to my obligation to a contract, no matter if it's verbal or not, I can get fired. If the employer does not live up to the obligation and there are moneys involved, I have to go to court and I have to pay my own fees now. On $100, how much does it cost to have a lawyer go in there for you?

How many of you here can live for four years without a job if you're fired without just cause? How many can? With today's economy, where you can't find a job, how long do you think you're going to survive for four years — a case I think is on an average four years before you can get your job back if you can prove you were unjustly fired. How many here can survive? That's the question.

The most important issue here, we have 22% to 35% of the workforce in Ontario who are illiterate. There are facts from the federal government, from all provincial levels. These are the people who are going to be affected the most.

You always want to know personal things. I didn't learn about an act until I was injured at work. I didn't know about the Employment Standards Act until I was 30. Now you're going to tell me students coming out of high school, where there are no programs in the schools at all that teach government law, even about the Small Claims Courts and everything — you're going to tell me these kids that are coming into the workforce are going to know what they're going to do and what they're legally allowed under the law? Let's get serious here, folks: They're not. That's the issue.

We're getting screwed as workers. The workers do not benefit from any of the amendments that you've put in here. The worker is suffering. I got hit in the 1970s with price controls. I got hit with the social contract. What have I done wrong as a worker? I contracted to work 40 hours a week, and now you're going to tell me to privatize and I have to negotiate for my same job five years from now and work at half the rate? What kind of standards are you talking about? Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Perri.

Mr O'Toole: On a point of order, Mr Chair: I want a clarification, if I may through the Chair or through the clerk. There has been much discussion on the issue of the collection fee. It's my understanding, and I'd like a clarification, under section 28 of the act, which defines "collector," it's clear to me that the director shall assign a fee or amount for the collection, which shall be added —

Mr Christopherson: Point of order.

Mr O'Toole: This point is not being completely understood by the public.

Mr Christopherson: Point of order.

The Chair: We already have a point of order on the floor.

Mr O'Toole: That amount is in excess, and that's what I want the clarification on. The current proposals state, and the public should understand, that if the salaries and wages owed —

Mr Christopherson: Point of order. He can't go on forever. Come on, Chair, point of order.

Mr O'Toole: I am on a point of order. Under section 28, Mr Christopherson —

The Chair: Mr O'Toole, what you've raised is not a point of order.

Mr O'Toole: A point of information.

The Chair: There's no such thing. But we'll ask the research staff to ensure that by tomorrow we have the answer to your question.

Mr Christopherson: A further point of order then.

The Chair: Yes, Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: If you're going to entertain a whole lot of questions on what we have here and what interpretations are, then I'd like to know how much time you're going to allow for that and when it'll happen, because I've got a whole lot I wouldn't mind asking the government or the researcher.

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, you're far more experienced in sitting in committee than some of the newer members, and Mr O'Toole now knows that that sort of thing is not a point of order. Presumably those debates will be held when we do the clause-by-clause.

Mr Christopherson: Mr O'Toole's action is not what surprises me. It's the ruling you made that you're going to direct the research officer to respond to it. That's my point of order. If you're going to leave that direction in place, then I've got a whole lot of questions that I'd like to have the research officer look at and we'll deal with in committee too. I'm suggesting to you the whole thing's out of order.

The Chair: It's quite appropriate for you, in a written format, to send a request to the research assistant for clarification.

Mr Christopherson: And you're going to deal with it in committee time?

The Chair: No. I don't understand why you don't understand I have told Mr O'Toole he did not have a point of order, period.

Mr Christopherson: All right. Then I just need to be clear. You're not giving time for that to be dealt with.

The Chair: No.

Mr Christopherson: You're asking him that he write —

The Chair: No, no, no. I said in writing.

Mr Christopherson: He can write whatever he wants to anybody. That's fine.

SIMCOE AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: That takes us to our last group, the Simcoe and District Labour Council. Good afternoon. Again, we have 15 minutes for you to use as you see fit, if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter, please.

Mr Herman Plas: Thank you for allowing us the opportunity to make this presentation on behalf of the Simcoe and District Labour Council on the proposed amendments to the Employment Standards Act. At this point I want to recognize the work of Denise Earle, labour activist, for helping us prepare this presentation.

My name is Herman Plas. I'm the recording secretary for the Simcoe and District Labour Council. The Simcoe and District Labour Council has got a 40-year history being active in the community and speaking on behalf of working people in the Simcoe area. I've been a labour activist for a number of years and I plan to continue to work for social and economic justice for working people.

We believe that the proposed amendments to the Employment Standards Act, Bill 49, will have a significant impact on all the people of Ontario, not just working people. Specifically, we believe that lowering the employment standards legislation will have a negative impact on workers and on people in general.

With the indulgence of this committee, I have invited Ms Kim Shalay, a health care professional, to participate in this presentation. Kim has agreed to answer questions. I will pose to her, following which I will make a brief closing summary. We welcome comments and questions from this committee following our presentation.

We hope to bring to light some of the changes that have taken place in Kim's workplace due to cuts in health care funding. We will also make the connection between these funding cuts and the negative impact of Bill 49 on the quality of care for older people living in nursing homes in this province.

Kim, I want to thank you for volunteering to help me with this presentation. My first question to you is, how do we know each other and what is our relationship?

Ms Kim Shalay: Yes, we know each other. I am your daughter and you are my father. I'm your youngest daughter.

Mr Plas: Right. You are right, we are father and daughter. Now that we've established that fact, let me ask, for the benefit of this hearing, what do you do for a living, how long have you been doing this and why do you do this kind of work?

Ms Shalay: I'm a registered health care aide and work in an accredited nursing home in Simcoe, Ontario. I've been a registered health care aide for about four years. I like my job. I like the people. I enjoy taking care of people and I am good at taking care of people.

Mr Plas: Right. How has your job changed in the last year or so?

Ms Shalay: We care for about 80 people in our nursing home. Because of staff cutbacks, I do not have enough time to care for my patients the way I should be able to. Because of staff cutbacks, I often have to do things alone that should be done by two people, such as lifting a patient. Because there is nobody to help me, too often patients do not get the care they need.

Mr Plas: How severe are the cuts in staffing and how has that affected you?

Ms Shalay: In a 24-hour period there were 12 full-time staff and two part-time staff approximately, 112 hours of nursing care per 24-hour day. This allowed us to give the needed care to every patient and we were able to do our job safely and efficiently. I used to work 40 to 45 hours every two weeks as a part-timer. Now I work 20 to 24 hours every two weeks. Now we have eight full-time staff plus five part-time staff per day, for a total of 90 hours of nursing care per 24-hour day. This is a reduction of more than 20% in hours of care given to patients in a chronic care facility.

Mr Plas: How does the cut in staffing affect your patients, and what do you see as a result of these cutbacks?

Ms Shalay: The quality of care has gone down considerably, which is to be expected with the cuts in the hours worked. Too often patients are left on their own without prompt attention, sometimes with disastrous results. Patients will attempt to do things for themselves and run the risk of injury. We had one patient who fell trying to transfer herself. She broke a hip and was taken over to the hospital. After a week in the hospital she died. Our patients are elderly people who need personal care, a listening ear, to be touched sometimes. Some patients have nobody in the outside world. The staff is the only human contact they have. I can make a real difference in the lives of some of these people by spending just a little bit of time with them, but I don't have the time any more. With the cutbacks, I have to rush to get everyone looked after.

Mr Plas: How do these patients respond to these changes in care?

Ms Shalay: Some patients understand what is going on. They know we are doing our best. Some patients complain to their families about the drop in care. Some patients are confused. They have even more trouble coping than before. These are the people who really suffer. They are the victims of these cutbacks.

Mr Plas: Do you see a change in the kind of patient entering the nursing home?

Ms Shalay: Yes. I notice the increase in the number of chronic care patients coming in. They seem to have stayed home as long as they possibly can and now they're forced into a nursing home. They need an even greater level of care, adding to a greater workload for the nursing staff.

Mr Plas: How will this kind of cost cutting affect your work with elderly people?

Ms Shalay: We are told that cuts to health care spending will continue for some years to come. This will mean an even greater reduction in care. Already the level of care is not as good as it should be. Some of the most vulnerable members of our society — our parents and our grandparents — are the victims of this mean-spirited approach to debt reduction.

As employment standards are affected by Bill 49 and health care employers are squeezed for funding, the result could be a further reduction in staffing. This would be disastrous for these patients — again. They will be the innocent victims of this government's race to the bottom.

I don't think that Bill 49 is good for health care workers or for patients. It needs to be withdrawn.

Mr Plas: Thanks, Kim, for letting us take a look at your workplace.

In closing, it may appear that this presentation addresses health care cuts rather than the proposed amendments to the Employment Standards Act, Bill 49.

However, I must point out that should the proposed amendments be effected, these changes will, without a doubt, further erode the quality of care to the elderly and ailing people of this province. It has been demonstrated in this instance that as the health care institutions in this province, both private and publicly operated, desperately try to maintain a level of care for their clients, staffing has been cut.

Also, as Kim has attested to today, in the attempt to deal with these cuts, workers' conditions of employment have already deteriorated. Their ability to earn a decent living is affected by the decrease in hours of employment available to them. Their own health and safety in the workplace is affected by the downsizing of staff.

How will Bill 49 affect workers and others in Ontario? Allowing employers to negotiate minimum standards in the workplace lower than which currently exist will put additional pressures on workers already striving to make a decent living. As a result, as in the above instance, patients relying on our health care system will not receive the type of care to which they are entitled. Workers will have no choice but to perform their duties as best they can, not necessarily as best as they should be, in order to keep their jobs. Again, the patients will be the ones who suffer in the end. Is this fair?

Limiting the time for claims and investigations against employers and, as well, limiting the amount workers can claim will further threaten workers' job security. In this instance, health care workers will wonder if they can afford to report an injury that they may sustain as they try to do the work normally performed by two people. Many health care workers already rely on hours they hope to be able to pick up as a result of being hired on a part-time, on-call basis. Will their names suddenly be put at the bottom of the list if they complain about injuries caused by unsafe patient transfers? Will they attempt to perform their duties with injuries, thereby putting a patient at risk?

Finally, if the changes as proposed in Bill 49 regarding enforcing and collecting workers' claims are put into place, there is no doubt in our minds that the quality of life for all people in the province of Ontario will ultimately be destroyed. Perhaps those workers fortunate enough to enjoy the benefit of working in a unionized environment will receive some assistance in these areas; however, who will assist those workers who are not represented?

The amendments as proposed in Bill 49 will most certainly cause lengthy delays in the processing of workers' claims. How will these workers sustain themselves and their families during a period of time when they may be unable to work? What purpose will it serve to give workers the option of taking their claims to a court proceeding, when they most likely will not be able to afford to exercise that right? Why should a worker ever be forced to pay a private collection agency a fee to collect what is rightfully theirs?

Where is the government's responsibility in all of this? We believe we should be able to rely on our elected representatives to ensure that the rights of workers in this province continue to be recognized.

Once again, we thank you for the opportunity to appear before you.

The Chair: You've left us about two minutes to divide between the three caucuses, so about 45 seconds each. We'll start this time with the official opposition.

Mr Hoy: Thank you very much for your presentation. The monologue that you had together at the beginning was similar to what I have heard from others in the health care area —

Mr Plas: This was a dialogue.

Mr Hoy: — and I just want to say to you that they're similar in nature. Patients who should maybe be requested to get up and walk for reasons of maybe a bad leg, but the nurse or the caregiver just doesn't have time to go and do that. So they can't walk perhaps as quickly, as well, and may be permanently damaged. I've heard this from health caregivers in all areas, including the hospitals, so you're right, the cuts have been quite widespread and have the same effect, region to region, in health care. I appreciate your presentation today.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. It's nice to have just a little break in the usual style and have a little different approach. It was quite enjoyable and quite effective.

I just want to ask you to embellish a bit on the notion you bring forward here that people who are entering the health care system will not receive as good care as they would otherwise, and not just because of the cuts in health care but they will be affected by the stress levels that are put upon workers. I'm assuming you're also suggesting that stress would be increased even more by the knowledge that the minimum rights you have as a worker have been watered down as a result of Bill 49. Can you take a minute to expand on that?

Ms Shalay: The residents that are coming in now, we don't have as much time to spend with them on a one-to-one basis as we used to. There have been many times when I've had a resident come up to me crying because they just want someone to sit down and talk with them, just to spend time with them, but we haven't got the time any more. We've been cut back to one and a half to two staff members per shift, and it's dangerous to try to lift someone who's supposed to be lifted with two people. Yes, we have a medi-lift, but still you're supposed to have two people to operate that as well. We've only got one person operating it half the time. Then you get residents who fight with you. It's difficult. It's very hard.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation.

Mr Plas: The only sure preventive measure against aging at this point is being run over by a streetcar or some such measure. Otherwise, we're all in the same boat, regardless of political stipe or economic condition.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much for a very, very interesting presentation. It's quite a unique bit of theatre. Anyway, the fundamental changes of reform to long-term care are very important. The minister has allocated $11 million to long-term care, additional money. There's a changing strategy in that area which I think is current to the point you were making here today.

Mr Plas: If I might interject, it doesn't appear anywhere in Kim's workplace.

Mr O'Toole: I would get into a discussion there — but the collection fee is very important. You're suggesting that perhaps the employee — the intent of the act under section 28 is very clear: "The director may authorize" the collection — "the collector to collect reasonable fees or reasonable disbursements or both from each person from whom the collector seeks to" — from whom the collector is seeking the owing under the act —

Mr Plas: Sir, if you have trouble reading it, I'm sure there'll be a hell of a lot of trouble implementing it. Again, as the previous presenter said, I'm entitled to 100%, not 75% or 25%. I'm entitled to all of it.

Mr O'Toole: That's exactly what the act says.

Mr Plas: If you can't read it, I'm sure the —

The Chair: Sir, excuse me. Would you allow Mr O'Toole to finish his question, then you can respond.

Mr O'Toole: I think that's what the act is saying, sir, in all respect. It's really saying in the next part that moneys that are attributable to wages, compensation, amounts paid in respect to every person owing under the act shall be paid to the person. So all the moneys are owed to the person who has the claim.

Mr Plas: Are you going to take up your allotted time just to — or am I making the presentation to you?

Mr O'Toole: Well, I'm trying to clarify —

Mr Plas: Listen. This government has done absolutely nothing to show that it has any indication of being friendly to workers — not only that they're mean-spirited, they're stupid, and they're stupid for this reason —

The Chair: Okay, thank you. If you two care to carry on the debate after the meeting, that's fine, but we have run out of our allotted time. Thank you for making your presentation before us today.

Mr Plas: Thank you.

The Chair: With that, we've had all our presentations here today, so this committee stands recessed until 9 o'clock tomorrow in Kitchener. Thank you all.

The committee adjourned at 1645.

EMPLOYMENT STANDARDS
IMPROVEMENT ACT, 1996LOI DE 1996 SUR L'AMÉLIORATION
DES NORMES D'EMPLOI

Consideration of Bill 49, An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act / Projet de loi 49, Loi visant à améliorer la Loi sur les normes d'emploi.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Good morning. I'd like to call the meeting to order and welcome everyone to the third day of hearings on Bill 49, An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act. I'm particularly pleased that Minister Witmer has been able to join us here this morning for our deliberations.

BRANT COUNTY COMMUNITY LEGAL CLINIC

The Chair: With that, I'd like to proceed to our first speaker, Brant County Community Legal Clinic. We have 20 minutes for you today to divide as you see fit between presentation time or question and answer.

Mr Ian Aitken: Thank you for the opportunity to speak this morning. My name is Ian Aitken and I work as a lawyer with Brant County Community Legal Clinic.

One of the principles I think should be kept in mind in your deliberations is the concept of an honest day's pay for an honest day's work. The Employment Standards Act is in place, and the primary intent is to ensure that this fundamental principle is taken care of when people go out to work. It's our view that any amendment to the act that makes it more difficult for an employee to obtain money that is owed to them under the act or that leads to the result that the employee receives less money than they are owed is against that principle of an honest day's work for an honest day's pay and is against the intent of the act.

At our clinic, as in many of the clinics across the province, we provide advice and representation to individuals who often work at entry level wages or at minimum wage. One of the realities that our clients and we as counsel face every day is that these individuals have very, very few resources available to them to enforce their rights. They have very few resources available to them if for whatever reason they leave their employment or are forced to leave their employment. The reality, again, that we see every day is that loss of employment can be devastating to these individuals.

The reality today in Ontario is that quitting employment or being terminated from employment is devastating. It can create economic catastrophe for many of our clients. The reality is, if someone is terminated or quits employment, they've obviously lost the income from the employment. They also face penalties under the Unemployment Insurance Act and they are often ineligible for even general welfare assistance. So leaving employment, quitting or being terminated today in Ontario can lead to homelessness, loss of basic shelter and certainly inability to meet basic needs. Over the last two weeks I have met clients who have come into my office and are in exactly that situation.

Because of that reality, people who are working at a position where there are violations under the Employment Standards Act are put in a position where they are very, very hesitant to make complaints about any violations, the reality being that if they do make a complaint, they are concerned about being terminated. As I've mentioned, the consequences of being terminated are very devastating. The result is that many of these clients will continue to work even though there may be violations under the act. There is always the option, after they leave employment for whatever reason, whether they find another job or they're laid off etc, that they can then make a complaint and recover moneys, wages, that are owing to them.

The difficulty that we see with the restriction on recovering only six months of moneys is that individuals will be able to go back for a lesser period of time to recover any moneys that are owing to them under the Employment Standards Act. An individual could face a situation where they are working, there are violations under the act, and yet they continue to work for the income. They realize that the consequences of making a complaint may lead to a dismissal and they will be left in very difficult circumstances. For that primary reason, any reduction in the limitation in recovering moneys, certainly to six months, we feel is unacceptable.

The other reality is that many of our clients, as I've mentioned, do not have ready resources available to pursue a civil claim. Civil claims can be costly. Many of our clients are often in a situation where they are struggling to meet their basic needs and it's difficult sometimes to proceed with a civil claim when those immediate concerns are paramount. For that reason, the maximum of $10,000 available to be recovered and the restriction on filing the complaint under the act, or choosing between that and starting a civil claim, we feel would place our clients in some circumstances in a difficult position. Certainly in some circumstances our clients, employees, would be placed in a position where they would have to choose between those two avenues. The reality is that in some circumstances they would be forced, because of their circumstances, to accept less money than they are owed.

The two consequences of that would be, one, if the employee is not in a position to recover the full amount of what they are owed for violations under the act, the cost is shifted to the employee. That's money they are not going to recover. And in some circumstances, because it's not income in their hands, they could be placed in a situation where that shortfall would have to be made up by the public purse, whether it's social assistance or whatever.

It's our position that the cost of any violations should be borne as much as possible by the employers. If there is a violation, the employers should be responsible for paying the moneys owed. There should not be a shift in those costs to employees; there should not be a shift to the public purse.

For those reasons, the amendments that are proposed, specifically the six-month limit on recovery, reducing the maximum recoverable to $10,000, and the difficult restrictions and difficult choices that would have to be made as a consequence of choosing between filing a claim under the act or proceeding with a civil claim, should not be put into effect.

It's our feeling that if an individual goes out and does an honest day's work, they should get an honest day's pay. We feel the act provides some protection in circumstances where they do not get an honest day's pay, and certainly for the working people in our province and the reality of their circumstances, it's important to provide as much protection as possible. Any restrictions or reductions in the remedies or the amount of money they can recover is against the interests of working people. If anything, there should be more investigations under the auspices of the act and there should be more enforcement and more collection.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): Thank you for your presentation, Mr Aitken. One of the themes that comes up consistently is this notion of the reducing of standards, number one. But one of the things that concerns me is that the business community and others are looking for what they would term, I guess, a more efficient and better application of the law, and it strikes me that lowering the standards really doesn't provide for greater efficiency. My question to you is, because you deal with cases continually, would it be your view that the vast majority of employers in your community are good employers and that the people you deal with and the people your clients deal with are in a minority?

Mr Aitken: I can certainly speak from personal experience through my employment history and certainly from the contacts I've had in Brantford, and I've also had the opportunity of working in Kitchener and Toronto. I can't disagree with the comment that most employers are good employers, but the issue for myself as an advocate and the issue for my clients is, what are the remedies when I run into an employer who is not good, who is not providing me with wages or benefits?

Mr Duncan: Certainly, and that leads to my supplementary, and I asked this of a chamber of commerce group yesterday: Then why reduce the standards? Because it doesn't affect most employers. What they're doing affects a small minority of employers in terms of enforcement of minimum standards. My experience with this is, as an employer before, that the Employment Standards Act, of all pieces of labour legislation in terms of day-to-day business, is really one of the least intrusive statutes, and that if the agenda is one of enforcement, you can achieve efficiency without lowering standards. Would that be your view?

Mr Aitken: I would agree with that, yes.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): Thank you, Mr Aitken, for your presentation. First question, just so there's absolutely no doubt: I'd like your comments on the fact that the minister continues to claim that there is no reduction in the minimum standards guaranteed to workers under Bill 49. Do you agree with that?

Mr Aitken: I'll respond in this way, sir. Certainly it's my view that the reality in terms of our clients is that at the end of the day they will have less money in their pockets in certain circumstances, and it's our view that if that money is owed to them by employers as a result of their "sweat equity," they should receive that money. So clearly in that sense there's a reduction in standards.

Mr Christopherson: Well, the question would be very broad, it would be in any sense, because the minister and certain members of the business community continue to suggest that there is no loss anywhere whatsoever, but that there might be a shifting or a massaging, but that there's no direct loss. We've made it very clear that our position is that of course there is, there are rights and minimum standards that have been dropped here, and at the end of the day workers have less protection than they had in the existing bill.

In the short time I have left I'd like to move to the issue of the two years down to six months. Again, we hear from certain members of the business community and the government that the employee has a responsibility to make a claim in a timely fashion. We've continued to suggest that there are circumstances where workers don't have that option of immediately making a claim for all the reasons you've mentioned. We've heard that in Toronto and we've heard it in Hamilton. Could you just expand on the kinds of circumstances where six months is not fair to employees because, given their personal circumstances, they cannot make a claim or may not be aware that their rights have been violated?

Mr Aitken: It's a fairly common occurrence and I think I've tried to address that circumstance, but I have had contact with employees who will contact the clinic and inquire as to their rights under employment standards, sometimes to determine what those rights are, whether or not there may be a violation and what the remedies are. We respond and tell them what their remedies are under the legislation and we advise them of how to proceed with a complaint. But as I've indicated, there is a concern on the street with employees that if they make a complaint, there is a possibility that the complaint will lead to difficulties in the workplace. This is the real world and people sometimes, believe it or not, end up losing their job or are terminated for reasons other than are appropriate.

Usually the response of the client is, "Can I make a complaint after I leave?" We advise them that yes, they can, and their rights are not prejudiced. But if there's a reduction to a six-month period, that decision about when to make a complaint becomes more immediate and, as I've tried to point out, it can be very devastating.

Hon Elizabeth Witmer (Minister of Labour): Mr Aitken, thank you very much for your presentation. Obviously our concern is that we collect as much money from the employer community, and as quickly, as possible. What we're attempting to do within the bill endeavours to do exactly that.

You've expressed concern about employees coming forward and acknowledging and reporting violations. Do you not tell them that there is an anti-reprisal provision within the Employment Standards Act at the present time? Do you not tell them that the employment standards program will investigate anonymous claims? Do you not encourage them to report employers as quickly as possible when there are violations in order to ensure that other people within that workplace receive the appropriate protection?

Mr Aitken: Yes. The reality of our clients' situation often is that their immediate and primary concern is to ensure that they maintain their employment. The reality that we face and our clients face is that they are concerned about losing their employment. Yes, there are reprisal provisions. Our clients are still concerned and, as I've pointed out, when they balance the opportunity and the protection under the act against the reality that if they are terminated they will be very possibly without any income for a substantial period of time, the decision, although it can be difficult, is often to stay in employment, tough it out and try to obtain a remedy later. That is the reality we see and that our clients deal with. Certainly I appreciate there are provisions under the act for protection.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Exactly, and I think you do have the responsibility to inform your clients. As far as the six-month time line, as you know, that is very consistent with the majority of the provinces across Canada. Our attempt is to ensure that violations of the act are reported as quickly as possible. You know that the longer we wait, the more difficult it is to obtain evidence, the more difficult it is to get first-hand, accurate information from witnesses. What we want to do is make sure that employers who are violating the act are reported as quickly as possible and that people are compensated. That's the reason for the reduction in the time line. As I indicated to you, it's very consistent with other provinces.

We are not happy that at the present time we are only collecting about two thirds of all of the orders to pay. We want to make sure that we get the money into the hands of the most vulnerable employees in this province as quickly as possible. That's the reason for the changes, and these changes will accomplish exactly that.

Mr Aitken: I appreciate your comments. I disagree that this will be the effect of these amendments.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Do you have a better solution as to how we can get more money into the hands of employees and how we can get more money from employers who are violating the act?

Mr Aitken: As I mentioned in my presentation, the solution may be to put more resources in the hands of the people who are enforcing the legislation. How we can get more money into the hands of vulnerable people by reducing the amount of time that they can claim is beyond me. It strikes me as odd that reducing the right to get moneys will somehow get more money into their hands. The reality is that people will be faced with a choice where they have to make a decision after six months as opposed to two years. It would be easier in any type of enforcement situation to say, "Well, we're not going to enforce for two years; we're only going to enforce for six months." It will make it easier, but it won't put more moneys in the hands of vulnerable people. It just doesn't make any sense.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Aitken. Unfortunately our time has expired, but I appreciate your taking the time to come before us and making a presentation here today.

Mr Duncan: On a point of order, Mr Chair: Can I place a question with research counsel?

The Chair: In writing, Mr Duncan.

Mr Duncan: We have had contradictory —

The Chair: That's my ruling, Mr Duncan. Sorry, that's my ruling.

Mr Duncan: We have had contradictory evidence with respect —

The Chair: Mr Duncan, excuse me. You're out of order.

Mr Duncan: — to other provinces. I think it needs to be asked because we've had contradictory evidence placed by —

The Chair: Mr Duncan, you are out of order.

Mr Duncan: We've had contradictory evidence —

The Chair: Mr Duncan, what part of what I just said don't you understand?

Mr Duncan: — asking a question —

The Chair: In writing, you may pose any question to the research assistant.

Mr Duncan: I would like to pose it verbally because we've had contradictory evidence presented to this committee and I would like to raise it publicly so that people can know. A witness appeared before this committee who contradicted the evidence that's been presented on Monday with respect to Ontario relative to other jurisdictions on the minimum standards. That was the professor from Osgoode Hall law school, who's an expert. I simply would like to place publicly a request that her response and the response of the minister be brought together for the committee so we can determine for ourselves which response is more accurate. It's in the interests, I think, of public discussion and public debate.

The Chair: You've placed your question, Mr Duncan.

Mr Duncan: Thank you.

The Chair: And you're out of order.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA,
LOCAL 2859

The Chair: We'll move on to our next group, the United Steelworkers of America, Local 2859, Mr Beveridge. Good morning. Thank you for joining us, and again just a reminder that we have 20 minutes. You can divide it as you see fit between the presentation time and question-and-answer period.

Mr John Beveridge: Thank you very much for allowing me the opportunity to speak before the forum. Hopefully I'll keep us on track and keep you on schedule.

My name is John Beveridge. I'm the president of Local 2859 of the United Steelworkers of America, which represents 500 hourly workers at a BMW facility in Cambridge, Ontario. It's also a noteworthy point to mention that this employer employs an additional 800 salaried and non-unionized workers, and the Employment Standards Act affects both groups of employees equally.

I'm also very active in the community. I sit on the board of directors for the Cambridge United Way. I've had various involvements with the community agencies, those that deal generally with the unemployed and the assistance of those unemployed, so I think I can speak to the issue of vulnerable people in Ontario with some personal experiences.

I feel compelled to come before this committee and speak out on Bill 49 because I think it's wrong for the workers of Ontario and it's a regressive piece of legislation that exposes those vulnerable people in the workforce. I'd like you to consider my comments and those of the other people who come before you today and make the necessary changes to do the right thing in Ontario.

I'd like to suggest to you there was a reason originally for the act that's presently in force. There were no common standards at one point in time in Ontario and people, as a result of the lack of common standards, were vulnerable and exposed to situations that legislators saw fit to correct. The importance of that act is fundamental in the labour relationship in Ontario.

Section 3 of the bill, which I'd like to refer to, is the flexible standards. There's an erosion of those common standards that each and every worker in Ontario enjoys. That's the protection of hours of work, vacation pay, entitlement to severance pay and entitlement to public holidays. If you remove that or diminish that or if you make that flexible, that's a regression for the workers of Ontario. Whether they're unionized or non-unionized, they're equally affected by those changes.

With respect to unionized environments and the collective agreement situations that exist in those environments, the Employment Standards Act will be imposed directly into those collective agreements and will be enforceable and investigated through the provisions of those collective agreements. Mainly, that's the grievance and arbitration procedure.

Through the grievance and arbitration procedure, it's the union that bears the onus of the investigation and the carriage of the enforcement and likewise the costs associated with that. Presently unionized employees enjoy the powers and investigative abilities of the employment standards officers in the employment standards branch, and that will be downloaded to the unions with considerable detriment, I might suggest, to the unions' ability to function. It also leaves the unions exposed to fair representation claims on these issues that have never been exposed to the union before.

I understand that on Monday the minister retracted certain sections of Bill 49. However, I'd like to speak to those proposals that have been retracted because I think they are still very active and they'll come back through the employment standards review. That's of major concern to unionized workers, and particularly those unionized workers I represent here before you this morning.

In the collective bargaining situation whereby you can bargain away certain rights it's going to cause some major problems. A lot of times the collective bargaining process is somewhat of an adversarial process. My personal situation is that last year we had a labour dispute that lasted 21 days based on a proposal that the membership of the local union I represent was not prepared to accept. If you put yourself into a situation whereby those rights and conditions we've enjoyed now become a question of bargaining proposals, I think it will only ramify those labour disputes and enhance that adversarial relationship. That's not the relationship we wish to obtain. These are tough times, and we wish to work in a coherent fashion with employers and retain exactly what we have today.

I have a problem with the time limits, as the previous speaker has spoken towards, the six-month time limit for making claims. I know a young Vietnamese gentleman who's allowed me to use his story as long as I don't use his name, for fear of reprisals with his present employer, as a matter of fact. That young gentleman came to this country as a refugee and was successful in obtaining some employment in a small automotive manufacturing facility in Cambridge. His English was very poor, his knowledge of the working ways of the land was very poor and as a result of that his employer failed to provide him with statutory holiday pay for a period of one year. When he left that job and he discovered at that point in time that in actual fact he'd been duped, he went to the employment standards branch and through the officer was successful in getting what he was legally entitled to. Under these proposals, that situation wouldn't exist because of the six-month rule; he'd only be entitled to claim back to six months. This denies that individual, I believe, what's rightfully his. I think that's wrong.

These are the most vulnerable people in Ontario. These are the ones who need the maximum protection they can possibly get. You might say they have an avenue for civil litigation. Again, these are the most vulnerable people who don't have the natural resources and who have been denied statutory rights and the moneys they're owed under the employment contract. I suggest to you that it's very difficult for them to proceed with a civil action and to be successful.

Then, if it's the involvement of a collection agency to collect those funds, the proposals in Bill 49 allow for a fee. Again they receive less than what they're legally entitled to. I suggest that's wrong. I don't believe that's the intent of any piece of legislation, when it's intended to correct, to make it administratively easier to steal money from the most vulnerable people of Ontario through privatized collection agencies. I don't believe that's the answer. I believe that the answer is stronger enforcement of the act, more resources applied towards the enforcement and the collection of that rather than exposing and condoning unscrupulous acts on the part of the employers.

The hard fact and the hard reality of this is that there are unscrupulous employers out there and that these things will take place, and they need protection from individuals the likes of yourselves. I cannot confer enough to you how important it is to protect these individuals. Unionized workers have some protection through collective bargaining and through the labour and arbitration process. But that throws us into a black hole likewise. If any of you have ever dealt with arbitrators, and I've dealt with a few of them, jurisprudence for arbitration matters doesn't happen overnight. It takes a long time for that to be established. In an area where the employment standards officer already has great tools, has jurisprudence before him, you're throwing that in the area of an arbitrator who's never, ever been exposed to that area before. That can only lead to labour disruptions. That's not the correct way to move on this.

I see the contracting of the private collection agencies as a download of the responsibility that the Ministry of Labour currently bears towards the employees, whether unionized or non-unionized, in the province of Ontario. That's the responsibility; that's what people expect from their government: that their government is firmly behind the statutes that are in place and that the government will enforce to the fullest of its abilities and collect those moneys. The privatization of the collection of those moneys ensures that the full amount is never collected, based on the fee.

The Minister of Labour has just said to the last people who presented here that the goal is to collect the maximum and to get the maximum amount of dollars into the hands of the vulnerable, and I agree with that, but this bill doesn't do that. This bill reduces that to something much less than the maximum and that's not correct. That's completely wrong. That goes to encourage unscrupulous employers because if you go through the collection process and the negotiating process that'll take place, something less than the full amount will be collected and that doesn't help. People will be forced through the process and the length of time that it takes and the need for the dollars and the need for the immediate retention of those dollars will force people to accept substandard agreements, substandard settlements and encourage people to continue to break the minimum standards. I think the penalty should be severe and the penalty should be swift for those who break the Employment Standards Act.

I know that the ministry still has the two-year provision to investigate and the ministry has a two-year provision to collect moneys. If an employee pursues a claim of less than $10,000 through the ministry and seeks the ministry's assistance on this, it could be potentially four years before any individual sees any money. I think that's wrong. That's very wrong. The minister has already claimed that the intent is to get the maximum amount of dollars in the hands of the vulnerable. Four years, I suggest to you, to somebody who's just been six or seven months without an income is a long, hard row to hoe. That's wrong and I think that has to be changed.

I think the act makes those rights that each and every one of us has come to enjoy in the province very, very difficult to obtain through some of the avenues that I've just highlighted to you, and particularly the collection avenue and the right to civil suits.

I don't believe that the contracting out or the privatization of this thing is the correct thing to do. I think additional resources into the hands of the employment standards officer is the way to go to enforce the minimum standards that the Employment Standards Act should contain.

Through my experiences in the labour movement I've met many individuals who will recall the times when there was no such thing as minimum standards and they'll recall the times when things were very difficult, and I'm sure each and every one of you has listened to an elderly person say this to you. That's exactly what we're hoping to retain here. I don't believe that old business people sit in a room somewhere and say: "Do you remember the times when it was easier to exploit your workers? Well, let's get back to those times." That's what this bill does. This bill exposes those workers. I don't believe that's the type of province that we want and I don't believe that's the type of philosophy that we'd like to foster between management and their workers. A cooperative fashion is the thing that we'd like to have between workers and management.

So I suggest to you very strongly that you have a look at what's before you, that you hear the submissions very clearly and that you do the right thing, you protect the vulnerable people of Ontario and you change Bill 49. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Beveridge. We have one and a half minutes per caucus. The questioning this time will commence with Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: I'm sorry. What was the time, Chair?

The Chair: One and a half minutes.

Mr Christopherson: Thanks very much for your presentation, John. You're going to probably hear the minister for the balance of the morning, certainly her government members have, talking about the fact that if they can collect half a loaf or two thirds of a loaf in terms of money owed to employees, they ought to consider themselves lucky and be grateful that they're getting that much rather than accepting the fact that 100% should still be the goal. They will suggest to you that by going after collections through a private agency, they're going to get more of those dollars.

Do you think it's fair to say that if the government were really concerned about making sure that employees didn't get ripped off in terms of money they're owed, particularly when there are bankruptcies, which is the majority of the money that doesn't get collected, that they wouldn't have gutted the employee wage protection plan in the first place which was there for that sole purpose?

Mr Beveridge: I absolutely concur with you, Mr Christopherson, that the reduction from the $5,000 level to the $2,000 level seriously inhibited the ability of employees to get what they're intended to, what they're rightfully owed. I don't think they're interested in the protection and putting the moneys into employees' pockets.

Mr Christopherson: Would you also say that it's the position of your local union that the government ought not to accept that 75% is okay, that it ought to be 100%? As we heard from the previous presenter, people want the money that they're owed. The exact wording he used was "an honest day's pay for an honest day's work." This is money they're owed. It's fair to say, I think, that if they don't get that money, it's been stolen from them and if you know where it's coming from, there's an obligation on the part of the government to ensure that money's collected. Is that not why there are minimum standards in place, the workers' bill of rights, the Employment Standards Act, in the first place?

Mr Beveridge: That's absolutely right, and I concur again. My local union believes very strongly in a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. We bargained towards that and that's the philosophy that we do in fact work under. Anything less than 100% that's owed to any individual is unacceptable. Absolutely correct.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): Thank you very much, sir, for your presentation this morning. We appreciate the time you took to prepare it and to come and see us.

I just want to clarify one point, that two thirds of orders now aren't collected. We're only collecting 25 cents on the dollar on average, $16 million of $68 million. We find that unacceptable. That's not something that radically changed over the last year, though. That's something I think that's been an ongoing problem for successive governments and all parties, not a partisan level.

During the previous government, they were only collecting 25 cents on the dollar. In 1993, the previous government disbanded the collections branch at the employment standards division, displacing 10 workers, saying, "We're not going to do that any more." The regrettable notion is that the collections didn't go down. Particularly in the long term they went down to about 20% or 15%, but went up to 25% within a period of time.

So I guess if I had a question, it would be: Are you satisfied with collecting 25 cents on the dollar and do you think we've got to do a few little amendments? If it was so easy to collect more just by putting more money into employment standards, why wouldn't successive governments, the Liberal government, the NDP government or the Conservative government just do that if it was just a matter of putting more money?

Our feeling is that we've got to bring some major changes in to do better because we're not satisfied with 25 cents on the dollar. We're not satisfied with two thirds of orders not being collected. We think we've got to do something really big to shake things up to ensure that we do a better job for workers.

Our goal is 100%. We want to see every dollar owed to every worker returned to them and we're going to work towards that goal and we can certainly do better than 25 cents on the dollar, I can tell you that, and I'm ashamed to admit that it's only 25 cents on the dollar.

Mr Beveridge: I find myself agreeing with you with respect to less than 100% is unacceptable and that 25 cents on the dollar is an unacceptable level of recovery. There's no question about it.

I disagree with you, however, that the remedy is throwing just more money at the situation. I understand that your government's involved in fiscal restraint in all areas that the government's involved in, but the abilities and the powers of the employment standards officers to enforce and to collect and expedite are the things that this government should be looking at towards this bill. It shouldn't be looking at private collection agencies and less than 100% being acceptable. That's exactly what Bill 49 does and I disagree with Bill 49 based on that.

But I do agree with you based on the 25% of the claims and less than 100% is acceptable. I think the standards should be the enforcement officer is the one with the powers and the abilities. So if you're going to change the bill to reflect what you've said, then change the act to reflect the increased powers of enforcement and collection for the employment standards branch.

Mr Duncan: On Monday, the government was suggesting that in fact the real problem or a major part of the problem with respect to collections is the placement of wages relative to bankruptcy. On Monday they were saying that in fact it's the federal government's fault for not looking at that. Would you concur that a lot of the wages that do go uncollected are a result of bankrupt employers and employers who just close shop and it's not enforced at the federal level?

Mr Beveridge: The majority of the information that I've seen on this subject clearly states that the biggest portion is as a result of the bankruptcies and the inability to collect, particularly when the labour individual doesn't rate as a preferred creditor.

Mr Duncan: If I can, just by way of supplementary, a government that's cut 45 employment standards officers and 26.6% of its enforcement budget in that branch in its operation without a business plan, do you think that makes sense if they tell you, on the one hand, they want to increase and, on the other hand, they're taking away resources?

Mr Beveridge: It makes absolutely no sense and they're talking out of both sides of their face as a matter of fact.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Beveridge for appearing before us here this morning. We appreciate it.

Mr Beveridge: Thank you.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF KITCHENER-WATERLOO

The Chair: Next up will be the Chamber of Commerce of Kitchener-Waterloo. Good morning. Welcome to the committee. We have again 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit and I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for our Hansard reporter, please.

Miss Rosemary Rowntree: My name is Rosemary Rowntree.

Mr Jim Berner: My name is Jim Berner. I'm the chairman of the labour subcommittee for the federal and provincial affairs committee of the chamber of commerce.

Miss Rowntree: Mr Chairman, Minister and committee members, the chamber is appreciative of the opportunity to make this presentation to you and submit our report. Thank you for inviting us to this important forum.

Like Mr Beveridge, to a person the chamber of commerce is committed to ensuring that we have an Employment Standards Act that is fair and just for both employer and employees. We want to see this act evolve, as it should naturally, into a win-win situation.

Throughout the report and our presentation, we've adhered to the assumption that the changes in phase 1 are strictly administrative and that they're for clarification purposes. We understand that phase 2 yet to come, and there will likely be discussions yet on that, will be more substantive issues dealing perhaps with benefit levels or tradeoffs and negotiations. So our comments today are based on the administrative issues as we understand them being presented.

I'll briefly outline five of the main changes that we see that we quite agree with and then Jim Berner will go over a couple of the prime concerns that we have with the proposed changes.

First of all, as an overview a general comment: We quite agree with the need for change and the three stated objectives in phase 1 that Bill 49 has. We don't want to see benefit level changes. We'd like to see the clarification and we see the objectives being met through this proposal.

The five areas that we are quite in agreement and want to comment on are the limitation periods, the claims amounts, the choice of procedure, the collections and the access to electronic records.

In the limitations period there are two aspects here: First, we quite agree with the proposal to limit the entitlement period to recover money under the act to six months instead of two years. We see this putting the onus on the complainant to move in a timely fashion and we're concerned that delays will often result in longer and more difficult investigations, therefore more cost as well.

The second angle to the limitations period is the time change from 15 days for an appeal to 45. We see this as allowing cooler heads to prevail, to putting judgement into the appeals rather than emotions and easing that frantic scramble for everybody to get their act together within a very short period of time. We also see that this change in appeal days and the accompanying opportunity for legal advice will lead to a reduction in unnecessary appeals.

Under the claims amount, we quite agree with the proposed maximum of $10,000 per order and see no significant harm to individuals who wish to claim beyond that point.

We are particularly pleased with the choice of procedure, that claimants must go either through the court system or the employment standards system. We see this eliminating the possibility of duplicate and simultaneous claims. The multiple forums that individuals and employers must go through is costly and we see a reduction cost there in both the private and public purses. We see the workload also on the court system and the employment standards system being reduced through this measure.

In addition, we have known occasions where simultaneous complaints are made to the court and the employment standards system and a whiplash effect comes into play where one decision or one proposed decision may be played off against the other.

The collections being proposed to be put over to specialists is particularly interesting to us. We'd like to see the employment standards officers doing what they do best: investigation and enforcement. We'd like to see the collections put in the hands of specialists.

Finally, on the access to electronic records, we've no problem with that. We want to make sure, though, that the government puts in place some kind of a method to ensure that those records that are revealed are pertaining to the complainants only and that the privacy of the parties is protected.

Now Jim will address the two concerns we have with some of the changes.

Mr Berner: We have primarily two concerns, the first being that we take issue a bit with the two-stage performance and, second, the powers given to the arbitrator in union settings.

The two-stage reform: We don't quite understand the need to introduce change in a two-step process. We thought it would be better to have the presentation in one complete package. However, it has been decided to do the two-stage reform and so be it.

Arbitrator jurisdiction: On this issue we have numerous questions that are left unanswered in the proposed changes, such as: What is the arbitrator's role, who are the arbitrators and is there a list of approved arbitrators such as the list approved by the office of arbitration through the Ministry of Labour? Does the government envision an arbitrator in the same way as the labour act sees a settlement officer? What is the method of appointment? Are the arbitrators approved by the involved parties or are they appointed by the government? Also, we'd like to have a process to appeal or review an arbitrator's decision clarified.

We posed these questions to highlight the ambiguities of this position. The competency of the arbitrators hangs on the answers and hence the issue of the arbitrators' powers must be re-examined.

The concept of a mediator is preferable to an arbitrator as it exudes an image of win-win and helps to eliminate the confrontational posture that may be prevalent in the grievance procedures. This area needs considerable clarification.

In conclusion, we support your proposals and the change to the act and recommend only minor clarifications to improve it, being Bill 49. We do find it curious that the government wishes to divide the administrative and substantive issues into two phases, however. We respectfully submit our report.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your comments. That leaves us three and a half minutes per caucus. First up this round will be the government. Minister.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Thank you very much for your presentation. We certainly appreciate the effort that you have put into this.

I guess I'd like to deal with your concerns and your concern that we've done this in two stages. As has been indicated, the initial stage is primarily to deal with efficiency in administration and certainly to encourage collection. As we've indicated, we want to get more money into the hands of the employees much more quickly. We then feel it would be appropriate to do a complete review of the act, and obviously all of the information that we're going to be acquiring over the next three weeks is going to be very beneficial. It's going to help us to prepare the discussion paper and that's why we're doing it in two stages. We feel that the changes that are being proposed right now can be dealt with quite quickly and they certainly will enhance the administration and the efficiency of the act. So that is the reason for that.

You've expressed some concern as well about arbitrators. You've raised some issues here, but what is it that you are specifically concerned about in this area?

Mr Berner: We're concerned that they might have powers that they shouldn't have. In other words, they're given all the powers of an officer of the Employment Standards Act and I'm not so sure that they should be in that position. They should be more in an arbitrator's position, like not — how can I put it — not so much investigating etc. We prefer a mediator to mediate the dispute rather than going ahead and making judgements that should be the judgement of the officers of the ministry.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Okay. I guess that being the case, and obviously you would be most supportive of the new powers that we've actually given to the employment standards officer, and that is, we have given the officers the power to mediate and resolve disputes between the employers and the employees without a lengthy and very extensive investigation. So this is certainly an attempt on our part to again ensure that we build a strong relationship between employer and employees and we feel that when parties have this opportunity to resolve issues, they are more committed to the outcomes. I guess that's the approach, that you would prefer mediation then.

Mr Berner: Yes.

Mr Duncan: First of all, with respect to the two-stage process we concur with you and feel that everything should have been done in one package. We said that in the second reading debate in the Legislature.

Two, with respect to the issue of arbitrators some of the changes that they have made, I think we are supportive of around the ability of an employment standards officer to mediate, for instance.

I guess again the question I have, and I've placed this to other chambers and other business representatives, is, most of your members, at least the members of chambers that I know, never have to worry about these things. They really don't. They pay their employees. It's really, relatively speaking, a small number and there's a very real concern that whether or not it was deliberately intended, the fact is, and there's been evidence day after day now, that minimum standards in Ontario — the limitation periods, the entitlements, the restriction on recovery — really do leave those most vulnerable workers in Ontario more vulnerable than they were.

Would you concur that those minimums for the vast majority of your employers, and I am one who was and have operated under this statute, aren't going to be affected by those statutes and that in fact I don't think anybody would disagree with the notion of improving how we enforce an act, but that we don't have to reduce minimum standards to do that?

Mr Berner: I don't think it's the intention of the government to reduce the standards. According to the material that we reviewed, it said the primary concern was the protection —

Mr Duncan: Sure, sure. But there's been ample testimony — for instance, say somebody is owed $20,000 and it may be a small number, isn't this statute designed to protect that small number in these clauses?

Mr Berner: Quite likely, but I think you'll find too that people who are after the $20,000 are not the most vulnerable. If they need $20,000, they're making a good buck to start with.

Mr Duncan: With all due respect —

Mr Berner: Is somebody going to hold back a year's wages on them?

Mr Duncan: With all due respect, if you're owed a year and a half's wages and it's $20,000, that's not a good buck. It's probably below minimum wage. So I think those people are vulnerable. I guess what I'm concerned —

Mr Berner: Yes, but the $20,000 is the award, it's not their salary. Their salary's a certain amount and —

Mr Duncan: It's what they're owed.

Mr Berner: Yes.

Mr Duncan: It's what they earned.

Mr Berner: Which would be what, time and a half would be —

Mr Duncan: Then you don't think that restriction is a limitation? The government in its own bill calls it a restriction on recovery of money. So the chamber of commerce here doesn't see that as a restriction?

Mr Berner: It's a restriction, I believe, on the employment standards officer's right to make a ruling. They can still go through the courts and recover —

Mr Duncan: But the argument that's been put is that that's more costly. Frankly, it may cost society more. We may not see a savings. Courts are very expensive; lawyers are very expensive. In fact what the government may be doing is penny wise and pound foolish. That is, you save a little bit here, but now even assuming a worker can access the courts, and there's an issue around accessibility of the courts, even if you can access the courts, maybe that's not the most efficient way of resolving these things.

This is part of the contradiction that we see. On the one hand, we want to give employment standards officers the ability to mediate, but on the other hand we want to further backlog the courts. In our view, there's a mixed message there. What we would like to see, and we agree with you, is a complete review of the act in its entirety. We think that you can find administrative efficiencies without penalizing or without making people more vulnerable. The evidence to date right in the government's own bill: restrictions.

Mr Berner: I'm not sure it's doing any harm. As a matter of fact I think it will improve the administration, which is what you want. It'll make the act more understandable, which is what we want, as well as the workers should know their rights and their ability to take whatever action they have to, and to make the act more understandable will certainly bring that along.

Mr Christopherson: I find it encouraging, fascinating and helpful that you believe that this should be done in one step as opposed to two. Certainly we've been calling for that, the opposition parties. Certainly everybody who represents workers that have been impacted and are losing rights under this bill believes that it ought to be done in one review.

The minister hasn't listened to those arguments. Maybe she will listen to the chamber of commerce in her own backyard. We can only hope. She's pulled back already part of the bill. It wouldn't take that much more to pull back the rest, cancel the hearings and get on with doing a proper public review of the entire bill, so that we know what the agenda is, both public and hidden. We'll wait and see whether she's listening any more to you than she has to us.

I would also like to raise the issue of your statement that you do not want to see changes to the minimum standards for workers. I just have some difficulty understanding how you can believe that Bill 49 doesn't take away rights of workers, because I'm hearing you say that if you did believe that, then you wouldn't support the bill — at least that's the conclusion I'm drawing.

You've heard this morning if you were here earlier, and certainly we've heard in Toronto and in Hamilton, circumstances, evidence from experts, people with firsthand knowledge in the field, that there are individuals who fear for their jobs and their job security in terms of making any claims against employers, and reducing their ability to claim from two years to six months denies them the opportunity when they leave that employment, which is when most of those claims are made, because no longer is the threat over them — the threat's not there any more; they've left or been fired — they are then denied the right to claim for a year and a half of theft. It's theft. If there's money that's owed you, sir, you expect it all back. If I take something from you, you want it back. I really have trouble understanding how you don't think a vulnerable employee has lost some rights.

Mr Berner: He hasn't lost the right. He can go after the employer. It's just that he has to do it more quickly than he had before. He can't sit on his can and just wait and mull it over in his mind. As we've said, the longer you stretch this out, the longer it takes to get the information. The investigation and carrying through of the whole operation would be far more costly and to no avail. He's got six months to do something.

Mr Christopherson: I think the problem is that you characterize it as — I wrote it down — you said "sitting on his can and mulling it over." That may be a circumstance that exists, but the evidence we've heard is of a lot of vulnerable people, many of them are new Canadians, visible minorities, a lot of women, who are terrified. These are not people who are sitting back saying, "What kind of little legal games can I play with my employer?" They're terrified for their jobs, and the only reason they need the two years to go back is because we know that most of those claims are made after they leave their employment, because then the threat has gone. Do you not appreciate that that's the circumstance some workers are in, sir?

Mr Berner: Certainly. They would have left the employment in six months as well. The six-month limit you're unemployed, the two-year limit you're still unemployed. You were saying that they need the two years because they're unemployed. Well, they're unemployed at six months too.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Christopherson, and thank you both for taking the time to appear before us today. We appreciate your presentation.

I don't believe the clerk has been able to identify — is there someone from the Central and Western District CUPE Council here today? No one. No show.

STRATFORD AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: How about the Stratford and District Labour Council? Good morning. Just a reminder, we have 20 minutes for you to make your presentation this morning, and it's up to you to divide that as you see fit between presentation time and questions and answers.

Ms Christine Greason: I want to thank the committee for giving the Stratford and District Labour Council the opportunity to present our views regarding this legislation on behalf of the 4,000-plus organized members and on behalf of the unorganized workers who don't have a voice. It's imperative that this committee know that we speak for all workers. I want to point this out because of the numerous calls that I get from workers in workplaces that do not have a collective voice. These people want to know how to get what is owing to them and what to do about unfair employers. I tell them that they need to go to the Ministry of Labour and get the employment standards division. It's hard to tell these people that I cannot fight on their behalf; I can only direct them. I'm saddened to see this kind of legislation that will make life and access even more intolerable for unorganized workers.

First, I want to say that I am very disturbed that this government would introduce this type of legislation without the prior input from the very people on whom it will have the most impact. Why would a government issue legislative changes without the slightest idea of what these workers will endure? I think you have to be in their place.

It is obvious that these are not just housekeeping changes that the minister would like us to believe. These changes will have a drastic and lasting effect on the workers that end up with unjust and unfair employers. What is really needed is to make changes to legislation that are tougher, improvements and better limitations so workers would not have to bear the brunt of the unjust employer. Instead, this government sees fit to loosen regulations and put the responsibility on workers instead of where they should be. This is not progression but regression.

Some facts on Bill 49:

Under Bill 49, employees will have six months to make a complaint instead of the two years. This means that the ministry will only have to investigate back six months from the date of the complaint, rather than the two-year period, although this bill does allow, if there is proof of recurring violations or if the employer has violated several employees, to do an investigation and order back pay for up to a year.

The Ontario legal aid plan does not cover employment-related cases, and very few legal clinics will assist with employment-related cases. Workers who can't afford a lawyer will have to let their employer get away without paying their just wage or pay for work. I think my computer ate part of this one section.

The extension for appeal in an employment standards officer's decision is increased to 45 days from 15 days, which means an increase in the wait for workers to be without money.

Many workers endure hardships from their employers, especially in the areas of high unemployment. They cannot just tell an employer to take this job and shove it. Employers know that they have the upper hand in these periods of high unemployment and they know that employees are intimidated and will not take the chance of being fired, so it is put up and shut up or get out. This is the worst form of employer intimidation that is being enshrined by government.

Just for an example, a woman I worked with was making a good average wage of $15 an hour until she was laid off. She searched for over a year for a job of any sort. She cleaned houses and she looked after infirm patients. She also worked making French fries just to make ends meet. This woman was educated also. She was a registered practical nurse. She had taken numerous courses to upgrade her skills and she had taken courses on how to start your own business and courses on marketing and computers.

I want to tell you that she is now working for $8.25 an hour, and this job is on the afternoon shift and there is no shift premium. They work 10 hours a day and don't get overtime until they have worked 44 hours. The men in this workplace get $2 an hour more, even though their jobs are not as skilled and less responsible. To top it all off, the employer sent around a letter to the employees thanking them for making $120,000 more than was predicted with fewer hours worked, yet these people weren't even offered a dime, not even a thought of sharing in the good fortune that their labour made for their employer. This is the kind of thing that is going on in the real world and not in the world of common sense.

Just to elaborate on that point, when they discussed about going to the employer — I didn't have an opportunity to write all this in — about getting a raise or even a shift premium, because there are only certain people on the shift, four people on the shift and left with the responsibility, the people are afraid to say anything because of fear of losing their jobs, so they won't even go and talk about getting a raise or even getting a share of what they're making for the employer.

Putting a cap on the money that is owed to employees — I guess the government hasn't indicated what the minimum standard will be yet, when I wrote this anyway — is a gift for the employers and punishment on the employees that make these employers rich off the backs of unorganized workers, as I pointed out previously, and of the most vulnerable in our society.

With this legislation, it is obvious that there are fewer options for workers when the ministry will not enforce the act in situations where they deem the violations may be resolved by other means. It seems this ministry is trying to reduce the number of workers who can to claim their rights under the Employment Standards Act. This legislation is forcing employees to either make a claim with the ESA or take their employer to court, but they cannot do both. I don't think that our law has ever allowed anyone to force an employer to pay twice for the same crime. This is going to be devastating to people who don't understand and end up losing everything and the employer wins again. This reminds me of sweatshops in the El Paso area, only because I had an opportunity to go there and talk to some of the women who work in those sweatshops.

The fly-by-night employers leave without paying their employees, and the employees end up having to look for and force their employer to pay their wages. These employees have to find their employer and get the law to get after them. It is this kind of climate we are creating in the province of Ontario.

The use of private collection agencies will increase the unstable climate that is being created by this legislation. The employees will be pressured to accept low settlements in order for the agency to get its share of the purse. There is no guarantee that contracting out collections to the private sector will be more effective and less costly.

Employment standards provide the basic floor for wages and working conditions for most working people in Ontario. Non-organized workers have come to the realization that the Employment Standards Act is weak and has numerous exclusions and loopholes that come to benefit the employer, and the employee can suffer the burden. Employers have found it quite easy to violate and steal from the workers who make profits for them. They know that only a few employees have the courage to lodge complaints. There are few workers who know what rights they have and how to access these rights.

Over 90% of complaints filed with the employment practices branch are by workers who no longer work for that employer. The ministry offers no protection for the worker against being fired for trying to enforce the law. These workers only get help to collect their termination pay. They don't get reinstatement.

It is estimated that one in three employers violates the basic employment standards, and these violations are widespread and conscious actions of the employer.

These cutbacks to the Employment Standards Act and the changes to other legislation under Labour Minister Witmer are to save money in the operation of the Ministry of Labour in order to finance the Tories' tax break to the rich.

If this government wanted to make genuine improvements to the Employment Standards Act, they would make it easier for workers to attain their rights under the act in a timely manner without the threat and fear of being fired, rather than making it harder by limiting the times for claims and limiting the amount that can be collected through an employment standards claim.

It is time in the province of Ontario to make progressive moves for the workers and not just the employers. The direction of this legislation takes us backwards. Is this the legacy that this government wants to leave for the children of tomorrow, that it's okay for the employers to make a profit at any cost, the American style of survival, everyone for themselves? These are not the kinds of workplaces and employers that I think the young people of today want to endure.

The key issues are very substantial changes, and this government should think again about housecleaning.

Forcing workers to choose between their jobs and their rights gives the green light for laying off staff of the employment practices branch; wipes out the floor of basic workers' rights for both non-union and union workers; caps the amount a worker can claim against an employer to $10,000; sets an unannounced minimum amount a worker can claim; shortens the period that a worker can complain and leaves the ministry's slow time limit untouched; tells poor and low-income workers to go to work where there is no legal aid plan available to pay for a lawyer, and gives private collection agencies the power to negotiate a settlement which could be lower than minimum standards.

In closing, I would hope that with all of the information and the arguments that are being presented, this government will stop this attack on the poor and vulnerable people of this province and begin to make positive changes for the voters who had the confidence to elect them. These changes are not a positive sign for the economy of Ontario. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Greason, and that has left us just under three minutes per caucus. In this round, the official opposition will be the first to ask questions.

Mr Duncan: Thank you very much for your presentation. I do want to explore with you the very last sentence. You said "begin to make positive changes." Unions and workers' representatives have historically advocated that the act is not well enforced and has not been particularly effective as a statute, and I think worker representatives have also historically advocated for a rewrite of the act in that sense. What sorts of changes would you envision that might make the act or some successor act more effective at protecting vulnerable workers, number one, and number two, recognizing that there are limited resources available to governments today to do that?

Ms Greason: I think that rather than going backwards with legislation that protects working people, there should be more emphasis put on the enforcement of what is already in place, therefore entitling employees who work in workplaces with unscrupulous employers to an opportunity to get what's owing to them, because money paid to workers is money being spent in the economy as far as I can see. Your second question was?

Mr Duncan: Just to perhaps rephrase it, the act, in my view, has not been well enforced.

Ms Greason: No.

Mr Duncan: It has not, in my view, been particularly good at protecting vulnerable employees. I guess the question all of us have to ask ourselves, particularly people who represent workers and who speak on behalf of more vulnerable workers, is, what alternatives would we offer to the government? My experience has been that more officers don't necessarily translate to better enforcement, that there have to be some regulatory changes both at the federal and provincial level to do that. Do you have any specific ideas along that line?

Ms Greason: Maybe the government needs to take a stronger look at making sure that employers know that in the province of Ontario unscrupulous attitudes by employers towards workers will not be tolerated and that maybe a fine or a levy be implemented.

I know that even though a lot of the money that's still owed is probably from employers who flee or have gone bankrupt or what not, and is probably not traceable in some aspects, where those employees are going to be left to the welfare rolls, probably most of them, because of situations like that, that employers need to understand that they have an obligation if they're going to provide work in the communities, that they provide decent wages and that they make sure that they pay those wages, that they don't try and rob from some of those people that they are.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Ms Greason, for your presentation. I just want to note that I think that's probably the most succinct encapsulation of everything that's going on that I've seen yet. You've done an excellent job of boiling it down and making it very clear.

I want to go back to an issue I raised with the previous presenters. The government still insists that the move from two years in terms of a claim period to six months is meant to improve things and improve the turnaround time, and we've heard that thought supported by the chamber of commerce and, in fact, the presenter said it would prevent people from sitting around on their cans and mulling things over.

We heard yesterday in Hamilton from OPSEU Local 546, which is the employment standards officers' union representative, who said the following:

"The Ministry of Labour stated in the Expenditure Reduction Strategy Report 1996 to 1998 that by reducing the time frame to file a complaint, this would improve the turnaround time on investigating claims; in other words, a cost-effective and timely enforcement of employment standards. This is not true!

"The two-year time limit is a must for employees with the high unemployment currently facing Ontario. Employees would not complain to their employers of a breach of their employment rights in fear of losing their jobs. The majority of workers are not aware that a two-year limitation even exists."

Which of those two points of view do you believe is the accurate one?

Ms Greason: Employees who definitely feel intimidated are not going to go to their employer and lodge a complaint or even go to the employment standards and get what rightfully belongs to them, because of the intimidation factor.

Just knowing young people who are working part-time and working for minimum wage and what they endure as far as some employers that they deal with, just in a small community, because in small communities you tend to know everybody, and these kids are afraid to say anything about their working conditions or the things that are going on around them because they want to keep their jobs. They have no idea what kind of legislation is there to protect them, absolutely none, because it's not in the education system. There is nothing there for them, unless they have someone they can go to who has some idea of background of legislation, but chances are they're just going to say, "There's nobody there that can do anything for me," and that's a lot of the problem.

Mr Christopherson: So your own experience in this community is one that supports what the employment standards officers themselves say across the province —

Ms Greason: Certainly.

Mr Christopherson: — that there are people who are afraid to make a claim and that the majority of claims are made after they've left their employment and that's why they needed to go back the two years, and therefore, this is a denial and a take-away of a minimum standard that now exists in the law. Is that an accurate reflection?

Ms Greason: That is exactly true, because a lot of people wouldn't even have any idea that there were some laws there to protect them, because they'd be in that situation. We send our children to school and we teach them things and tell them to get a grade 12 education, and they get out in the workforce and they don't even have any idea what laws are there to protect them. They have none. They're the most vulnerable in society also. It's not just the immigrants and new Canadians; it's our teenagers who are coming out of the system, and there is an awful pile of them.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Thank you very much. Certainly many of the concerns that you've raised, as you know, are concerns that have been around for years and years and years. The Employment Standards Act was developed in 1974, and since that time we've seen numerous amendments, we've seen the act become much more complex, we've seen it become more complicated, and at the present time, as you know, it's very difficult for employers, employees and even at times the Ministry of Labour staff to understand.

I guess I would ask you, given that these have been problems that have been ongoing for a long, long time, were you not disappointed that the former government did not attempt to provide the appropriate protection for vulnerable employees in this province?

Ms Greason: I do believe the wage protection plan that was at a maximum of $5,000 for employees was implemented by the previous government and now it's been dropped to $2,000 by your government, and I feel that that was a stepping stone in the right direction.

Hon Mrs Witmer: But do you also know that people in the garment industry, people in telemarketing, one third of people today in this province do not work in traditional jobs? Many of these people do not have appropriate protection under the Employment Standards Act. They, I know, wanted to have protection. In fact, when I was opposition critic, they wrote me letters, they wrote the government letters. There was absolutely no action to make the type of improvements to the act that you're stating need to be made.

Yes, there was one improvement in the EWPP, and that was it, and I think it's absolutely shameful that, when the NDP had the opportunity to provide you with the protection you say you're looking for, there was no action done.

Ms Greason: But, Minister, can I just respond to that, because what your government is doing is regressive. You're talking about sweatshops and garment workers in the industry, and what your government is proposing under this legislation is even more draconian than the cleanup that the NDP was trying to do, the previous government. This is disgraceful to think that you could talk about the sweatshop workers in this way. I was with sweatshop workers in the United States who were having a hell of a fight down there. What our workers have to endure here — if we could ever round them up to let them know what their rights are in the first place, because that's the biggest problem is it's not ingrained in education. That's where we have a problem.

Hon Mrs Witmer: That's exactly what we are endeavouring to do. Our job —

Ms Greason: These changes don't do that.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Our job, and we are having a complete review of the act, will be to set the standards, and we're going to have a full discussion. Then we need to communicate those standards, and we're going to enforce. As you know, we are not now collecting money in order that we can appropriately reimburse employees in this province, and we're endeavouring to do exactly that.

Ms Greason: This isn't going to do that.

Hon Mrs Witmer: Part of the information —

Ms Greason: This is just paying lip-service to the whole problem.

Hon Mrs Witmer: — about the cap, there are 4% of claims at the present time that are above the $10,000 cap. The majority of claims are below that. The average claim is for $2,000, and the majority of people will still have access to the employment standards branch. In fact, if it's above $10,000, you can still use the employment standards branch, but the amount that you receive will only be $10,000, if that's your wish. Also, if your claim is above $10,000 and it involves reinstatement, which means maybe it has to do with pregnancy or parental leave or your refusal to work on Sunday, the employment standards branch will deal with your claim even if it exceeds $10,000. So some of the information that you've presented here is not totally accurate.

Ms Greason: Why are you putting a cap on the $10,000 if you're saying that there's only 4% of people who are collecting over and above $10,000 anyway?

Hon Mrs Witmer: Because I can tell you, we believe that the public's money should be devoted to helping those most in need, and so we are going to deal with the 96% of claims that involve the most vulnerable people. The 4% above the $10,000 are usually people in middle management positions. They involve wrongful dismissal. That's why we believe that we want to help the most vulnerable.

Ms Greason: If your government was actually concerned about the most vulnerable people in the province of Ontario, they would be asking for their input into what needs to be changed in the standards rather than going ahead with an agenda of common sense which makes no sense, to say that they're going to help the vulnerable. You can't dictate to somebody else. That's like trying to tell a child, "No, you can't have that," "No, you're not going to do this," and "No, you're not going to do that," and expecting them to be grateful for it, because it ain't going to work.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Greason. We appreciate your taking the time to make a presentation before us here today.

I'll ask again, in case they were out of the room at the time, whether the last group has a representative here, Central and Western District CUPE Council. Another spot wasted.

WORKERS REPETITIVE INJURY SUPPORT TEAM

The Chair: But I do believe we have a group. A group has very graciously offered to move up a spot, WRIST, the Workers Repetitive Injury Support Team. Thank you very much for helping us stay on schedule here. Ms Green, is it?

Ms Susan Green: Yes.

The Chair: Good morning, and again, we have 20 minutes for you to use as you see fit here.

Ms Green: My name is Susan Green. I'm the elected president of the Workers Repetitive Injury Support Team, Woodstock and area. I represent approximately 100 injured workers in Oxford and Middlesex county.

This is one of those pieces of legislation that seems to require an infomercial. Personally, I'm inclined to call it the Witmer Deal-a-Meal approach to employment standards, where you take this card and you lose these two, and you get this, lose that, and when you get to X number of points, you are done for your employment standards expectations between you and your employer. What a diet. Your employer wins with all kinds of built-in loopholes and escape routes. There is only one major flaw: It won't work.

I worked in a place several years ago now where the employer liked to take advantage of those who did not speak the language or knew nothing of how to pursue their rights or even what rights they had. I think that was probably the first qualification for any of the jobs at his business. All of his employees were either kids just out of school or new Canadians.

My employer had applied to be part of a program through the federal government where they paid a percentage of wages for hiring a female in a non-traditional job, but only for a limited time period. I was hired for that time period only, no more. My job was a non-traditional job. As a result of this job I was hired to do, I received the worst putdowns, jokes, insults and ridicule from the families of the owners and the foreman. The sexist remarks that were shared openly among them did wonders for my morale. I was open for pranks that endangered my health and safety on several occasions, things like loosening of clamps on sheets of steel that were suspended in the air, flipping up my welding helmet as I was welding, pouring water on the steel as I was welding, and the list goes on.

The other employees received racist remarks as to their country of origin and the colour of their skin. They also received the same sort of dangerous type of pranks. No one was left out, it seemed, and no one to complain to about the harassment. The truth was I needed the job or I wouldn't have stayed. I needed to gain more experience and complete more of my apprenticeship so I could get out of this environment. I could do nothing and still keep my job.

Workers' compensation claims were never filed unless you were a member of the family or a friend of the family. In the 12 months I was there, I witnessed several accidents in the plant. Some of them were the direct result of these pranks. Some were minor and some were serious. A broken arm and a severe facial burn received no compensation for lost time. As a matter of fact, both of these employees were terminated for lack of work, yet there were new employees to take their place within a week. But all was not equal. The foreman's son had an epileptic seizure while operating some heavy equipment. Forms were filled in and compensation was collected and he retained his job.

Our regular workweek was considered to be 48 hours per week each and every week. Most of our weeks averaged 55 to 60 hours per week. Even when we tried to schedule a weekend off, there were no guarantees we would get it.

One particular weekend, the last long weekend of that summer, I had asked for it off one month in advance. The Friday night of the long weekend, just as I was closing my toolbox, the owner approached me. He said there were some urgent repairs that needed doing. When I hedged about coming in, he threatened that if I did not come in on Saturday, "then don't come in on Tuesday." The irony of the whole thing is that on Saturday, when I did report for work, the urgent job was to do the brakes on his personal vehicle. He must have had complete trust in my personal integrity even though he had ruined my only vacation with my family for that entire year for his personal safety needs.

To top it all off, this owner had developed a method of stealing from his employees that had taken place for years. It was quite simple: overtime was just not paid. After I had been there a couple of weeks, I questioned the fact that no overtime was paid. First off, I was told that because they were an agricultural-based operation, they weren't required to pay overtime, but because of the owner's generosity, in lieu of overtime there would be a generous Christmas bonus, a type of profit-sharing. Your share would be equal to a percentage of your overtime units, provided, of course, you met all the other requirements. Profit-sharing for me that year equalled two chickens from the owner's personal hobby farm. This seemed to be hardly sufficient to cover one week's overtime, let alone the whole year.

My period of employment was finished. I had been hired for specific jobs in a specific time period and the federal top-up was over. I felt ripped off, abused and taken advantage of. I no longer feared losing my job; I didn't have one. I questioned the Ministry of Labour about this procedure and then launched a formal complaint. After several months of investigation, a cheque was ordered to be issued from my now former employer.

In order to get the money that was owed to me, I had to personally go to his office to see him by appointment. He would not mail the cheque. When I got there he sent his office staff to lunch. I was told that he felt cheated by my going to the Ministry of Labour and complaining and that I had better not ever expect to work again. He said he knew I was a troublemaker right from the start. He was very displeased by the fact that he had to pay his employees what was owed to them by him, and told me this in no uncertain terms in his now rather obvious displeasure bordering on rage. After all, we did get our Christmas bonuses and we should be happy to get that. I found out later from another employee who had quit because of the working conditions that this had proved to be quite a substantial amount. He had not paid overtime since he became an owner, and that was approximately six years.

If this deal-a-meal type of legislation was in place then, every other employee there would have been cheated out of their fair wages. They did not know their rights. They did not know where to turn to receive justice. Yes, I would still receive my rightful pay, but the others would have just got chickens probably to this very day. The only people to benefit from this type of house-keeping that is being done with Bill 49 are these same type of employers who exploit their workers knowingly and willingly.

These scenarios happen all too often and the people who are being exploited are not aware of their rights. Without strong legislation to prevent these ripoffs from occurring, without strong penalties for breaking the mockery of these new employment standards, the only people who lose consistently are the very people this legislation originally intended to protect.

Yes, there is a need for changes to the Employment Standards Act, but once again this government is letting the vast majority of the electorate down and feeding the coffers of the business community, making it easier for them to swindle the very people who help them earn their profits.

Capping the amount of what an employee was owed? Very questionable. I do not understand why this is even an issue. If the money is owed, then it should be paid — all paid, with interest, with heavy fines and penalties being issued to the negligent employer, especially if it was done intentionally. After all, they did make their profitable gains from illegal methods and out of the pockets of those they exploited. If they had been paying what they should have all along, the amount wouldn't be as high. It could never have reached the maximum. The employee rightfully earned the money and the employer committed theft by not paying — plain and simple.

Bill 7, health and safety act, employment equity, Employment Standards Act, new directions for WCB, especially with the effects of each act interwoven with the others — I know the problems in the system. I see the results of these problems every day of my life: friends, members of WRIST, and myself. I deal with people, some of whom are so depressed that suicide attempts have been made, people who before an injury had a totally different personality and a totally different life, a totally different set of everyday life's problems, not survival problems.

I implore you to search yourself. I'm not asking for sympathy for these people. I'm asking you to look hard at what this legislation is and ask yourself: "Do I want to create more of a problem than what already exists or do I want to start filling the gaps that are already there?" The people who have to deal with the problems, listen hard to them. Listen and learn. Then ask yourself this: Would Bill 49 do anything to help with the personal story I've enclosed for your reading at a later time? This is her life. She couldn't be here to make her submission. She's very upset right now. Please read and put yourself in the shoes of those already suffering from the gaps, or the shoes of the countless numbers of people yet to be hurt by these gaps that you now propose to widen.

The Chair: Thank you very much. That leaves us three minutes per caucus and this round will commence with Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for your presentation. I want to stay focused on the issue of the circumstances workers are faced with in some cases, where they have an unscrupulous employer, where there is no collective agreement, where it's minimum wage or barely above that, few benefits, and people's rights are being violated.

It's important for us in these hearings to get on the record very clearly — I think there are a lot of people, and maybe some government members, certainly some of the presenters from the business community, who don't understand, to give them the benefit of the doubt, that this kind of world exists, and I think we need to make that case very clearly so that we can refute things like "people sitting around on their can mulling over." I don't mean that as a personal attack on the individual, but I think that's indicative of some of the thinking.

So talk to me a bit more about circumstances you know of and what it's like, in as clear a way, to paint that picture for people who think that's like an old, bad movie, that those sorts of things don't really exist.

Ms Green: A lot of the women I deal with, particularly the ethnic women, are in job situations where they can't complain. We have one particular business in the community I come from where the majority of their paycheques are picked up by their husbands. The women don't even see their paycheques. So they don't even have rights within their own home, let alone rights within the business community. The husband gets them the job. They are sent to work. They do their job. They have fears of losing their job. They have nowhere to turn.

Mr Christopherson: How rare are those kinds of things or is that —

Ms Green: This is the garment industry and in the garment industry it's quite common. We have three garment industries within Woodstock that I know of and it's quite regular that the husbands are there to pick up the cheques and to make sure their wives are at work, and just go to work and do your thing. The employment standards are gone. They're sweatshops. There are cockroaches falling off the ceiling all day. They make minimum wage. They work maximum hours and the conditions are not good.

Mr Christopherson: Would it be helpful if they had their rights posted in the workplace? Do you think that would be a start?

Ms Green: It would have to be posted in multiple languages and that would be a good start. They're not aware they're supposed to be getting overtime after 44 hours. They're not aware that their employers aren't allowed to harass them, and that can be sexual harassment, that can be anything. They're just not aware. They just accept it and go on. They don't want to lose their job. They can't afford to lose their job.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham East): Thank you, Susan, for a very impassioned presentation. I sense a very sincere line of commitment to this. There are just a couple of things to clarify your particular case. How long were you at this particular shop?

Ms Green: I was there for a year. Their contract with the federal government for top-up on my wages was one year.

Mr O'Toole: Would you say there are a lot of people in a similar situation, high turnover and that kind of thing, a year, around that?

Ms Green: Where I particularly worked it was seasonal work. They would bring them in at the first part of the spring and they would be gone by the end of September.

Mr O'Toole: It reminds me of, like you say, your case, a very vulnerable group of people. I want to get into the change in time limits, as I understand are recommended improvements to the Employment Standards Act and the motivation or reason for the six months. You said it very succinctly with the paragraph that starts, "If this deal-a-meal type of legislation was in place," etc. I really quite sincerely myself feel that the reason for the six months is to ensure that especially employees like yourself who are informed have a duty to protect their brothers or sisters.

Ms Green: But I wasn't informed until after I was out of that job.

Mr O'Toole: But you are doing that now, educating the people. You just go on to say — and again I'm doing this in a very sort of harmonious way. I really think that if you had employees more aware of the law — these public hearings will do that — and of their rights and they were quicker to bring them to the surface, there would be fewer employees receiving those chickens at Christmas. Really, that action and responsibility, rather than delaying it for two years and the persons who are coming in the door a year behind you, a year behind you, it doesn't do anything to improve the system, and the system today from the evidence I have, and I don't want to bore you, doesn't work. Two thirds aren't collected and very few of the claims ever get particularly registered in due process.

We're trying to improve scarce resources, focusing on those most vulnerable. I really sincerely want you to go away believing that's the commitment of the minister today. Do you not see that your duty you're doing today of bringing the issue to the surface quicker will improve the whole system's responsiveness to those kinds of workplaces?

Mr Christopherson: You didn't even want to hold the public hearings.

Interjection: We're doing it, though.

Ms Green: What I see happening is that the six-month limitation is a way to raise that quarter on the dollar. It's a way of chopping that in half.

Mr O'Toole: I don't want to get into a debate, but clearly in the act the initial intention is that all of those amounts owed would be directed to the employees' entitlement. The fees that were going to be charged by the collection agency would be over and above. The director would set a fee over and above that amount. If you read clearly in the act, section 28, you'll see that's the intention.

There are many cases where bankruptcies and going out of business occurs where you do anything to get a settlement, and in that case the employee, those persons with the claim, must sign off on that agreement. It's not just arbitrarily arrived at. There are provisions where it's clearly with the consent of the applicant.

I think there's a lot of rhetoric, and I for one at the end of this process, we want to certainly make improvements. The intent is not to give less. All throughout this particular piece of legislation, in the preamble, it says that the minimum standards shall not be diminished. In the case of where there's a collective agreement, today there are changes to what are the standards. Vacation is negotiated, time off is a negotiated item, overtime entitlements, hours of work, all of those things are part of a collective process. All we're doing is embellishing that and allowing unions, which like the United Steelworkers this morning are very well researched; they know what their internationals are getting. So have confidence and have faith and trust that we are really trying to make improvements.

Ms Green: In the six years that I was there — okay? — I was the first one, the first one.

Mr O'Toole: I thought you were there a year.

Ms Green: I was there for a year but in that six years of operation I was the first one. That employer went for six years without paying.

1050

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): Thank you very much for your presentation. These types of presentations should impress all members of the committee as to developing a law that will protect persons such as yourself and others who have been victimized. I happen to know what can happen to your eyes if a welding helmet's pulled off. It's not just that a spark could hit you, but looking at welding can be very dangerous to the eyes whether you're struck by anything or not. So I understand how that could be.

You talk about awareness quite a bit. It seems that many employees are not aware of their rights, and they seem to investigate it as a last resolve. They want to keep their job, they simply don't know that they have recourse and they think it's normal. I've had people speaking to me about what they thought was normal, and it is not. So I understand your call for awareness.

The other thing too is that the government has said that 96% of the claims are under $10,000. You said you were employed for a year under a federal program. Was that the maximum amount of time that program ran for an individual?

Ms Green: Yes, it was.

Mr Hoy: The employer went right to the maximum. The program was a year; he used it right there.

Ms Green: Yes.

Mr Hoy: So if we have a minimum put in place, is it possible that an employer would know this is only a maximum, in his view, of $10,000, that it could be abused?

Ms Green: Oh, most definitely. They abuse what's already there. It's quite obvious, with the fact that we had this profit-sharing scheme that ended up being two chickens. They abused the system, clearly and succinctly. By putting the $10,000 maximum, it's just another loophole, another escape route. The most they're going to pay is $10,000 to one employee when they complain, not the whole group.

The Chair: Thank you again, Ms Green, for making presentation and for moving up and helping us fill the morning session.

WATERLOO REGIONAL LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: The next group making a presentation is the Waterloo Regional Labour Council. Good morning. Again, we have 20 minutes for you this morning, to divide as you see fit. I wonder if you folks would be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter, please.

Ms Carrol Anne Sceviour: I'm Carrol Anne Sceviour.

Mr Mike Cooper: I'm Mike Cooper, chair of the political action committee.

Mr Bob Cruickshank: I'm Bob Cruickshank, president of the Waterloo Regional Labour Council, which supports 20,000 unionized workers in the region of Waterloo. I'm here on behalf of the Waterloo Regional Labour Council, and I'm pleased to respond to the minister's proposed changes to the Employment Standards Act. Unfortunately, I do so with little hope, as all too often we struggle to be heard, and even when we are, we wonder if anybody is listening. I might get better comments out of somebody than this guy in the wheelchair, I might be better talking to them, when I've listened to hearings with this Tory government.

Will anything we say convince the government to bring about substantial changes to a bill that clearly does not improve the Employment Standards Act, but benefits employers at the expense of the most vulnerable in the workforce, or will it merely be used as an excuse for consultation, where we express our concerns, nothing changes and the bill is enacted as it was originally written with all but a few minor changes?

Who are the vulnerable working people?

It's the person working as a painter for an owner-operated business whose employer reduces his wages because the employer does not agree with the time sheets submitted by the employee. The same employer provides no supervision and keeps records poorly or not at all.

It is the assistant manager of a hotel who has not had a day's vacation in three years and who received no vacation pay either, whose employer claims that he has been given all the vacation he is entitled to. The same employer keeps no records of vacation entitlement, provides no vacation statement to the employee and admits that hotel work does not permit a vacation of two weeks together, in fact not even one week at a time but rather a day here and there.

It is the worker who erects fences for a contractor doing work for the Ministry of Transportation whose employer had an understanding that employees would get a flat hourly rate and a paid lunch break, but no overtime for hours worked in excess of 44 hours per week or in excess of 55 hours per week when engaged in work incidental to roadbuilding.

It is the worker in a riding stable who acts as a trail guide and performs other functions and for this receives a meagre payment from a company which claims she is not an employee, but is disciplined if she reports for work late.

It is the hairdresser who agrees to work for $20 a week plus commission, but a lack of customers meant that the commission does not even bring it up to minimum wage.

It is the workers in a lumber yard whose boss has them sign a letter waiving their rights to overtime. The boss would simply adjust the workers' hourly rate to reflect the amount earned at a straight time rate.

You may think cases like these are unbelievable, that they are purely hypothetical, that it would never happen in Ontario, but they're all true. They are taken from the Ministry of Labour's public records, and in every case I've cited the employer appealed the decision of the ministry, insisting the worker was not owed the money.

How much money are we talking about? Is it $1,000, is it $100, or is it merely $50? For some in this room, $50 may not seem like much, but for others it's more than they make in a day. Remember, $6.85 per hour is only $54.80 for an eight-hour day.

Bill 49 gives the minister the right out to set out a minimum amount for a claim through regulation. Workers who make a claim below the minimum, which is yet unknown, will be denied the right to file a complaint or even have an investigation. So what happens to the workers whose employers refuse to pay them for a statutory holiday or for a few hours overtime? How often will the employer be able to get away with that?

If you think this will not happen, then consider the cases which were brought to the board under the existing legislation and consider what some employers will attempt to do under a watered-down version. Statistics from the Ministry of Labour's employment practice branch report state that in 1994-95 employers were assessed $64 million, 74% of which was not collected. The most frequent reason given for not complying was the employer simply refused to pay. You've got no teeth in your bill — no teeth at all. You can't force anybody to pay if they don't want to pay. You ask how you can enforce it and you keep saying the NDP should have done it when it was in power. The NDP is not in power; you people are in power. Improve it.

As I said before, $50 may not be much for some in this room, but for many in this province it's more than they earn for a full eight-hour workday. As you keep saying, you make an order to comply with that — you can make a court order and make them pay. All it takes is some of your lawyers to do the paperwork and you've got it done.

How many other cases are there like these that go unreported at a time when so many will put up with just about anything to get, if not to keep, a job, no matter how bad the job may be? People still define themselves by their job, because the job determines not only where and how well they will live, but their very status in the community. When have you heard someone say proudly, "I'm on unemployment" or "I'm on welfare"? Everybody needs a job, everybody should have the right to a job and everybody should have standards when they have that job.

Why does the government want to change the act as it exists now? Employers argue that they need greater flexibility in order to manage the workplace and improve their competitiveness. However, the existing act gives them an incredible amount of flexibility. It says 48 hours a week are the normal working limits for most workers in Ontario. In an emergency employers can make you work more hours than the normal limit. If your union agrees, your employer can arrange a regular workday that is more than eight hours long, a concession that many of us in this community have had to give to our employers to keep our jobs.

Employers can get a ministry permit forcing workers to work more than 48 hours in a week. When a company hires you, it can insist as a condition of employment that you agree to work a compressed workweek or excess hours. Coffee breaks or other rest periods are at the discretion of the employer. Many employees such as firefighters, home workers, domestic employees, janitors and farm workers have limited protection under the current Employment Standards Act in areas such as hours of work and overtime. The act as it presently exists is full of loopholes that favour the employer. Employers already have the right to contract out of the minimum standards of the act in exchange for a "greater right or benefit."

In the same way the employer operates a business, always looking for the greatest potential for return on every facet of their operation, they surely must understand that their own employees have the right to expect something in return for giving an employer increased flexibility in the workplace. Unfortunately in today's job market, some employers have the attitude, "Be glad you have a job, and if you don't want to work here, I can get a hundred others to do that." When an employer talks about flexibility, they mean using multiskilled workers and part-time or contract workers, to whom they can pay ever-decreasing wages to maximize their profits.

If an employer has a vacation entitlement that exceeds the act, does that mean he or she should not be entitled to pay for overtime?

If an employee has a severance package that exceeds the act, does this mean that he or she should be prepared to give up statutory holidays?

When is enough enough? While those in unorganized workplaces remain the most vulnerable, we in organized workplaces are also under attack with the amendments being proposed here today. I am tired of employers constantly asking for relief, claiming that we don't understand the realities of the new economy and the global marketplace with imports from low-wage, no-employment-standards-act countries. How is it then that Canadian exports, many of which are produced by highly unionized workers who enjoy standards far above the statutory minimums, continue to be competitive in the global market? As well, why do the wages and working conditions of workers in the personal service sector have to be reduced? Dry cleaners, restaurants and cleaning services, for example, are not competing in the global marketplace since these services they perform cannot be provided offshore. Telling workers that they don't understand economical realities when they've experienced it on a first-hand basis, is unrealistic.

Tell that to the thousands of our former members who are unemployed or underemployed, since we now have such lean and mean workplaces.

Tell that to Charlie MacDonald, a 43-year-old skilled tradesman who lost his job when the north plant closed in December 1992 and hasn't worked at his trade since because he's been told he's too old at 43.

Tell that to the employees of a local auto parts supplier who gave up $3,000 in benefits and wages during a three-year contract and who haven't had a wage increase in five years. Are you listening, Mike? Incidentally, they produce more now with fewer employees than they ever did.

Tell that to Bob Eccles, a 30-year employee of the former Epton Industries, whose employees took massive wage and benefit cuts in 1983 so the company could survive. These wage cuts were not recouped until 1992. Despite the concessions given at the bargaining table and the infusion of government funds, the company closed in 1995. Requests for an inquiry have been ignored.

Tell that to the employees of Uniroyal Goodrich in Kitchener, who were forced to work a brutal continental work week so that the company could have continuous production. This continued for three years, resulting in broken marriages and lives, until the union convinced the company to change to a 12-hour core. Now employees get two weekends off a month instead of one — some progress.

We are tired of the rhetoric from employers and big business who claim that we do not understand the realities of the new economy.

Tell that to the 1,000 people lucky enough to get an application for the 50 jobs at Budd Canada this spring. There are many more who lined up overnight, only to be turned away. That's economy. That's the reality of this, and this act does nothing to help the workers.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Cruickshank. We have just over two and a half minutes per caucus, and this time the questioning will commence with the government, Mr O'Toole.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much. This was very definitely a blow-by-blow description of what the last five years have been really all about. The current act that you've described for me is all the more proof that changes must be made.

Mr Cruickshank: Changes must be —

Mr O'Toole: But we're here today to listen to you for suggestions to make improvements to the act. That's the real issue here.

Mr Christopherson: After we forced you to have public hearings.

Mr Cruickshank: You were forced to get into public hearings.

Mr Christopherson: Don't be so dishonest.

Interjection: Oh, David, you're a hero.

Mr O'Toole: With all respect to David, he did fight that we have public hearings, but this is a two-phase process. The minister wants to make real change to improve the act, so could we have some of those suggestions?

Mr Cruickshank: You know, you keep going on that you can have a claim in six months and you keep going on about what the last government did. You're not doing any changes. You're making it worse. There's no question about that; you're making it worse. Six months to make a claim? Tell your business friends that they can't claim any money owing to them after six months. Tell your business friends that they can't claim any more than $10,000. Why are you attacking the workers of this province? They'll tell you why: so you can give tax breaks to your rich friends, and that's the whole reality.

Here's a cartoon and, I'll tell you, this cartoon says it all about this government. Look at this. This government is getting patted on the head by God damn big business as you throw everything out — environment standards, every kind of standards under the sun you're throwing out, just to get a 30% tax cut.

Mr O'Toole: In all reasonableness, I'm an average person, a working person, as well. What I'd say to you —

Mr Cruickshank: What do you work at? Listen, you're playing to the people who are paying your wages.

The Chair: Order. You're sitting next to a former MPP. Let's have a little respect for the people who are in the current position. Okay?

Mr Cruickshank: Let them have a little respect for the employees.

Mr O'Toole: We're accountable at the end of the day. In four years we will account to the people. But I really want to make one point, that I think the changes we're making are for the very reasons you said. The economy right now is almost crippled, and you said that in your closing comments. The real economy is that there really are no jobs, and the jobs you mentioned, the restaurants, aren't controlled offshore. Those are the jobs that technically the students — people are retiring earlier and they're going back and taking other jobs. Retired people are contracting back to their original employers. There are many changes in the workplace. We need to work together to improve the standards and not to just have more of the same. To leave the act as it is would be a complete travesty and, I think you would agree with me, it doesn't work.

Mr Cooper: I think we should talk about credibility here. If you look at the previous government, on every piece of legislation that was brought forward by the New Democrats, your party filibustered, stalled, prolonged, made us go forever, and that's why we couldn't bring in new legislation. The minister was talking about, why didn't the New Democrats do it? It was because your party stalled on everything we wanted to do and we didn't have time. We had more important things to deal with, such as getting this province back to work and fixing the 42 years of Tory problems that were created. That's why we didn't get around to doing it.

Talk about credibility. What have you done since you've been elected? You've killed everything that working people have tried to get. To sit there and say you're talking about protecting the vulnerable people, what did you do to the Advocacy Act? What did you do to Bill 40? What are you doing to the environment now? What are you doing to the tenants in this province? You are not protecting the little people and the vulnerable people. You're going out to try to make it better for the big, rich people in the province of Ontario. You're not protecting the working people at all.

Mr O'Toole: I think you've got to look at the number of jobs that have been created —

The Chair: Sorry, Mr O'Toole. The official opposition. Mr Duncan.

Mr Duncan: I want to come back to a discussion we had earlier this morning. I don't know if you were present. The government is trying to suggest that not only are they not harming the vulnerable workers, but they're also trying to suggest that somehow Ontario is just doing what everybody else is. On Monday we had a presentation from Professor Judy Fudge, one of the leading experts on employment standards in this country. I now have the Hansard transcript of that and I'd like to ask your views on this.

Making reference to the minister's statements about the minimum standards that they are proposing and how they compare to other jurisdictions, Professor Fudge said if any of her students had described the bill in this way she would have said it was negligent misrepresentation.

She goes on to state: "I want to look at three basic areas: the time limitation periods, the monetary cap and the privatization of collections....In British Columbia, you have six months from the termination of your employment to bring a claim, not from the fact of violation, and you have up to two years of money that you can claim. So this statement today" — and I'm quoting — "was perhaps misleading. So she should talk to her staff about getting proper training to read legislation in other jurisdictions. It's simply untrue.

"What this is, a six-month limitation period, is the lowest in Canada. In certain jurisdictions, there's no limitation period. In the federal jurisdiction, there's three years; in BC, there's two years; in Ontario, there's been two years."

My question to you is this: The government is trying to present an argument that somehow they are not lowering standards, number one, and what they're doing, number two, is not out of the ordinary. It's our view that (a) they are lowering standards, and (b) they are deliberately misleading the public about what this act is all about. Would you or would you not concur with that?

Mr Cooper: Of course we concur with that. I think what we're doing here and what this government's doing is a race to the bottom. What they're doing is taking the lowest standard. Their argument is that most of the provinces, or the majority of the provinces, have six months. That's what they're doing, they're racing to the bottom. On every piece of legislation, they're going to the lowest common denominator.

That was one of the big things the labour movement fought a few years back on the free trade agreement, that we would be racing to the bottom. I think we're seeing that happen right now, especially when you're talking about environment and employment standards. We've got to compete with these other countries so we've got to go to the lowest common denominator.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation, all of you. I think you've hit the nail on the head. It took till we got into the backyard of the Minister of Labour herself before all hell broke loose and we really got down to what this is really all about.

I also want to acknowledge for the Hansard that indeed former MPP Mike Cooper is a part of this delegation. Mike has an excellent reputation and a long-time record of standing up and fighting for the rights and needs of working people, and he continues to do that as a private citizen. I'm proud to have served with him in the Legislature and I'm proud to be with him here again today.

I also want to comment on Mr O'Toole, who continues — and that's why I spoke out of turn — to try to take some kind of credit for listening to the people of Ontario. You are a government that passed the anti-worker Bill 7 without one day of public hearings, where you completely revamped the Ontario Labour Relations Act and did not invite the public. In fact, you fought off any opportunity for the public to have input. The only reason we're here today is because the NDP, with the support of the Liberals and the labour movement, forced you to come out and face the public. I find it insulting, John, that you would try to take credit for that, and I ask that you cease and desist from suggesting to people that you're pleased to be here. You're only here because you were brought kicking and screaming.

I also want to make note that in the presentation you talk about Epton Industries, and I believe — please correct me if I'm wrong — that's an example where the current Minister of Labour was under the gun because those employees wanted their full rights under the employee wage protection plan. The minister checked and found that it fit under the wire before her new regulation took place and she announced with great pride to the citizens of her community, "Don't worry; you'll get the full amount." When it's in her backyard it's good to have the full amount, but for the rest of Ontario workers, you can all live with the cutback amount of only $2,000. I think that's hypocrisy in the extreme. I'd appreciate any comments you have on that, because I know that issue is one that rubs all of you.

If there's time left after you comment on that, I'd like to know what your level of faith is, because the government members have asked you to have faith, that when they do the second phase of their review of the Employment Standards Act, they'll make it better for workers. How much faith do you have they're going to do that?

Mr Cooper: For the first part, on the Epton Industries, the one thing the minister has consistently refused to do, and there have been a number of letters written to the minister on this subject, is have a full public inquiry on why the place closed down and what exactly happened there. She still refuses to respond to that.

As for faith, I don't think anybody in the room has faith.

The Chair: Thank you all for coming and making your presentation here before us here today.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, LOCAL 677

The Chair: United Steelworkers of America is our next group up.

Mr John Cunningham: Local 677.

The Chair: Oh, I'm sorry; it's not on our listing there. Local 677. Good morning. We have 20 minutes for you to use as you see fit.

Mr Cunningham: Thank you very much. My name is John Cunningham. I'll ask these two gentlemen to introduce themselves.

Mr Wayne Samuelson: I'm Wayne Samuelson. I'm a member of the local. I'm a former president.

Mr Cooper: Mike Cooper, chairman of the political action committee for USWA, Local 677.

Mr Cunningham: Thanks for the opportunity to speak today, Mr Chairman and committee members. I'm president of USWA, Local 677, representing 1,000 workers at a tire manufacturing facility here in Kitchener.

Bill 49 was portrayed by the current government as "facilitating administration and enforcement by reducing ambiguity," but this is cost-cutting with no sense of reality that could be attached, as it will increase ambiguity, not decrease it. The government was machiavellian in announcing the bill while the OFL was out of town, then feigning surprise at labour's outrage by saying that what was presented was merely technical amendments.

The government is trying to spear the labour movement in the side, but the insidious injury is to the unorganized. The government is selling off public assets and the rights of all working people.

With the promise of a review and restructuring of the act set for reading in January of this year, these are hardly mere technical changes but are the window dressing for the main event. In the Conservative government, no one said that the level playing field had to be horizontal.

On flexible standards, considering that each successive government has never encouraged compliance and responded only to individual complaints, to unionized workers this disregard of the prior floor of rights is a grave hardship, but to the unorganized it is plainly taking away basic rights which represent the most fundamental of working rights.

The "bad boss" bill allows the collective agreement to prevail over the minimum current standards. The government supposes that bargained rights confer greater rights when those matters are assessed together. The problem with such on-again, off-again legislation is that conferred greater rights are determined by whom?

Such a condition existed in the WCB act and was called "deeming." In Ontario, we deemed that permanently injured people could be parking lot attendants, never mind that few, if any, such jobs were real or occupied by many people who were disabled before the word "deeming" was pressed into service. One can find the same redundancy in job programs where overkill is used to train thousands of meat cutters where several hundreds of projected jobs may exist.

Employers will ignore the floor of rights, overriding the legal standards of overtime, hours of work, public holidays, vacation pay and severance pay, and the future of common work standards of lighting, heating and safety are only a step away from being gutted.

Some will ask, "Where do you find such an example of minimum standards that adversely affect the workplace?" In 1991, our employer shut down the Strange Street plant, throwing 1,400 people permanently out of work. They informed our plant that if we didn't open up the contract in midterm, turning from a traditional Monday-to-Friday to a continental schedule, they would close our plant too. In 21 days, under the gun, we voted in new hours-of-work standards. The company ignored the contractual ability to schedule weekend crews and this brought disaster to our people.

That schedule brought marital and family breakups in vast numbers. It brought stress and mental breakdown to people in every shape and size. How did hours of work do that? It did it because we only had one weekend in four and worked 56 hours straight before a day off. We worked seven days in a row, rotating between three shifts. No legal definition can hide that skilful manipulation of what a workweek is to sanitize it for general public consumption, to make it sound more harmless. This did not allow people to participate in society in any meaningful way, and the company refused to recognize the suffering because we were open for business.

Conferring greater rights is an issue of apples and oranges. Our local signed a document that "both parties agreed to resolve each issue in a manner consistent with cost parity to the previous eight-hour schedule," after forcing the company to a 12-hour shift in 1995. The problem is that our corporation can only recognize money as a cost and cannot and will not recognize the human cost that is so important to all workers, unorganized and organized. Is that not how the public arrived at common standards in the first place? I guarantee that employers will hold out dollars and cents as a meaningful standard, without even seeing that oranges nurture working people far beyond a cost. Since 1991, my people have learned that there are many things far more important than the almighty paycheck. In 1991, the minimum employment standards didn't save our people. What would have been the demands from the company if they had been able to "confer greater rights"? Would we have ended up working 64 hours straight? What is the human cost of being open for business at anyone's interpretation?

The government keeps stating that the key to all labour relations is internal self-reliance, yet it keeps on stripping away any legislation that may have given powers to mandated self-determination. If employer groups and the governments have not recognized that a huge inequity of power lies on the side of the employer, as a president of 1,000 members, rest assured, you have the upper hand. Self-reliance only comes with powers that are equally mandated.

The flexible standard, which is an oxymoron in terms, will not bring labour peace to Ontario. With everything on the table, the chance of settlement in our plant is much more unachievable and damn near impossible for the newly organized small service or retail workplaces. Where's my local's refund for doing your government's job?

The very essence of a government is to produce and enforce standards or laws for the good of all, not just the recognition of cost to business. There is a basic cost of doing business which cannot be avoided unless this government believes that corporations come before the basic essentials of life. Harris has wanted labour unrest and the authors of this bill are providing that atmosphere, where change and the erosion of minimum entitlements are the rule. The result is a diminishing standard of life and working conditions in Ontario, which spells unrest.

Those who drafted the bill should recognize the need for minimum standards that our old act provided and absolutely alter Bill 49. Local 677 stands in opposition to the bill as a whole.

On enforcement: The disappearance of enforcement and investigative powers of the Ministry of Labour is an abdication of power. The cancellation of the grievance settlement officers program is a sad example of a success being overlooked for a few dollars saved. The GSO program was hailed by both company and union alike and truly brought labour peace.

Bill 49 requires that all employment standards complaints be taken through the grievance procedure. Local 677 has, on average, 175 grievances a year with an average of 15 cases that proceed to some form of arbitration. The company can currently fire someone and it can take as long as a year and a half to arbitration to receive a written judgement. Arbitration costs can run as high as $70,000 per year. People lose homes and families in the interim on unjust discipline.

Now that we have the extra onus of representation and must arbitrate, who will pay or absolve my local of the costs of a "bull in the china shop" employer? They flagrantly inform us they will do as they please and suffer the legal fallout at a later date. This is simply opening our contracts. The contract is between the employer and ourselves, and you overstate your purpose and powers. Contract language is built up over many years, and to deem the whole of the Employment Standards Act into all contracts demonstrates either your ignorance of the collective bargaining process or your continual lust to bring workplace unrest and violence to Ontario.

Enforcement is intended to be a privatized deal. The private sector enforcing public legislation, instead of by tender, should private enforcement personnel be elected like sheriffs in the United States? Not. We as Canadians depend on the government to supply enforcement of legislation, not to hand it to the very people we wish protection from.

Arbitrators now make rulings that the employment standards officer rendered in the past. In the abstract, arbitrators are not bound by the maximums or minimums of the act, yet are lacking the investigative tools of former ESOs, which is sure to aid the employers seeking to disguise actions or schemes aimed at getting around the intent of the act and regulations. Where does the union get that information from? Must we subpoena and probe where the government would not or could not?

Enforcement for non-unionized employees: The old act was based on "what an employer owes an employee is to the most part what the employer had to pay." If you try through Bill 49, with maximums in place, you cannot seek full redress through the courts and could face lengthy legal wrangling, huge expense. This is still a loss of a civil right. If people cannot afford an avenue because of the barriers in front of an avenue, it's still a loss.

Filing within two weeks for the act or civil law is clearly unrealistic and a sham. If we suddenly fired every person in this room today, do you really think that you could know the three or four acts necessary to understand your rights and make a competent decision in two weeks? If you answer yes, you are a lawyer or a serving politician who shouldn't be allowed to answer in the first place. This is plainly putting handcuffs on the most vulnerable in society. Local 677 stands opposed to the manipulation of all workers through Bill 49.

Maximum claims: The maximum of $10,000 is to the employer's advantage, and clearly many workers are owed wages for long periods of time totalling more than $10,000. Many cannot afford lawyers when there is closure or dismissal involved, and this stimulates the worst employers to breach any or all standards.

Stop hiding in the bush. Spell out the proposed minimum. Please admit that minimum will be an asset to bad employers who can keep their violations contained under a six-month period to evade any legal penalties.

On the use of private collectors: Private operators have the power to collect amounts owing under the act, taking away the power from the MOL's employment practices branch. The ministry has always said that its problem in collection or enforcement of standards has been the employer's refusal to pay or play fair. The present government's continuing answer in all bills and action is to absolve itself from liability or responsibility. The government — whether Bill 49, the omnibus bill, Bill 7 — will absolve itself and leave unions and all Ontarians to the business wolves. If you don't want to govern because of the costs, get out of the counting house. Companies should also recognize and have their eyes open to the fact that Bill 49 will mean substantial increases in the cost of their negotiating and operating of their businesses.

The fee of the collector may be more than the amount to be collected, including seeking the approval of the director where settlement is under 75%, thereby allowing suspect discretionary powers with other people's money. Those under the poverty line may have to pay a fee to a collector. Are there no ethical questions to be raised by the authors? People are not commercial transactions. Public enforcement is desirable and must be preserved, and if it is lacking, then let's improve on it.

In the same manner, the government has reduced payments to WCB claimants on the perverse theory that if no money is available the injured will heal quicker. Bill 49 reduces the earned and owed payment on an equally perverse theory that paying money owed to workers is an unfair barrier to thriving business in Ontario.

Local 677 is gravely concerned that employees, particularly the most vulnerable, will be pressured to agree to settlements of less than the full amount as collectors will argue, if only for reasons of expediency, that less is better than nothing.

On limitations: Bill 49's proposed amendments changes a number of periods in the act. Most damning is the changing of the old two years' to six months' back pay from the time of filing. Complaints are usually filed only after the employment relationship is severed either by quitting or changing employers. This is a major restriction for workers denied their rights for a longer period of time and who can't afford civil litigation.

Workers who fail to file must take their employers to court. In contrast, the ministry shall have two years from the day a complaint was filed to conduct its investigation and another two years of enforcement of the payment of moneys owed. Added up, this means waiting up to four years for moneys being paid that are owed, minus collectors' fees. You must be Hood Robin, who robs from the poor and legislates to the rich.

Lesser, positive amendments: Local 677 does give credit for the amendments of entitlement for a vacation for two weeks per year which will accrue whether active at work or absent due to illness or leave. Many locations are ahead of Ontario, and this is catching up.

The pregnancy and parental leave amendments that accumulate seniority while on such leave are long overdue. Parental leave is an empty promise if both parents are working, as the woman certainly needs the full-time payment, if so desired. However, minimums are more desirable, as spoken to before, than the lack of any standard.

In summary: There's a great, obvious need to maintain basic standards that apply to all those employed in the province of Ontario. Allowing employers to be all over the scale on areas of hours of work, overtime pay, vacation pay, severance pay and public holidays is not the same as being open for business. Local 677 has felt the sting of standards that are far too forgiving to business interests. We have felt working 56 hours in a row at straight time. We have felt the separation of family at public holiday time. We have felt the outrage at an employer who avoids a proper overtime payment at a greater cost than the cost of the overtime itself.

We fear more for the unorganized, the most defenceless in the workforce. We fear for the worsening quality of life for all Ontarians, because as they suffer so shall we suffer.

You can't allow all to negotiate lesser differences in standards. You set them and they stand or fall on their own. Rights are not rights if you can't access them; they're illusions only. Enforcement is not enforcement if collection outweighs the award. Government is not government if you are not responsible for your actions or your legislation. Thank you.

Mr Duncan: First of all, thank you for your concern about unorganized workers. I know that has been the tradition of the labour movement in Ontario.

One very quick question struck me. In your brief you said, "Companies should also recognize and have their eyes open to the fact that Bill 49 means a substantial increase in their cost of negotiating and operating their business." I wonder if you can illuminate that a little bit and tell us what you mean by that.

Mr Samuelson: Just to get it straight, you're asking?

Mr Duncan: You had said in your brief, "Companies should also recognize and have their eyes open to the fact that Bill 49 means a substantial increase in their cost of negotiating and operating their business." It strikes me as being very true, by the way. I wonder if you could tell me how that might happen.

Mr Samuelson: I think it's symptomatic of the actions of the Tory government. The "bad boss" bill, for example, puts in place a system where you create uneasiness. You create a situation where people are forced into confrontation. It's symptomatic of exactly what we've seen since the election of this government. You need only travel around this province with your eyes open and you'll see confrontation. You'll see in workplaces workers who are forced into fighting for basic rights. Now you bring in a piece of legislation, for crying out loud, that forces more workers into situations where they can't seek justice.

Frankly, if the government was interested in really looking at ways of bringing about some kind of fairness in the workplace and dealing with some of these problems, it would be prepared to sit down with workers and listen to them. But the "bad boss" bill is an example of workers having rights taken away from them. It creates uncertainty, it creates tension and it ultimately creates instability in the workplace. That brings about added costs.

Mr Christopherson: Thanks very much, John, for an excellent presentation. It really is quite well done and proves the point that humour, when used properly, can be a very powerful tool. I think you've done that. That's really a good brief.

I'd like to raise one issue with you. We had representatives from the OPSEU local that represents employment standards officers come forward and raise a number of issues. They said, and I'm quoting from their document regarding the minimum standard — I think you raise it in your document — "Employees that handle cash, for example, such as waitresses, waiters, gas station attendants, cashiers etc, every six months an employer could automatically deduct $50 from an employee's paycheque for cash shortages" — that's assuming it's a $100 minimum, for example — "twice a year. The employer could purposely violate the law by deducting moneys under the minimum amount every six months — a new double standard for the employer, an outright licence to steal." What would you say to that suggestion?

Mr Cunningham: Absolutely. The reference to 56 hours in a row that I was making was that if you have a legal definition of a workweek running Saturday to Saturday or Monday to Monday, as long as you group or cluster your hours of work around that dividing line, which is an imaginary line only in legislators' and lawyers' minds and not a reality on the floor, you can manipulate the workplace. Did we need that work standard? Yes, we did as a minimum. Do we need an improved work standard? Yes, we need a greatly improved work standard that wouldn't allow what is taking place. Stated as a law, you couldn't do it, but if you manipulate the law you in fact can do it. Yes, very much so.

Mr Baird: Thank you very much for your presentation. I would just like to get maybe a few comments and what not on the record. One of your presenters, Mr Cooper, mentioned that there was no time to present a full review of the Employment Standards Act to the Legislature. My office has just checked. The last year the NDP government was in power the Legislature of Ontario only sat for five weeks. There was certainly plenty of time to do it, but they didn't, because the Premier of the day had said he didn't want any more labour legislation. Of course, that information is on the public record with respect to the schedule of the Legislature.

You mentioned very briefly the collections. We're not satisfied with collecting 25 cents on the dollar. In 1993, the previous government disbanded the collections unit and displaced 10 employees in a cost-cutting initiative. My colleague the member for Windsor-Walkerville mentioned Professor Judy Fudge's statement. She mentioned in her brief that it was dissolved in 1995, but the fact remains it was dissolved by an NDP government. We saw the recovery rate go down to 20% and 15% the year after they did that. It got demonstrably worse, and it was directly attributed to the NDP government's decision to disband the collection agency and discharge those employees. It's very important to get that on the record.

We feel that bringing in private collection agents will do a terrific amount so the workers get more of their money, and that's incredibly important to put on the record. We're not satisfied with 25 cents. If we make a few little tinkering changes, we're not going to get the results. The previous two governments tried, to their credit; we have tried. It's simply not working. We need a major change.

We think every worker is entitled to every single dollar. The previous two governments have signed deals with employees if they've consented. All three parties have done it, said: "Listen, we can get you 80 cents on the dollar now. Would you accept that, as the worker?" The NDP did that; the Liberals did that; we've done that. We think the 25 cents on the dollar is simply unacceptable and we want to try a different area. We'll be held accountable for that. If we're not able to collect more money, we'll be held accountable for that. But we're not prepared to accept 25 cents on the dollar; it's just unacceptable.

Mr Cunningham: May I answer that?

The Chair: Very briefly.

Mr Cunningham: First of all, Mr Cooper hasn't made a statement today, so you're trying to make political hay while the sun isn't shining.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Cooper did make a statement before you came up here.

Mr Cunningham: This is my representation. First of all, this local will come to take on any government in power, not just the present one. I am here on my vacation without pay. I've driven from Kincardine to present this and I could give squat less what government is in power. The legislation that you have presented is terrible for the people of this province. So don't make hay while the sun isn't shining here. It has nothing to do with what party is in power; it's the bill that you've written and the bill you've presented and its effect on the working people of this province. That's it. The collection, with minimums and maximums, is not full dollar.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation. I believe he was referring to Mr Cooper's comments, the previous speaker.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS LOCAL 4304

The Chair: Our last presentation of the morning will be CAW Local 4304, Mr Grosz. Just at the outset, I'd like to thank you as well for filling a vacant spot this morning and helping us better order our day here.

Mr Rudy Grosz: Thank you for allowing me to come to you and speak today. I am the president of our local. I represent the Kitchener Transit drivers and the fleet mechanics for the city of Kitchener. But I didn't come here to just represent them; I came here for myself. I was born and raised here in Waterloo and Kitchener. I grew up listening to my father, who was a Polish immigrant, telling me about how he got involved in trade unions before there were really trade unions. He was an organizer. He did a lot of things and he told me about them when I was growing up. I used to think: "Why did you do that? What did you do those kinds of things for? Why didn't you just stay on the farm where we were living and just work the farm? Why did you get involved in that stuff?" His one answer to that was: "I didn't do it for me. I did it for you."

I grew up in the 1950s and 1960s, and life here in Ontario was pretty good. I got married and had a family; got involved with a trade union for a little bit with the rubber workers, Local 80. I didn't like working in a factory, so I left that. I thought Ontario was a great place to be. I thought Canada was the greatest country in the world, I thought Ontario was the greatest province in Canada and I felt that Kitchener-Waterloo was probably one of the best places in Ontario to be. Like a lot of people who live here and work here, I didn't pay a whole lot of attention to what was going on because life was good. There were jobs. We had a fair amount of security. I didn't pay attention to the people who were out there making these things happen for me. My father was one of them. He's been gone for 25 years now and he can't see what's going on, but I do see what's going on.

I have six children. I have eight grandchildren. I'm not here for me. I'm here for them because the province of Ontario is changing and I'm not happy to see the changes that are going on. I see things that my father worked for disappearing, things that I didn't bother to take seriously when he was alive. I wish he was here now so I could tell him that he was right, because he told me these things would happen.

I became involved with Kitchener Transit about eight years ago as a bus driver and I started hearing things. People get on my bus and I like people so I talk to them.

I hear about employers who hire people at a training rate of around $3.50 an hour, keep them on for 60 days, and then let them go and hire the next one, so their entire workforce is being paid $3.50 an hour. "Why don't you complain?" "What for? Who'd listen? I need a job. If I complain, I'm out."

Then it hit my own family. I have a son who went through college, graduated top of his class as a chef from George Brown College in Toronto, got a job in Waterloo at one of the best restaurants, one where the minister herself eats, or used to eat. He was put on salary, worked 60, 70 hours a week straight salary; no overtime, no holidays, nothing; six, seven days a week. I said: "What are you doing this for? They've got to pay you." He said: "I can't complain. I'll lose my job." My son is a diabetic; has to eat regular meals at regular times; take his insulin at the proper times with the right food amounts. One day his wife called. He's married and had a baby. They were rushing my son to hospital. He almost died because he didn't eat properly during these shifts that he was working. Ten days later he went back to work to find out he didn't have a job. They didn't need him any more. They didn't even bother to tell him. He walked in and they said, "We've replaced you."

He went to the labour board and he said, "What can I do?" They opened a file that thick of employees who had complained about that employer and nothing was ever done about it. People complained but the employer never paid, and they won't because they're out of business now. The sign's gone. They've opened a new restaurant under another name, formed another company, and they'll do it to the next bunch of employees as well.

Now we want to reduce some of these things? We want to change them? No. We're going the wrong way. You want to improve? I think change is necessary. I think every government that's been in power in the last 15 years has let things slide. You want to change it? Tighten up on the enforcement. Don't bother taking stuff away. You've got the laws there. You've got the standards. You're just not enforcing the standards. When people come in and complain, don't make them wait two years or a year and a half, and then the company goes bankrupt so they walk away. Make the employer pay. When you find a bad employer consistently doing these things, charge him a premium, make him put money in a pot to pay for these workers. There are good employers out there, some who won't do these things, but most employers will push it to the limit.

I work for the city of Kitchener; a good employer. The minute they heard that some of these standards might be changed, I was back at the negotiating table, even though I've just signed a three-year contract. They want to extend our work hours. They want to take away overtime benefits. They want to take what we call our spread time, which allows us to get paid extra if we're on duty more than 11 and a half hours. They want to take away our paid lunch. I guess now that you've withdrawn that part of the bill for the time being, in two weeks now when we go back to the table to talk about these things, they won't be bringing that up. But they will push to the limit, and we have to negotiate and we have to fight constantly to keep the things we've got. You're not helping anybody when you start taking stuff away.

So I came here today to let you know how I feel as a person. As a union president, I want my members to have the best. I don't want to keep fighting every day of the week to keep the things we've got. I want to see the province of Ontario improve, not get worse. You have the power to make it work. I'm not here to represent one political party or another; I'm not attacking anyone in that sense. Any party in power has the power to make the laws work if they have the will to do it. Lately, we haven't had the will to do it.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Grosz. This time the questioning will commence with Mr Christopherson. We have three minutes per caucus.

Mr Christopherson: That was a very poignant presentation; thank you. The one question that comes to my mind in listening to not just the problems you've outlined but where you think the solutions lie is your reaction to the fact that there will be at least 45 fewer employment standards officers in place as a result of Bill 49 and the financial reductions to the Ministry of Labour in terms of what that says to you about this government's intent, since you believe so strongly that the real answer is greater enforcement, not less.

Mr Grosz: If you take away people who do the job, then the job doesn't get done. It's that simple. If you want to move, which we do, 110 buses down the street, you need 110 drivers. You take 30 drivers away, you only move 80 buses down the street. If you want to handle claims, you have people to do it. You take the people away, you don't handle the claims, or you delay them, make them longer.

Mr Christopherson: What would you say to the Minister of Labour, who was here earlier, and those chambers of commerce which insist that Bill 49 does not reduce in any way the minimum rights that workers now have in the Employment Standards Act?

Mr Grosz: I believe they do reduce some of the rights they have — the limits that are there, the minimum limit, the maximum standard, the time frames.

Like I said, my son, when he was working, didn't complain because he needed the job. He had a wife, a small baby, he was trying to make a reputation for himself. It was his first job after graduating. He needed the work. That was one of the top restaurants. If he had lost that job because of complaining, he would have been blacklisted, which he ended up being, in this community, anyway. He ended up going to another community to get employment because they put the word out on him: He's a troublemaker. He could not get a job in his field in the region of Waterloo.

Mr Christopherson: How many people, or even a general description, are in a circumstance where they're likely to be afraid to make a complaint to the ministry for fear of reprisals, up to and including losing their job?

Mr Grosz: Probably a very large number. Even though we have a union where we are, we have people who will not complain for fear of losing their job even though we've assured them the union will protect them for doing it, and they still won't complain. So what about all the people in Ontario who are not unionized, in small industry and small business, where there are seven or eight people working?

Where my wife works there are seven people and they're treated like dirt sometimes, some of them in there. They never complain because it's the only job they've got. You look at the want ads, you go out and there's no much out there, so they keep what they've got and they put up with it.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Simcoe Centre): Thank you for your presentation. I appreciate your sharing your story with respect to your family in that particular restaurant because throughout the hearings we've been finding employers have been using bankruptcy and insolvency as a shield to get around the enforcement of the Employment Standards Act. That's one area that we don't have any control over, which is bankruptcy, in terms of protecting workers with basic rights and making sure that the system in terms of getting full wages for the work that you've put in is protected.

Nothing has been done. That act has been reviewed and they were supposed to have done something, but they have done nothing. It ties our hands in terms of saying, "How can we attack insolvent employers?" In fact, we have very limited methods of doing that other than going after the directors. That's a very difficult task, but it's been done. There was a recent case on that in terms of collecting for workers, but it took six years to litigate that case. But that doesn't protect the workers who are in the type of industries like restaurants and garment shops etc. That's one area that I think has to be noticed and I hope my friends are aware of that.

There's one other area, since you're involved in negotiations. Currently, under the act severance pay is a standard that can be contracted out by the union when they want to negotiate for their workers. Do you have severance pay under your collective agreement?

Mr Grosz: We haven't because we've never had a bus driver laid off in the city of Kitchener in the history of Kitchener Transit. Thanks to the transfer payment cut-backs from the government to the city of Kitchener of $1.5 million next year, we're looking at maybe 30 layoffs and we'll have to negotiate it now. That's why we're at the table.

Mr Tascona: But that's something that is contracted out. In other words, unions have the right to contract out of the Labour Relations Act to get the best deal for their workers. We've had some comments on that from other presenters with respect to plant closures etc and they are aware of that, but it's something that is not objected to by unions. They in fact have welcomed it, to be able to negotiate severance pay and contract out of the legislation to protect their workers.

Mr Grosz: The unions can do that. What about the people who don't have unions?

Mr Tascona: That's exactly right, but the thing is this is a standard that has been contracted out so to take it beyond that, it's not something that's new for unions to be able to protect their workers where the standard is not a minimum, and severance pay is one of those areas. We're looking at extending those in certain areas and that's been pulled now, but it's not something that's new, so I wanted you to be aware of that.

Mr Hoy: I appreciated your presentation this morning, the personal knowledge that you have of certain actions taken against particularly your son. We've only been on the hearings for the third day now and it's apparent that the act is going to need some amendments.

The government likes to talk about bankruptcy and I'm not suggesting that this is going to solve or is even maybe part of Bill 49. But I want to talk about bankruptcy for a moment and what the farm sector did in bankruptcies where grain elevators went bankrupt and there was no grain in the elevator or, as often is the case, the farmer was the last creditor. The farm community began a checkoff system whereby a few dollars per ton, or whatever the figure might be, was subtracted from their paycheque in order to protect themselves from those who went bankrupt.

It's that kind of innovative thinking and agreement among parties to take a certain action. We'll be looking at constructive amendments to this bill. I'm not suggesting that what I just mentioned about what the farmers' reaction was to bankruptcy would be any kind of an amendment that we would think of; I'm just saying there are people who have constructive ideas on how to maintain the importance of workers and the worldwide renown that Canada and Ontario are the greatest places to live.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Hoy, and thank you very much again, Mr Grosz. I appreciate your taking the time to make your presentation here today.

With that, thanks to the two presenters from the afternoon who accommodated us this morning, we will amend the schedule and the committee will recess and return to this room promptly at 2 o'clock. The committee stands recessed.

The committee recessed from 1150 to 1400.

GUELPH AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: Welcome to all those in attendance for our afternoon session of the third day of hearings on Bill 49. Our thanks to the Guelph and District Labour Council for accommodating a slight change in the sequence. If you could come forward now, you have 20 minutes to divide as you see fit between presentation time and question-and-answer period.

Mr Clarence Boulding: My name is Clarence Boulding from the Guelph and District Labour Council, and this is Carol Hall, our financial secretary. I want to apologize, first off, that we've only brought 10 copies of our submission because of the cost. We find it improbable that people that don't have a lot of financing should be able to afford 30 copies and the cost that goes into it. It would be nice if there was some other way we could do it.

Another apology is that at the time we wrote our submission we didn't know that flexible standards were going to be withdrawn from Bill 49. We would appreciate being able to read our notes as written.

On behalf of the Guelph and District Labour Council we would like to thank this committee for the opportunity to hear our views on Elizabeth Witmer's minor house-keeping changes to the Employment Standards Act. It is not often enough this government holds public meetings so that the people of this province might have a say in the many changes imposed by the Tories. Unlike some others, we believe our democratic rights do not start and end at a ballot box once every four or five years. So we are pleased to be here.

Real progress only takes place in a society when there is compromise, and this present government in its pursuit of appeasing its private enterprise constituents has showed no compromise, no compassion, nor anything less than contempt for anyone with a different view than that of their own.

It should come as no surprise that the GDLC is opposed to almost all the current proposed changes to the ESA, the Employment Standards Act, considering we represent those in society that are sometimes exploited, often mistreated, and do not have the education or resources to help themselves. Our initial response is that these proposed changes will not improve basic employment rights, and over the course of our presentation we hope to show you why.

Our main focus will be flexible standards, which have been withdrawn, and enforcement under a collective agreement, as well as some brief comments on other key amendments.

It should be noted that the GDLC represents some 5,000 members of public and private sector unions in the Guelph area.

Flexible standards: As someone who has negotiated collective agreements on behalf of the membership of Canadian Auto Workers Local 1917, unit 2, the proposed changes under flexible standards hold ominous challenges for collective bargaining. In the past it was never necessary to include the ESA's minimum standards in the collective agreement. We had only to negotiate those conditions that exceeded the ESA. Right now, it is good to know that, even if no gains can be made at the bargaining table, members will at least be protected by a minimum standard that is the same for all workers in their particular sector. Bill 49 will change all that.

Bill 49 allows a collective agreement to override the legal minimum standards concerning severance pay, overtime, public holidays, hours of work and vacation pay if the contract "confers greater rights...when those matters are assessed together." This measure erases the historic concept of an overall minimum standard of workplace rights for unionized workers.

Even though Bill 49 allows tradeoffs on these standards, what could possibly make up for a parent who misses coaching their children's baseball game because, for example, they are forced to work overtime? The current minimum standards, even if abused from time to time, must not be for sale, because there can be no fair trades in minimum standards. As people involved in contract negotiations, we can say that three-year agreements like the one we have now in my workplace will probably be a thing of the past. The membership will not want to tie themselves down for fear of being stuck in a detrimental tradeoff position. Imagine collective agreements with terms of three to six months so the union can be sure that the employer's demands aren't too unrealistic for its membership, bringing an end to a period of time of long-term stability for both employer and employee.

Under the proposed changes it is fair to assume that employers will want to make changes to every contract, especially to hours of work. Employers are always complaining about the high cost of payroll taxes and one way around that would be to have mandatory overtime, allowing companies to employ fewer people than they do even now and returning workplaces to the sweatshops of the early 1900s, forcing people again into long hours of work and more time away from their families.

Please don't allow the minimum standards to be negotiated. Workers will only lose the few rights that they have now. The potential of this amendment to erode the standard of living of the working class of this province is enough to make the GDLC stand in opposition to the bill as a whole.

Ms Carol Hall: Enforcement under a collective agreement: As union people representing the members in our workplace, we are appalled to see that Elizabeth Witmer does not seem to understand housekeeping in the real world. A broom is actually for sweeping the floor and not for destroying valuable objects. She is sweeping away valuable employees or front-line workers, if you will, who keep businesses producing. Paying a fair wage for fair work is indeed not unfair. We believe that Bill 49 will cause job layoffs. Employers will employ fewer employees, working longer hours to get their work done. This is not job creation; this is job cremation.

Bill 49 will make far-reaching changes in the enforcement under a collective agreement, the foundation of the basic rights of union and non-union workers in Ontario. Unions have fought for many years for fair wages, good working conditions and a means of representation. When this failed, the union worker, who is also a taxpayer, had the Ministry of Labour to represent them. Under section 20 of the bill, section 64.5 of the act, unionized and non-unionized employees will no longer have the security of working in a safe environment. Employees working in a chemical plant may suffer long-term illness if the employer deems that safety measures are not necessary. Sorters at a recycling plant may be injured on the job because job safety equipment will no longer be supplied. Workplace harassment may be condoned if the employer turns a blind eye.

There are few people who can afford a lengthy court battle. Workers are not lawyers. They are not aware of the many avenues open to them and find out by accident when it's too late. Bill 49 will effectively remove their rights to redress and compensation from their employers.

The government will make it feasible to fire anyone who stands up for their rights or complains about poor working conditions. The Ministry of Labour already has more complaints than an enforcement officer can handle properly. The Guelph and District Labour Council currently receives calls from workers who cannot contact the employment standards branch because the phone lines are constantly busy. We are being denied overtime pay, meal breaks, severance pay and are being forced to work excessive hours. This is happening now. Bill 49 will make the situation much worse.

General comments: High unemployment and a stagnant economy have pressured working people to turn a blind eye to poor working conditions already. The number of complaints the Ministry of Labour gets now should be a good indicator that large numbers of employers are taking advantage of their employees.

Weakening the ESA will only make an imperfect system worse. Now is the time to be strengthening human rights in the workplace, not diluting them. The working men and women of this province deserve better than to be thought of as secondary to the higher profits of the business community.

These minor housekeeping changes also call for a maximum $10,000 cap for an employee that files a complaint under the act. It offers private enterprise a chance to make a profit off the collection of money owed to a complainant. This will offer monetary rewards to the employer to drag out his abuse — the most he'll pay is $10,000, less if he makes a deal with the private collector — rewards a private businessman with a chance to make a fair buck for collections. Indeed, these proposals will reward everyone but the poor employee, who will get shafted again because his government, the defender of the people, will not want to intervene on his or her behalf. Is this government so far from its constituents that the only individual's rights it's concerned with is the individual employer? We want the system of public enforcement to be maintained and improved.

Mr Boulding: In conclusion, with the exception of the proposed changes affecting vacation pay and those that affect seniority, service during pregnancy and parental leave, we find these proposals unprogressive. The Guelph and District Labour Council is an organization which is concerned with maintaining and improving basic societal standards such as hours of work, overtime pay, vacation pay, severance and public holidays. Bill 49 would eliminate the floor for these minimum standards.

We say this bill should be scrapped and another method found for cleaning up a government mess instead of putting it on the backs of the working poor. Since there is to be a major review of the act in the near future, we feel this provincial government shouldn't make any changes now but should be including all parties with a vested interest to make recommendations to the act as a whole. We feel that if government, business and labour come together in the spirit of compromise, the Employment Standards Act can be improved and it can be done without lowering anyone's standards or infringing on their rights. We'll just have to look further than the short-term bottom line.

Thank you, and we look forward these opportunities in the future.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation, and that leaves us three minutes of questioning per caucus. This time the government members will be first.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): We had an experience on Monday in Toronto of having a worker represent herself. She's not a member of organized labour and therefore came before the committee representing herself. It had to do with enforcement, and specifically in her case it was enforcement with regard to collection of outstanding moneys owing to her. During her presentation she was pretty adamant that in fact government got in the way of collecting on her behalf over the period of almost two years and the outstanding debt of 180 hours worth of income still was not forthcoming. A single parent with three children, she was finding it very difficult.

I think if we're going to address the problem in a reasonable manner, we have to put all politics aside and do what we all know is best, and that is work on behalf of the workers. In this case the question with regard to private collection was raised. Where the collection agents in the past have been let go and the merging of that responsibility placed with the current staff, we find that we're obviously short of being able to meet the needs of not only enforcing the Employment Standards Act but also the collections side of it.

Given that all parties within the provincial government in the past have been unsuccessful in collecting on behalf of the worker, do you not think it's reasonable that we can give it a chance here, that perhaps private collection could work on behalf of the worker? In closing, on that question, I would remind ourselves we're collecting about 25 cents on the dollar right now for those workers. Deals have been cut in the past by all parties while in government. She sort of felt we were in her way in accessing her rights to her collection.

Mr Boulding: First of all, my answer to that would be in the collection of outstanding money, I think we're all aware that any time an employee is owed money, in some cases it's because the business has gone out of business, in which case then the employee is always the last person on the list to get paid.

Second, if the government had some rules or some penalties for employers who didn't pay the money that's owing, instead of just saying, "That's right, the money is owed to this person and you have to pay," if they had any regulations and penalties to enforce those things, that would work a lot better than to allow a private collection agency a chance to collect. Because what are they going to use to collect the moneys owing, except for the fact that they might be able to negotiate a lower amount than what's duly owed to the employee in the first place, in which case the employer, someone who has bent the rules or abused them, is going to get off with less money than they really owe to someone.

Mr Fisher: But that's no different from today. Deals are cut every day right now with regard to getting those funds. It's not a new act and it's not a new practice. Right now, our workers are getting less than they're entitled to because those things are negotiated off right now. There just isn't a magic number. Do you think that's right?

Mr Boulding: What I think is right is that the Employment Standards Act and the Ministry of Labour have more teeth to actually penalize businesses, even if it came down to maybe pulling their licence for a year for not paying money that's owing to somebody. The point is here, the person that's going to lose — we want the Employment Standards Act improved, we want the Ministry of Labour improved, and that might take more people to do the job.

Mr Duncan: Just along that line of questioning, the member for Bruce did indicate that successive governments and the branch have been short of meeting the needs. Do you think it was a good idea then to cut 45 employment standards officers at this time?

Mr Boulding: Definitely not. My wife herself has had a complaint with employment standards and it has taken 18 months for her to even have any response from the Employment Standards Act. When that person did call, with the letter that came to the house, she had 10 days to act on that, and if she didn't act within those 10 days she was going to lose out altogether. If it's taking 18 months for people to actually have their complaints heard, that's way too long. We do need more people there.

Mr Duncan: So given this, in your view, just because you're an observer, a labour leader, do you think the government is really acting to try to improve collection, or do you think it's acting to try to reduce standards?

Mr Boulding: I think they're actually acting to reduce standards. If they were really concerned about collection, they wouldn't have gotten rid of the $5,000 wage protection program they had in place for workers who were owed money.

Mr Christopherson: Further to the issue you raise on page 5 about the phone lines, how long has that been going on, that you've been having trouble with the phones?

Mr Boulding: The labour council itself has always gotten calls from people asking about employment standards, but it's only probably been in the last six months that people have been complaining that they can't even get to talk to anybody because the phone lines are busy.

Mr Christopherson: Do you have documented cases of that, at least of people telling you they've been trying to do that?

Mr Boulding: Oh, yes. We have a message pad and continually there's messages there that someone is looking for information on employment standards.

Mr Christopherson: That's interesting. Just above that also, this is an issue we've been focusing on today, and I think more and more it's crucial in terms of the impact of Bill 49 on non-union members. You state: "The government will make it feasible to fire anyone who stands up for their rights or complains about poor working conditions. The Ministry of Labour already has more complaints than enforcement officers can handle properly." Do you have examples of circumstances that people have told you about?

Mr Boulding: Have been terminated?

Mr Christopherson: Or where they're afraid to say anything because they're afraid there will be repercussions.

Mr Boulding: I think most people who end up terminated or are working in bad working conditions just know that the way the structure is set up so far, it takes so long to be heard. So no one acts in haste and probably people are working and living with bad conditions right now only because they don't want to put themselves in a position of getting terminated by making a formal complaint to the Employment Standards Act.

I'm not the recording secretary, and the recording secretary couldn't make it today, but she's the one who answers the phone and takes all these messages. I'm sure she has — well, all of those cases would be people who would be afraid. Actually, we do have a letter on file even from complaints from people that probably have been sent to the employment standards or they haven't sent the letter to employment standards.

Mr Christopherson: The reason we're focusing on it is because there's a real difference of opinion about why people don't file sooner in terms of lodging their complaint. What we're hearing is a great deal of evidence that there are people who are afraid to raise a stink in the workplace because they have no protection and they're afraid and they don't have alternatives if they're fired, either to get their job back or to find another job. There's a real question as to whether that's the reality or not. I just wondered what it was from the perspective of the labour movement in Guelph.

Mr Boulding: I think even in our brief we mention that the economic situation for working people these days is such that there aren't a lot of jobs out there. Someone who has complaints and knows that their rights are violated under the Employment Standards Act may let those go in lots of cases because they'll be terminated from a job, and jobs aren't easy to come by.

Mr Christopherson: So high unemployment, in addition to low rights in the law, makes for a great climate for the unscrupulous employers that are out there.

Mr Boulding: For sure, and we see Bill 49 as a "big boss" bill which will just allow employers to abuse and get away with even more.

Mr Baird: Could I have a point of order, Mr Chair? Just a concern — Mr Christopherson brought this up — to the people presenting. Page 5 of the brief says "the phone lines are constantly busy." This is a concern and I think it's valid. If you could provide us with examples, I'd be happy to look into it for you, because it is a concern and we would look into it. If you could provide the specific details of the times and the number you're calling, I'd be happy to look into it.

Mr Boulding: Who would you want it sent to?

Mr Baird: To me; I'll give you my card.

Interjections.

Mr Baird: Just give me the number.

Mr Duncan: On a point of order, Mr Chair: That line has not been working well for a very long time. We would like the government to provide us information with respect to how they expect service to improve when they're cutting employees from that branch of the ministry.

The Chair: Thank you both for taking the time to make a presentation before us here today. We appreciate it.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS AND AEROSPACE WORKERS, FESTIVAL CITY LODGE 1927

The Chair: Our next group up will be the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, Festival City Lodge 1927. Good afternoon to you all. We have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation time and questions and answers. Would you be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter, please.

Mr Charles Muma: I'm Charles Muma. I'm the president of Festival City Lodge 1927. With me are Darlene Dale, the chairman of our political action committee, and Michael Dale, who is an adviser we use and is also Darlene's husband.

Festival City Lodge 1927 is a member local of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers. We represent over 300 members of Dominion Controls. It's a company that builds parking brake assemblies in Stratford, Ontario. Making our presentation will be Darlene, the chairperson of Local Lodge 1927's political action committee.

Mrs Darlene Dale: Good afternoon and thank you for letting me speak to you.

The Employment Standards Act has been in need of improvement for several years. It has too many exclusions and loopholes which weaken its protection of Ontario workers.

There are several positive amendments in Bill 49. One such amendment is the entitlement to vacation pay. Under the proposed amendment, time lost due to illness or leave will still be used to calculate entitlement for vacation time. Second is the amendment that will ensure that all employees maintain benefit and seniority rights while on pregnancy or parental leave.

However, Bill 49 also contains fundamental changes to Ontario labour law by permitting important minimum standards to become negotiable. Prior to this bill, it was illegal for a collective agreement to have any provisions below the minimum standards set out in the Employment Standards Act. Section 3 of Bill 49 will allow a collective agreement to override the legal minimum standards concerning severance pay, overtime, public holidays, hours of work and vacation pay if the contract "confers greater rights" when those matters are assessed together.

This opens a can of worms. Since it is almost impossible to define a subjective term, it leaves the act wide open to interpretation. Such a large loophole will invite dishonest employers to skirt the law, leaving honest employers who wish to remain in business no alternative but to follow suit or leave for a jurisdiction where more predictable standards exist.

The vagueness of the bill also widens the scope of items to be negotiated, creating an environment that could lead to more work stoppages as unions and employers struggle through lengthy contract negotiations. The end result would be lowered productivity as both parties become engulfed in a war of tradeoffs.

Our contract is due to be negotiated next year and, as with most collective agreements, the provisions in the Employment Standards Act work as a bottom line from which both parties start their bargaining. Now let us suppose that there is no point at which to start negotiations.

For example, in division 320 of our plant, many of the employees have been working large amounts of overtime. One man was able to accumulate 40 hours of overtime in one week. The company could suggest a waiver of overtime rights for more vacation time. At the rate of 40 hours per week, the amount of overtime could reach 2,000 hours in one year. This amount of overtime would be too great to be compensated by vacation time in one year and therefore could only be used against the employee's retirement date. The tradeoff is an exchange of a monetary right — overtime pay — for a non-monetary benefit of early retirement. For the purposes of Bill 49, early retirement could be seen as a greater right when assessed together with the rest of the contract. Is it?

We have all heard through the media the experience of the Japanese with overextended work hours. They have found that extending hours of work can contribute to heart attack, stroke and even death. If this were repeated in Ontario, our already overstretched health care system would be further burdened. If the employee suffers a heart attack because of extended hours of overtime to secure an early retirement, can this really be called a greater right?

Let us put another proposal on the table. Let's say a management team would like to help their employees maintain a good work record and reduce the number of people who have to be reprimanded or fired because of their attendance. They propose a system to use overtime hours to cancel out incidents: any unauthorized leave from work such as leaving work early, lateness or sickness. Eight hours of overtime at standard wages will cancel one full incident. On the surface, this proposal sounds very appealing. It could be considered a benefit for the people who are close to being fired due to the restrictions of the attendance policy: "All I have to do is work a little overtime and my job is saved." On closer examination, this benefit falls short. The employee has lost a day's pay through absenteeism and is now being asked to relinquish eight hours of overtime pay. In essence, the employee just paid the company four hours' wages to keep their job.

It may seem improbable that a company would offer such a formula to its workers, but a similar tradeoff of rights is being used in my workplace at the moment: "Employees may substitute one half day vacation in lieu of taking a leave of absence for specialist appointments etc, provided both half days are scheduled at the same time. Maximum of up to two single days per vacation year." This is taken from the Dominion Controls attendance policy, as appended to this document.

On the surface, this seems a reasonable deal. Employees may take vacation time in order to keep their attendance record within the allowed limits of 10 days in a two-year rotating window. The employee is asked to trade their right of vacation time to keep their job. Under this formula, a new employee with only two weeks vacation loses even more, as two days traded for doctors' appointments sends their allowed vacation time below the two-week minimum standards. Do they get time from work? Yes. Is it vacation time? Well, my idea of vacation time is not sitting in a specialist's office waiting to hear if I need an operation or cancer treatments. These employees are already owed vacation time by the company, and making them use this time up as a means of payment to the company for a job they already have is a glimpse into what awaits other workers in Ontario due to the change in Bill 49.

The government must believe that the provisions of the Employment Standards Act are not the minimum at all but more than the working people of Ontario deserve. If the standards are truly considered to be minimums, it would be impossible for them to be reduced or compromised as a tradeoff for an increased benefit over and above another standard. It is the government's duty to set clear standards so that our society represents a level playing field for all. Both industry and labour will suffer under the proposed changes to the Employment Standards Act contained in Bill 49, but the big loser will be the Ontario economy, which, gridlocked in endless trivial negotiating between capital and labour, will lose its competitive edge in the global marketplace. I implore this committee to reject Bill 49 as it now stands and to urge the government to work together with labour and capital to reach a truly equitable revision of the Employment Standards Act. Thank you.

Mr Duncan: Thank you very much. This theme about the economic cost of these amendments and how it's going to impact on collective bargaining and what it will do to the investment climate in Ontario is one that is emerging in terms of union presentations. We're hearing this from different organizations. Your view then, just to make sure I understand it very clearly, is that the sections of the bill that pertain to flexible standards, if they come forward with them in their second round, and also the notions around arbitration and so forth in the bill, will ultimately cause unions, number one, to negotiate contracts that are shorter in length; number two, make those negotiations more difficult; and number three, in your view, result in a situation where collective bargaining is slower and more confrontational. Am I understanding the gist of it?

Mrs Dale: Yes, that's exactly my position. Right now, as I said, when we go in we have a bottom line, a base point to start with, and everybody at the negotiating table understands that. Then we work from there. If, on the other hand, we don't have a starting point, it's almost as if we're going in for a new contract; we've started all over again. This makes everything more complicated and much more lengthy. Now you're going to have people working without a contract while we're trying to negotiate one or you're going to have strikes when the negotiations to get back to work are extended because there are so many items to be taken into consideration. All of this is going to lead, as I said, to less work time in Ontario, less productivity. You can't have productivity if people are negotiating back and forth whether or not they want this — "Do I want that?" "You can't have this." It can be endless.

Mr Duncan: The next time I hear representations in the business community that this doesn't have any effect, that it's just housekeeping, would it be fair for me to suggest to them that unions are putting them on notice now that if the government proceeds with these kinds of changes to the Employment Standards Act, they can expect an even more difficult bargaining climate and a more costly bargaining climate?

Mr Muma: Definitely, yes.

Mr Michael Dale: I think the point of this is that these so-called housekeeping changes could lead to an endless chain of calculations. If you try to formulate some way of trading off all of these and getting these intricate calculations, by definition they're going to take more time to do. Contracts are going to have to be larger and are going to be shorter in duration.

If there was a general theme to this bill, especially where it talks about flexible standards, for me it's the idea that it's almost creating an anarchy in the labour market. If anyone doubts that anarchy is very difficult to do business in or that business people run away from unstable situations, I suggest you open a curio shop in Sarajevo. You'll find out that business as well as labour wants to have at least a solid framework from which it can work, and it is the duty of government to provide that framework. If government abrogates that duty, then there is no alternative but chaos.

Mr Christopherson: It's turning into quite a fascinating day. I think this is probably the most in-depth look at what the various packages might look like and the implications that could result at the bargaining table from a move like this. You've really gone into a lot of depth and backed it up with some current examples.

What I'd like to ask you, since obviously you've put a great deal of thought into this, is, what do you see as the implications for either a weaker union or an isolated local union in a concessionary round of bargaining where the employer is putting everything on the table as a takeaway and now they've got the right to go beyond the employment standards? What sorts of results do you think we might see in a situation like that if the government went ahead and allowed negotiated agreements that have standards below what are now the floor in the Employment Standards Act?

Mr Muma: I can speak not only as president of our lodge; I also sit on the labour council in Stratford. I know there is a small union that are affiliated with no one and they just came out of Reliance Electric and negotiated a seven-year deal in which they got next to nothing. I think this is what you're going to see. They have no support from anyone and they're on their own. As an international union, we do have the support of our brothers and sisters. One thing we are doing in the machinists is looking an unifying with our brothers and sisters of the Steelworkers and the United Auto Workers. I think you will see eventually more and more of the smaller unions doing the same thing.

If this goes through, I can see confrontation, speaking as a person who sat on a picket line not more than three weeks ago at Crane Canada. It was a strike that did get a little violent even though we tried to be non-violent. This is something we haven't seen in the city of Stratford in years. It's coming because, to me, employers have seen — "Hey, listen, we've got the government on our side now," and they're pulling our rights back. That's what I see forthcoming.

Mr Christopherson: I wouldn't disagree. In fact, I think if you take a look at what we said would happen with Bill 7 — and it is happening — once you reintroduce the legal right to use scabs, you're looking to have violence on the line. It's unavoidable. It's regrettable, but it's unavoidable. Now what you're suggesting to me is that some of the negotiations are going to get so acrimonious because unions will be literally fighting for their very existence because they don't even have employment standards as a floor. That, added to scabs and the other changes in the laws, is just going to create more and more labour unrest and unfortunately even violence on a picket line.

Mr Muma: I see it coming. In a conservative city like Stratford, if you had told me a couple of years ago that would have happened, I wouldn't have believed it, until I saw it happen on July 25 at Crane Canada.

Mr Christopherson: Maybe if there's a hope, a miracle, for once the government might listen to what the people are having to say about what's going to happen. They didn't with Bill 7, but they should pay attention to the fact that any violence that continues out in the province of Ontario is clearly the government's. They own the responsibility for every person who gets hurt because they've created the environment and allowed the circumstances that have brought it about.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Thank you very much for your presentation. I come from a riding where the local union has been able to negotiate paid personal holidays; paid spa weeks, as they're called; paid birthdays off and that. Don't you think the flexibility in this will allow your union more strength and negotiating ability to focus on the areas that your membership wants to concentrate on?

Mr Dale: The problem with your question is that the current act already allows for employers to negotiate increased benefit. There's no reason to change the act for that. The change in the act is so that you can reduce some of the minimums, supposedly for some greater increase when assessed together. I reject the premise of your question. Certainly, some employers pay for birthdays off, they add more holidays than are demanded by the standards, but I don't see that as an argument for reducing the minimums.

Mr Ouellette: No, what I'm saying is that you now have the ability as a union to focus on areas where you would like to strengthen up and possibly lessen down some if you thought necessary. I see the union as obtaining a great benefit for the local members.

Mr Dale: Certainly unions are a good benefit to workers; I wouldn't disagree with you there. But what we're talking about here is a minimum standard, and if you have a minimum, that implies by definition that there's nothing beneath it, that anything beneath it is subminimum and therefore unacceptable within our society. What you're talking about is that the unions now negotiate greater benefits, but what you're now going to ask them to do is negotiate the very basic things that we as a society should be able to expect, and that is the duty of government; that is not the duty of unions.

Mr Ouellette: Why would they go below the current standards that they're negotiating for, which are extremely higher than what's already out there?

Mr Dale: Why did you suggest that in the bill? Why did you suggest that minimums could be reduced? Because that is what the problem with flexibility on standards is. You are implying that these minimums can be reduced below minimum in exchange for greater benefits in some other area. But a minimum is a minimum is a minimum.

Mr Ouellette: I don't see the local union going below any standards that it currently has.

Mr Dale: I don't see them. What I do see is a business community that may take advantage of that. I'm not saying that all employers are bastards or anything else. The problem is that by definition the statement that every employer is an upright and wonderful citizen is also fallacious. We have to assume that there are some out there that are going to take advantage. If you get into these bizarre formulations of how to trade off minimum standards, what is going to happen is that some will take advantage of it. Honest employers are going to be forced into a position to either become dishonest and cheat their employees or they're going to move to a jurisdiction where they know there's a level playing field, there's a framework set up that means something and a government with teeth in it.

The Chair: Thank you all for coming before us here today and making your presentation. We certainly appreciate it.

Have we a representative from the Halton-Peel Coalition for Social Justice? How about the United Steelworkers of America south central area council? Waterloo Public Interest Research Group? I have an urge to make an editorial comment, but I will refrain.

WATERLOO REGION COMMUNITY LEGAL SERVICES

The Chair: Waterloo Region Community Legal Services?

Ms Sharon Twilley: I'm here.

The Chair: Excellent. Thank you for being more than prompt, well in advance.

Ms Twilley: I thought something like this might happen. No reflection on those presenters, but it's always wise to be prepared.

Interruption.

The Chair: For those making comments from the gallery, every group was asked to report well in advance of their appointed time, at least 30 minutes.

Interruption.

The Chair: Unfortunately other people will be denied the right to speak because they've taken spots up.

Let's proceed with the group that has been gracious enough to join us here today. Welcome.

Ms Twilley: Thank you very much for hearing from me. I have prepared a written brief. I've got two hand-caps today. I've got a throat infection, so I hope my voice hangs out, and I've forgotten my reading glasses. I hope the second problem will be to your advantage. I'm sure I'll manage. If I hold it far enough away, I'll be okay.

I'll quickly go through my paper, just hitting some of the highlights. I don't intend to depart radically from it; I will use its organization. I intend to talk today only on behalf of unorganized workers, not that we don't have concerns for organized workers, but their views are well represented before you.

Our perspective is laid out in the first page of my brief. It tells you who we are and who our clients are. I think that as one of 70 community legal clinics across the province we have a somewhat unique perspective in that our clients are screened for income and assets and therefore we do see the poorest people with all kinds of legal problems and from all kinds of backgrounds and perspectives. I have described some of the reasons why the people we see have had difficulty maintaining steady employment in the workforce, again on the first page of my brief.

I'd like to start out with the substance of my brief by just telling you a little anecdote, because it really came back to me when I looked at this legislation and I think about what may be happening with the rest of the review, or what I'm guessing may be happening with the rest of the review of this act. When I was a law student I had to look up something concerning employment law. I went to a well-known digest of legal principles that we all learned to use and I couldn't find anything under the heading "Employment Law" until someone helpfully told me that I needed to look under the law of master and servant. There was an act of the Legislature which was on the books for over 100 years and didn't make it into the RSO 1990, was finally repealed, but it was called the Master and Servant Act. I recommend it to you for reading. It's interesting and it was still used somewhat up until 1990.

I'm here to speak on behalf of what I see as the most vulnerable workers, the most marginal workers, because these are the people with whom I'm familiar. First of all, we'd like to endorse the position taken by Professor Judy Fudge, from whom I believe you've already heard. She's a genuine expert in this area of law and there aren't very many of them. We also endorse the two provisions which clarify entitlement to vacation pay and to pregnancy and parental leave.

The first point I'd like to make, though, is that it's our position that it's really premature to move ahead at this time with changes to the procedure and to the enforcement of this act before getting to the substance of it. I find it difficult, without knowing what the proposals are for new legislation, for new standards, to talk about how we enforce them.

To me, the Employment Standards Act has always been the most important to the most vulnerable worker. It doesn't apply to me. In my profession, we're excluded. The well-paid worker in a traditionally middle-class income job has never really needed the Employment Standards Act. By and large they were able to negotiate terms of employment which exceeded the minimum standards and they were by and large adhered to by responsible employers. Vulnerable workers were not in that position. I think the impact of changes to the standards and the impact of changes to these procedures will fall hardest on those people.

I think for the future that those of us who were excluded from the act without much complaint and those of us who didn't need the act are going to be a smaller and smaller portion of the workforce. Is this the future we want for the kids, for our children: lower and lower standards, lower and lower pay?

I refer to Professor Fudge's position with respect to the reference to the global economy as a rationalization for changing things, and I think she makes some very good points there. I've also recently read Professor David Foot's book, as I understand very many other people have. I have a real concern about the devaluation of work and the treatment of people as commodities and not as fellow human beings in the workplace. This isn't the way to get a good product. This isn't the way to get a quality product. This is not a way to produce a good service.

The results of Bill 49, in our submission, will be both explicitly and implicitly to deregulate the workplace. I explain at page 3 of my brief why I think that's true, why we think that's true.

With respect to why people don't complain, when I first started practising law, people came to me and described what I identified as employment standards breaches. I said: "Go to the Ministry of Labour. You can file a complaint and they'll look after it." They said: "I can't do that. I'm afraid to. I'll lose my job." This was in 1980. I continued to hear that through the 1980s, even the late 1980s, though not as often. I hear that today. I would say, when I was a very junior lawyer: "That's not a problem. The Employment Standards Act protects you from retaliation. It's an offence under the act to retaliate against you for making a complaint." I still say that, because I think people have a right to know that, but I also now say, "But I know it won't make any difference to you."

People are not prosecuted for retaliatory behaviour. The standard of proof is beyond a reasonable doubt. My clients laughed at me when I said that, and they were right. I think they were right; it isn't a useful protection. That's why 90% of people complain after they leave their jobs.

These people have no bargaining power, and their alternatives are few. They now can't receive social assistance for either three or six months if they quit their job or are fired for misconduct. Employment insurance is increasingly difficult to get, with the same sanctions. You're not eligible at all if you're basing a claim on leaving work without cause, which is very narrowly interpreted, or if you are fired for misconduct. It's easy for the employer to say you were fired for misconduct, and they may very well be believed. It's a big risk. That's why people don't complain until they leave their jobs.

I have something a little bit nice to say about workfare on page 4, and I'll leave you to read that.

We also oppose the forced choice between litigation and making a complaint. I've consulted with colleagues in private practice who work both for employers and employees and with members of our board of directors who have input into the policies and procedures that our clinic staff undertake. I sort of facetiously call this a make-work project for lawyers. If you want to read through why I say that, it's in the middle of page 4.

People are going to need to get a legal opinion, and they're going to wait a lot longer for some money. The concurrent complaint and litigation approach worked perfectly well. All it does is protect some employers from potential litigation that might have been successful, because people will need money a little sooner than they might get through the litigation process. Most wrongful dismissal actions are settled, very few of them go to trial, and there is a different test applied by the courts.

We also oppose the minimum and maximum recovery limits, for reasons I set out. I think that employment standards officers probably already exercise some discretion, and they properly should, with respect to complaints that are frivolous or obviously unmeritorious. Why not just explicitly give them the discretion for complaints under some reasonable amount? Merit and pricetag are not always synonymous, for reasons that I describe here. Even the courts never apply the de minimis concept indiscriminately. It's a discretionary power for good reason. Leave it to the employment standards officer.

I give an example of a situation where I think using a $100 minimum floor results in a real injustice and ties the hands of an employment standards officer in a situation I think we all agree ought to be remedied.

I have a couple of suggestions to make employment standards officers' jobs easier and therefore maybe a little quicker and maybe they can push a few more files through. Reverse the onus of proof. With respect to a lot of complaints, I think an employer who has a valid defence to the complaint can quickly prove it. Send them a notice saying: "We have a complaint. It seems to establish the basis for an order. Tell us what your response is." If there's no response, you make the order. There can still be provision for appeal and so on, but that would save a considerable amount of time. Employers know whether they've breached the act or not probably in most instances.

Increase the upper limit of the penalty element of the order. That may help with cooperating more quickly and help cover the real costs of investigation and enforcement here.

I really advocate some greater focus on prevention. Just one little idea I have, for example, is with respect to education. Get materials out to employers with the Revenue Canada payroll deduction tables. They all get them. They all get them regularly. Isn't there some way you can piggyback on that and share the postage? It's probably impossible, but it's an idea. Let's be imaginative about ways to get information out both to employers and workers so that some of these breaches don't happen.

I'm not convinced that all employers are bad; I'm not convinced that all employers are good. I think there's a spectrum from Dickensian to superb and there are people in the middle who, with better information, could do a better job and cut back on the need for complaints. The ministry knows who the bad employers are. They've got files. Every employment standards officer and every office knows who they are. We all know who they are. They're messing around with everyone. They're not remitting source deductions, they owe EHT premiums, they owe money to the Workers' Compensation Board, they owe money to their suppliers. They're juggling everyone around and they're creating problems for everyone. Focus on them. Deal with them.

Another idea I had is to make employment standards officers' orders, not just review decisions, but actual orders made after investigation, after complaint, and after there's a determination that there is a basis for a complaint, make them a matter of public record. I don't mean publish them in the paper, but make them available to the public, and if the media wish to deal with them let them do so. That enlists the public in helping to enforce the standards, and it shouldn't be costly at all. Have them in a book on the front counter and anybody who wants to look at them can do so.

I have some suggestions for the improvement of collection and enforcement which I've described at page 6. Again, I don't want to go through those in detail. They're available for you to read. I'm not sure what my timing is here, but I hope I haven't gone too far over.

The Chair: We have about five minutes to go.

Ms Twilley: For me to continue?

The Chair: Yes. Five minutes in total. So depending on how much time you want, if any, for questions.

Ms Twilley: Let me talk about some of the kinds of standards violations I've seen and the difficulty that people have in coping with them. I have to say that in the past our role has been essentially to assist workers who've come to us and sort of organizing the information they have, organizing any evidence they may have, and pulling it together so that it's coherent, maybe asking them some questions about issues they don't realize are important, getting the answers from them, and either putting this together in written form or some kind of brief so that they can take that with them to the ministry. The employment standards officer's job, I hope, is made somewhat easier by that. There is still the formal complaint process. People must still make a complaint before an officer and go through the investigation process.

I have to say that has worked well in the instances where we have actually done that, and we've had a good relationship with the employment standards officers who have at least kept us generally informed of what was going on. But that really is all the role there is for us to play, because it is the mandate of the employment standards officer to investigate, and they have, very properly, very powerful tools to investigate. They can do that job far better than I can.

This comes back to litigation. Litigation isn't really a substitute. I think litigation over an employment standards breach really isn't a substitute for the investigation process. It isn't an adequate substitute. Assuming a $100 minimum recovery level, if you're told to go to the Small Claims Court for $100, I would tell anyone who wanted to make a Small Claims Court claim for $100, in economic terms forget it. It is not worth your while.

If you really believe in the principle and you really want to do it go right ahead, but it's going to cost you money even if you are successful. It costs $35 to file a claim in Small Claims Court. You have to pay that to the clerk. That is recoverable with the judgement. You used to have to pay $20 to serve the claim because the bailiffs attached to the court did that. That's no longer available. You have to pay a private process server. In some instances you can probably do it yourself, but then you have to get together an affidavit of service. A lot of people don't know how to do that, so you pay $30-35 to a process server plus mileage if it's outside the immediate area. You can take a day off work to go to the trial if you're working, if there's a trial, and then if you do get judgement you have to pay for the various enforcement writs to be issued out of the court. You also may have to pay a private bailiff to pick up property or to go and ask for the payment to be made.

All these fees are added into the judgement, granted, but you may very well be throwing good money after bad. This is why I come back to my statement to give the employment standards officers the discretion with respect to claims of a small amount, and I think that is appropriate. Claims for small amounts are sometimes about very important issues and may be about quite a number of workers. Some claims for large amounts are very easy to investigate and very easy to determine. The amount really doesn't correlate completely, and the costs of litigating a $100 claim or a $200 claim or a $300 claim are so high that it isn't worth while.

I don't have a lot to say about whether it makes sense to litigate a $10,000 claim, but I think some of the issues are the same. In private litigation, in order to get information about what the other party has, you go through a process called discovery. It's very imperfect. There are lots of opportunities to hide information. You can't get copies of shredded records. It's a cat-and-mouse game about trying to get information from somebody who doesn't want to give it to you. You have no opportunity to go in and actually look at the records, which an employment standards officer does. Why deprive people at some notional level of that opportunity, when the claim for more money is not necessarily harder to investigate? It might be and it might not be. There's far from 100% correlation.

Have I used up my five minutes, or is there something else you'd like me to touch on?

The Chair: Actually, we've gone over the 20 minutes. I didn't want to cut you off there, but I want to thank you very much for taking the time to come and make a presentation before us here today.

I'll make one last call for the Halton-Peel Coalition for Social Justice. They have indeed not shown up.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, SOUTH CENTRAL AREA COUNCIL

The Chair: Next on our list is the United Steelworkers of America, south central area council. Good afternoon. We have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between either presentation or question-and-answer time.

Ms Colette Murphy: My name is Colette Murphy. I work at Walker Exhaust in Cambridge and I'm the president of the Steelworkers' south central area council. I represent approximately 8,000 Steelworkers in the area — the area consists of Kitchener, Waterloo, Cambridge, Guelph, Elmira — and it's on their behalf that I'm speaking with you today.

We believe that Bill 49 will seriously jeopardize the rights of workers to basic employment protection in Ontario. We'd like the government to reconsider its position before depriving workers of the minimum standards which currently provide basic employment protection. These amendments will make it easier for employers to deny their employees the minimum wages and benefits set out in the Employment Standards Act.

Just let me give you an example of an employer in Cambridge that I know of who's already violated the act and got away with it. A friend of mine who works part-time, approximately 20 hours a week, and is unorganized received her paycheque, which included pay for a statutory holiday. The cheque was for considerably less than she was entitled to, so she spoke to her supervisor about the error. She was told that there was no error, that the employer was now using a different method of calculating moneys owing for statutory holiday pay. It was explained that the employer had gone back three months to find the average daily pay to do the calculation and because she'd had some time off with the flu in that time period, she had received less than her regular day's wage.

I encouraged her to file a complaint with the Ministry of Labour under the Employment Standards Act because the act clearly says that employees who qualify for statutory holiday pay are to receive their regular pay for that day. She spoke with other employees who had also received less pay than they were entitled to under the act, but no one would come forward with her to make a complaint. They were too scared of losing their jobs. The employer had said that if they don't take less pay they were going to get their hours cut and they could possibly have layoffs. She wouldn't file on her own for the same reasons.

If this is already happening in our workplaces, then Bill 49 is a gift to unscrupulous Ontario employers, who will view the amendments as an opportunity to get minimum workplace standards or trade them for increased hours of work.

If the ministry would accept third-party complaints of violations of the Employment Standards Act, I, on their behalf, could make a complaint, therefore taking away the fear of reprisal from the employer in order to protect employees by preserving their anonymity. Third-party complaints which establish a violation by the employer should trigger an audit or an investigation.

Under the current legislation, an employee has up to two years after the facts which give rise to the violation of the act arose in order to lodge a claim. The employee is entitled to recover any moneys owing for up to two years. Very few employees file employee standards complaints while they're still employed. Over 90% of complaints are filed by people who have left their employment. They were fired, laid off or possibly found other employment.

An employment standards claim investigation will not begin until nine months after the claim is filed, so enforcement can take up two or three more years. Despite the lengthy delays in enforcement, this process is quicker than civil proceedings in the General Division court.

Bill 49 reduces the period for which the employee can recover money owed from two years to six months. Employees who are owed more than six months' money will be forced to either drop their claims for money owed in excess of the limitation period or bring a costly and expensive legal action through the civil courts. I guess you've already heard from the speaker prior to me what those costs would be.

For monetary claims beyond the six-month period and in excess of $6,000, employees will not be able to go to Small Claims Court but will be forced to hire a lawyer and file legal action in the Ontario Court (General Division). Currently the Ontario Court (General Division) is so backlogged that it takes between three and six years for an action to be resolved.

Another area of the Employment Standards Act that concerns us is the lowering of the Ontario wage protection fund payments from $5,000 to $2,000. There have been a number of plants in our area that have either moved south or have declared bankruptcy. Many of these employees would not have received any moneys owing to them if it had not been for this fund. Employees will now have to choose between recovery through the more expeditious and cost-effective path of making a claim through the ministry or filing a lengthy and expensive civil suit with the courts. The injustice of this choice which employees are faced with is made worse because claims through the ministry are capped at $2,000 and will not include recovery of severance and termination pay.

As the law now stands, it is the employee's choice to forgo his or her remedy under the Employment Standards Act. What Bill 49 will do is eliminate the employee's choice by forcing him or her to go to civil court. After filing a claim, employees will have two weeks to seek legal advice and reconsider their options before their decision not to pursue court action is final. Employees who choose to go to civil court will be forced to wait between three and six years for the wages owing them by their employers.

Many of these unemployed people do not have the money to pursue their claim through the courts and may also lose most of the moneys owing them on legal costs, which they cannot afford.

An emergency alarm sounded.

Ms Murphy: That doesn't mean my time is up, I hope.

The Chair: We'll check and see if there's any validity or whether it's a false alarm.

Ms Murphy: Okay. Employees who are covered by a collective agreement will have to grieve the alleged violation of the Employment Standards Act using procedures outlined in their contract. Arbitrators will have the power to order payment of money owed to employees by their employer. If the employer cannot pay, the order could lead to employees being paid under the employee wage protection fund, which will only pay $2,000 per employee, excluding termination and severance pay. These changes will force unionized employees to rely on the expensive grievance arbitration procedure. In effect, the Ontario government is proposing to privatize employment standards enforcement for unionized employees.

I would like to say that we do agree with three amendments that have clarified pre-existing jurisprudence of referees. The first one would provide entitlement to vacation pay of two weeks per year, whether or not the employment was active. The second one requires employers to pay termination pay within seven days of an employee's termination. The third is, the calculation of service and length of employment is to include time on parental and pregnancy leave.

We have many objections to Bill 49, but I'm sure that you've heard most of the other ones today. I would like to close by saying that this bill undermines many of the basic principles on which minimum standards legislation has historically been based. We believe that both organized and unorganized workers will bear the burden of its harsh and unprecedented attack on these basic principles.

I thank you for your time. Colette Murphy, on behalf of the Steelworkers, south central Ontario area council.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Ms Murphy. I'll build this distraction into the time we give the total presentation here. The next up to start questioning this round will be the New Democrats, and we have a generous three minutes per caucus.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much, Colette, for that presentation. It's interesting that you raised the issue of the Ontario wage protection fund gutting, because earlier on one of the government members — I don't know if you were present — said in response to another presentation that in terms of the rest of the changes that are yet to come to the Employment Standards Act, the working people in this province should just have faith that the government will take care of their needs. It looks to me like you, including this, agree with us that this government has no intention of protecting or enhancing the rights of the most vulnerable workers. That has got to be one of the best examples there is, particularly when you link the gutting of that desperate last ditch fund for money owed to the fact that one of the first things this government did was give back to employers a $50-a-year business filing fee that was there to recoup some of the administrative costs of handling those claims.

So it's clear whose side they're on. If the government really wanted to send a message that it cares, it would revisit that decision, reinstate termination and severance and put the fund back up to $5,000, which really wasn't enough either, but it was certainly better than what we had before, which was absolutely nothing. People should not forget that was part of their anti-worker Bill 7, which of course was the parent of the bad-boss Bill 49.

When you raise the issue of the lowering of standards and the fact that you expect more examples of the kinds of circumstances your friend was in, do you see us having the ability to find out about these cases in any way or do you think it's also going to be difficult to even know what's going on, because people will just throw their arms up in the air and say, "There's nobody out there for me?"

Ms Murphy: A lot of people don't come forward because they're scared. They're scared of losing their jobs. We all know that. We all know people who have been hurt. This is just one example. Yes, they feel as though there's nobody out there. The only alternative they have is people in the unions. They see us as the only alternative. One thing the government is trying to do is to stop organizing. They've made it very hard for people who are stuck in these circumstances to actually reach any kind of settlement. They are turning to unions as the only alternative. Despite Bill 7, we have been able to organize. We've been very successful, especially in this area, in organizing because they do see us as the only alternative.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you for the presentation today. We've heard from the United Steelworkers on a couple of occasions. You've brought a couple of new issues.

I'd like to preface my comments by responding to an earlier comment made that perhaps I was misdirecting.

We refer to this as the kiss-and-make-up tour, because really what the NDP here is trying to do is justify its changes, which were called the social contract deal. I think the responsible member on the other side should keep his comments a little more succinctly to the bill which we're discussing and not —

Interruption.

Mr O'Toole: Well, I'm responding, and that's what I'm doing. So if you want to be involved in this, you get to the table.

I think the key here is, I'd look at the success of the current bill. I'm going to make reference here to the earlier Mrs Dale, who was representing an international association, who opened and closed her presentation with two statements that the changes must be made. I can quote it for you. She's sitting over there. I'm not misrepresenting. She opened and closed saying that the current act does not work.

The information we've received and read over the last two or three days, despite that, would indicate that all the changes, the six-month duration, will bring the claims forward quicker, before there's a huge litigation problem. The issue of the entitlement amounts: Most claims are under $10,000, 96% of them, yet we spend an inordinate amount of resources today on the 4%, who are people who could perhaps, middle-income earners and up, take care of themselves in the legal system.

Much of the empowerment of the unions today, under their own collective bargaining language, allows them flexibility today and also ensures in the act that they're no less standards. I've heard presenters today say they want more time off work, and I think responsible negotiators will ensure that the people they represent will give no less. It changes by workplace; it changes by season and nature of work.

I want you to tell me you're satisfied that a current bill that rewards 25 cents on the dollar being collected is working, and if it is working, that you aren't prepared to participate in making constructive suggested changes.

Ms Murphy: First of all I'm not privy to any other comments that my predecessors have made. I just arrived because I had to work.

Mr O'Toole: Good for you.

Ms Murphy: I really can't respond to anything they may have said, but I can tell you that the current Employment Standards Act has clearly, in some areas, not worked. The example of my friend I just told you about is one clear example.

Mr O'Toole: I agree.

Ms Murphy: From what I understand, one of the reasons that we only collect 25% of the dollars owed us from our employers is because they refuse to pay. They should pay it in the first place so we wouldn't have to have such good legislation.

Mr O'Toole: Maybe better collection.

Ms Murphy: I don't know if it's better collection, because sometimes they won't pay up no matter what. What we really need is better enforcement of employment standards, because right now they're just thumbing their nose at the government and saying, "Collect it if you can."

Mr O'Toole: We're not disagreeing with you. You make a very good point, and I don't think you'd find anyone here who'd disagree with that. To use scarce resources is what our government is trying to do. We're really going to have to be responsible to the unorganized — very big, large, powerful unions like the Steelworkers aren't without resources, and I respect that — because the unorganized need the limited resources we have left. Those are the people who have the most frequent claims and they're the ones we have to help and focus those resources down. I think you've made some good presentations, some good points, and I'm pleased to listen.

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Prescott and Russell): Thank you for your representation. You seem to be satisfied with the actual employment standards. It's just that they're not being enforced.

Ms Murphy: I can't say that I'm entirely in favour of it. There are a lot of areas where it needs beefing up. I look at this as an opportunity to do that. Like I said, the only three areas where I can honestly say I'm satisfied with your efforts so far are the ones I indicated already.

Mr Lalonde: People have mentioned many times, ever since we started these hearings, that people don't seem to be educated; they don't seem to be aware of the Employment Standards Act. Some people even said employment standards should be posted in the working area. At the present time it doesn't work because probably there was too much political involvement in the past or the employees were not doing their job properly. I don't know what the reason was.

You referred on one of the pages in your brief, "For monetary claims beyond the six-month period and in excess of $6,000, employees will not be able to go to Small Claims Court." It's a good point, I think, because I believe the government should think of increasing the maximum to $10,000 for small claims. But one point that should be brought to the attention of the members of the government is that many Small Claims Courts have closed their offices in the last six months. This could have been an avenue, but the avenue doesn't exist because government has decided to close the Small Claims Court.

I fully agree with you that at the present time people are not educated. I know that if people in my riding are not satisfied with the way they were treated at their workplace, they come immediately to my office or they call our office. I believe that the MPPs should all have the Employment Standards Act in place to give to employees who are not too sure. Also, they should give their name — that will be kept confidentially — and if they don't want to call the Ministry of Labour, the MPP should play a role in informing the Ministry of Labour that there was some action that wasn't according to the Employment Standards Act. Would you agree with this?

Ms Murphy: I would certainly agree that employees in the workplace need education on the Employment Standards Act. Yes, it's a very good idea to have it prominent in the workplace so that each and every employee has access to that. It's clear from the call I got from a friend, and I've had many others, that people really don't understand what their rights are. Because they're not phoning the ministry to ask their advice on what their rights are, that tells me there's also a problem there. They either don't trust government or they just feel they're not going to get any help. It's a real problem. When people know what their rights are, it goes a long way in stopping the injustices.

The Chair: We're two minutes over. Thank you very much for taking the time to come before us here today. We appreciate it.

Interruption.

The Chair: I'm afraid not. The next group is already here.

Mr Christopherson: On a point of order, Mr Chair: I've been advised that the local number that was referred to earlier, if you didn't have it already and if you're looking for it, to the parliamentary assistant, is 885-3378.

Mr Baird: Is that the one that's advertised in the local phone book, or where is that advertised for people to call?

Mr Christopherson: One of the union reps who was here earlier just handed me this and said, "This is the number that's been referred to."

Mr Baird: I'll certainly take that back; I appreciate it. But if that's the one that's advertised, that will be also helpful. Thank you.

WATERLOO PUBLIC INTEREST RESEARCH GROUP

The Chair: We have the next group here to make a presentation, the Waterloo Public Interest Research Group. Good afternoon, Mr Novak. We have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation time and questions and answers.

Mr Daryl Novak: I'd like to begin by thanking the committee for giving us the opportunity to speak to Bill 49. WPIRG is a non-profit organization funded by students at the University of Waterloo, and we have a membership of over 12,000 individuals. Our mandate is to promote research, education and action on issues affecting the public good in our community. We're part of an international network of public interest research groups, including 10 others based here in Ontario.

The constituency we serve is primarily students. However, the framework for WPIRG's work can be defined as working to protect the public interest. This is a bad time for us to be doing a presentation. We are a primarily volunteer-run organization, and this being the summer term for students, there aren't very many students around. We believe that changes to the Employment Standards Act will have a profound impact on our constituency, being students and youth. We think it's very important that there is extensive consultation, and unfortunately we are not able to prepare a brief that is very representative of our constituency because school is not in session right now.

We are very interested in the phase 2 process of the amendment to the Employment Standards Act that will be happening presumably in the next sitting of the Legislature. As a preliminary comment, we believe that employers will always have the advantage of superior economic power. In practice they will always retain the ability to provide work and to take it away in an economic system based on competition. As a society our collective responsibility expressed through our governments is to prevent exploitation, and in the case of the Employment Standards Act to stop the worst form of employment abuses by providing minimum standards. Thus, with respect to Bill 49 and the fall review of the Employment Standards Act, WPIRG's focus will be to advocate for the protection of the rights of the average unorganized worker.

You know of course that over half the employees in Ontario are not represented by a union. These workers rely on the Employment Standards Act to provide them with basic terms and conditions for work and the enforcement mechanisms provided therein. Any changes that threaten the basic floor of rights of workers are and will be categorically rejected by WPIRG. The reason we take that position is because we believe that students and youth are among the most vulnerable in the labour force. They tend to work in service sector jobs that can be categorized as casual, temporary, part-time, poorly paid, low-skilled and insecure. The Employment Standards Act is the only type of protection they really have.

Some of the recommendations that we have: Again, we do not want to see any type of erosion in minimum standards. I learned this morning that provision to negotiate between an employer and a union around employment standards was removed from Bill 49. This is something we're relieved about. We know that will have an impact on students and youth.

We believe that there needs to be a standardizing of the legislation, that there should be few exceptions. Typically, students and youth are busy surviving in meeting their rent during school and they really are not provided with an opportunity to know what their rights are around employment and housing and other such things. We believe that there needs to be more education of what people's rights are, what students' rights are. Because they're unorganized, when students have a problem or youth have a problem, they'll often live with the conditions that they're working under, because all of you know that there is a high unemployment rate among youth. Often they will suffer through whatever conditions they have, and when they leave, because they are young, possibly, and also because they don't know what their rights are, they don't typically complain.

We believe that there need to be more employment standards officers and that there needs to be a more vigorous enforcement of the act. There needs to be an immediate response to claims. Again, students and youth really have nowhere to turn, so if they are going to turn to the employment standards office, they need to have an immediate response.

We believe that there should be routine investigations. When employers are demonstrated to have violated the act there should be an automatic audit of their other employees. Often in a workplace where it's predominantly youth, if one individual is wronged there's a strong possibility that other individuals have been wronged as well.

Looking at the limitation periods, reducing from two years to six months seems reasonable when you consider that over 90% of claims are made by people after they have left that employment. However, with other Employment Standards Act violations, six months does not seem reasonable because of fear of reprisal from an employer. I think that is something that needs to be stiffened in the act, that employees are not subject to arbitrary reprisals from their employer.

Debt collection, we haven't had an opportunity to analyse what kind of effect privatizing this function of the employment standards office will have. Our concern centres around what will happen, if there will be a levy on people for the money that's collected on their behalf and also the pressure that will be brought to bear with them coming to an early settlement. Youth and students will suffer most in that case because they will be more easily coerced. Although the bill provides for that not to happen, it doesn't really spell out how that will be prevented.

We really didn't have an opportunity to do an extensive review of the act, but we're anticipating the changes to the act with trepidation. When the changes are announced we will do a full review.

This is the extent of our comments to this point.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation. That leaves us two and a half minutes per caucus, and the questioning this time will commence with the government.

Mr John Hastings (Etobicoke-Rexdale): Mr Novak, I'd like to ask you what the role the Ontario Public Interest Research Group plays in terms of advancing knowledge and understanding of the workplace for young people and students if that isn't one of your roles. You have expressed certain opinions.

Second I'd like to ask you, what does it say about our education system, in the secondary sector particularly, since the law in society course explicitly has a section dealing with employment law and employment rights? Are young people and students today not hearing what goes on? What role do you think unions must play in the broad-based educational effort? That point has come up with several presenters today, and it seems to me that the union movement has always done very well in terms of seminars and getting out the message. What's missing if they're not doing that any more? I've heard that from two different presenters today and from other people on the other two days. I wasn't at those sessions, but that theme came up.

Mr Novak: As far as what our role is in advancing education, we have a very limited budget. The types of activities we're able to conduct, you can guess that among a membership of over 12,000, to try to effectively reach all of them is very difficult for us. We have a budget of under $100,000. So even with a couple of employees, paying rent, the actions we take are very minimal.

With the advent of the World Wide Web we're looking at doing some work to further educate students. We're looking at new avenues to be able to reach out to students and do an education, but we're really just there to try to fill in the gaps. With the Employment Standards Act, because it is an integral part of what the government provides, it seems the onus should be on the government to devise an effective manner in which to educate the public, including youth. However, we are always ready and available. Given the proper tools, we will use them as effectively as possible in order to reach our constituency.

As far as the educational system, perhaps what we need is a course in citizenship and courses on your basic rights as a citizen. I think that framed in a proper way, you can build that type of sense of citizenship in students. Of course, the context for that is very important as well. People feel like citizens when they feel they have a place and a role in their community. Of course the feeling that's created in someone is delivered in many different ways and spheres.

Mr Lalonde: I tend to agree with my colleague Mr Hastings about some comments that you made. Are you aware of the content of the Employment Standards Act, and if so, what impact do you think this is going to have on your group?

Mr Novak: As they relate to the changes brought about under Bill 49?

Mr Lalonde: Yes. I don't think you have gone through the whole amendment.

Mr Novak: I've got it right here. I got it off the Internet, as a matter of fact. Our concern is really based on the minimum standards, the floor of standards that may be jeopardized, not necessarily through Bill 49. Right now this has been completely pulled, so it won't have an impact, but we strongly believe that there need to be minimum standards that people know about and that are enforced.

Mr Lalonde: You mention that the privatization of collection will have an effect on students and youth. I believe that up to $10,000, up to six months are to the benefit of youth and students.

Mr Novak: We have been unable to do any empirical research looking at the claim average as it relates to youth. All we have to look at right now has been out of the annual report, the aggregate as reported by the Ministry of Labour.

Mr Lalonde: I have no more comments.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. Early in your comments you noted that superior economic power will always lie with the employer as a natural order of things and only the laws of society will help to offset that natural advantage. The government's claim all along, in terms of not only this agenda but their entire agenda, and they continue through with Bill 49, is that they are going to make the economy work for everyone, it's going to create jobs and that's going to take us back to the Garden of Eden. Yet we know from your comments that there are a lot of young people who are fearful of the future, and I hear you suggesting that Bill 49 is not helping to alleviate the concern that young people have. Can you look into your own crystal ball and give me a sense of where you think the province of Ontario will be with labour law changes like Bill 7, changes to WCB, Bill 49, loss of pay equity, all those kinds of things, and what that means for young people over the next half-decade or so?

Mr Novak: The cornerstone to a growing economy is people's sense of stability and the belief they have that there is a future for them. When I'm walking through the halls of our school or when we have students coming in to use our resource centre, there is a great deal of apprehension and fear about the future. We have a lot of graduates who come back saying that they are unable to work in their field of study; many of them have ended up in places that are far from where they originally wanted to be.

I think students' sense of what is happening is that we're moving from a sense of collective responsibility in our communities to a dog-eat-dog, individualistic social structure. I can't see how that feeling, that sense of the future can help to give people a sense of a stable future. Unless we see demonstrated actions by the government to empower communities and to have a finely wound social fabric that supports people when they're down, provide basic education and excellent education for everyone, I think the immediate future looks glum, and that's certainly something that we hear a lot about.

The Chair: Thank you very much for taking the time to make your presentation here.

I don't believe our next presenter, Canadian Auto Workers, Local 1986, is here yet. In their absence, and we've got a couple of minutes before then, I wonder if we could have a five-minute recess; and subcommittee members, there's an issue to be discussed for next week's hearings, if I could ask the subcommittee members to meet me here for just one second.

Actually, there are 10 minutes before their appointed time. We'll take a 10-minute recess.

The committee recessed from 1547 to 1601.

GUELPH-WELLINGTON COALITION FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE

The Chair: I call the meeting back to order. We're grateful that our 4:20 group, the Guelph-Wellington Coalition for Social Justice, arrived well in advance. Good afternoon to you both. We have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation time or question-and-answer period. Please introduce yourselves for the Hansard reporter.

Ms Tracy Rockett: Before we start, are all the MPPs here?

Mr Christopherson: All the ones who matter.

The Chair: There are representatives from all three parties here, yes.

Mr Baird: All the government members are here.

Ms Rockett: Okay. My name is Tracy Rockett and my colleague is Chris Margetson. We represent the Guelph-Wellington Coalition for Social Justice, located in Guelph, whose members comprise 30 different organizations representing over 2,000 members.

Ms Chris Margetson: When Labour Minister Elizabeth Witmer introduced the Bill 49 amendments to the Employment Standards Act, she claimed to be making housekeeping amendments only. Bill 49 would be facilitating administration and enforcement by clarifying and simplifying definitions and procedures. Ms Witmer presented the changes as minor technical amendments. These changes hand employers a huge strategic advantage and are clearly substantive. They diminish and eliminate rights and options for all workers, but most particularly the vulnerable in our workforce: non-unionized and part-time or low-paid workers. These changes will make it more acceptable and simpler for employers to mistreat or cheat employees and much more difficult for all workers to enforce their rights.

A fundamental feature of the Ontario law has always been that no one can contract out of employment standards. The legislation has set a floor below which negotiated agreements or contracts could not fall. Bill 49 removes this floor. This floor of rights has been enshrined in Ontario law for decades. Housekeeping? Hardly.

Ms Rockett: Flexible standards, for employers only. Bill 49 contains a fundamental change to Ontario labour law by permitting workplace parties to contract out important minimum standards. Prior to these amendments it was illegal for an agreement to have any provisions below the minimum standards set out in the ESA. Bill 49 allows a collective agreement to override the legal minimum standards concerning severance pay, overtime, public holidays, hours of work and vacation pay if the contract "confers greater rights...when those matters are assessed together."

Employers now have the opportunity to attempt to trade off minimum standards in exchange for increased hours of work. When standards change for unionized workers, they will change for non-unionized workers as well. Market forces will pull all of us down to the lowest level. Employees are human beings, not bargaining chips.

The potential of this amendment to erode people's standard of living should be enough to make the drafters of these amendments rethink, if not radically alter, Bill 49. It is certainly enough to make the Guelph-Wellington Coalition for Social Justice stand in opposition to the bill as a whole.

What kind of housekeeping takes legislated rights that were the floor and rips them up to be put on the table? This is a demolition.

The shortsighted may see this rush to the bottom as helping employers become competitive, but the more sane will question whether this makes for higher productivity, better workplace relations, increased consumer purchases or an improved quality of life.

Ms Margetson: Ms Witmer's amendments propose to end the Ministry of Labour's enforcement responsibilities whenever they consider violations could be resolved by the courts. Consider: A 20-year maintenance worker is terminated without cause. His legal right is to receive notice of termination or pay in lieu of notice under both employment standards and common law. Generally the entitled notice under common law is greater than the employment standards minimum.

Presently the worker could file an employment standards claim and instigate a lawsuit under the common law notice entitlement. As a general rule the employer is willing to pay the employment standards minimum quickly to avoid the simple and sure enforcement through the Ministry of Labour. This would allow the worker to pay the rent and feed his family or use the money to retain a lawyer to pursue the wrongful dismissal suit in the courts, as legal aid is not available. The minimal employment standards payment is then deducted from any court-ordered payment.

Bill 49 will take this strategy away from the worker. He will either be forced to accept the initial minimal claim, regardless of his legal or moral rights, or risk eviction and food banks in order to sue his former employer for what is rightfully his. He will never again be allowed to do both. Litigation may take years. Employers declare bankruptcy or move. There are no guarantees he will ever see one dollar.

Especially low-income workers will feel pressure to settle for less money than they are really owed. Sudden loss of employment can throw a vulnerable family into stressful chaos. They will be expected to make this very important decision during the first two weeks of this most trying time of their life. Many vulnerable workers are not aware of their legal rights and could be excluded from commencing a civil action unless they obtain legal advice within this short, yet chaotic and stressful two-week period.

Even worse, a worker who quickly starts a civil action without realizing the ramifications of this decision does not appear to have even the short two weeks to change her mind. She appears to have no right to do so and then institute a complaint under the act. This is an unjust and seemingly blatant attack on some of the most abused workers in Ontario: those phased out, squeezed out and let go, many of whom have dedicated years of their life to profit-hungry employers. At a time in their lives when they are feeling battered and bruised, hopeless and depressed you are adding yet another difficult and needless burden.

Ms Rockett: Maximum/minimum claims: The amendments introduce a new statutory maximum amount that an employee may recover by filing a complaint under the act. This maximum of $10,000 appears to apply to amounts owing of back wages and other moneys such as vacation, severance and termination pay. There are only a few exceptions, such as for orders awarding wages in respect of violations of the pregnancy and parental leave provisions, and unlawful reprisals under the act.

Any cap will penalize those workers who are owed more than the maximum. A worker who has been deprived of wages for a lengthy period will have the least amount of means to hire a lawyer and wait for the case to be settled. This cap will encourage the worst employers to violate the basic standards.

Bill 49 also gives the minister the right to set out a minimum amount for a claim. Workers who make a claim below the minimum will be denied the right to file a complaint or have an investigation. This allows any employers to abuse their workers under the minimum in any six-month period and avoid legal penalty.

The question for you, the people entrusted to protect the public, is this: Why have any legislated rights if you're not going to enforce them?

The raison d'être for government is to ensure fair play, to allow all citizens to operate and compete with the same rules applying for everyone. By instituting a minimum and a maximum claim you will tilt the table in favour of one group, the employer. If employers must steal from their employees, and to be sure, not paying what is legally owed is theft, then (1) they should not be in business; and (2) who would want to do business with them anyway? That kind of employer would not make a trustworthy partner in any enterprise.

Real life: The general direction of these amendments is towards allowing business to be self-regulating, the assumption being that companies will just sort things out among themselves. Of course they will. The drive to make the maximum amount of profit is the only standard by which any decision will be judged. This allows no room for the individual or for society.

A case in point: Little Tikes of Guelph, a premier plastics manufacturer with a well-regarded line of children's toys, a profitable, community-minded company that established a manufacturing and warehouse centre in 1995, grew to employ 120 workers. Although non-unionized, the company treated employees well and rewarded them with profit-sharing. As well, employees could work overtime whenever they desired to do so. Little Tikes also contributed to the community by donating toys to local groups time and again.

In late 1995 the company announced it would be purchasing an empty factory and expanding operations; 65 new jobs were forecast. Three months later the company announced that it would closing down the manufacturing and not expanding. Why, you ask? Because they could make even more profit by relocating to another existing site in the US. They were making a profit in Guelph, they were a good provider for the community, but money talks. Profit is the only thing that matters. There is no loyalty to anyone or any place.

How about some examples of how companies conduct business with their employees? First there's the electrician working for a small technology company that has orders for over $1 million on the table. Their commercial production facility needs to get on line in a hurry, so in the first week the electrician works over 80 hours; second week, over 80 hours again; third week, by Wednesday, he gets paid for week one. The paycheck is for 40 hours of work. One of the owners tells him that the company only pays for 40 hours of work and any work beyond that is voluntary. Needless to say, the company shut down by the end of the third week. The electrician is still owed more than 80 hours of overtime and has yet to decide on how to proceed.

Then there's a waitress. She was employed, along with 19 other people. One Monday she showed up for work and there was a note on the door saying that the place was closed. All the workers pursued the matter with the Ministry of Labour. Generally they were owed two weeks' wages, vacation and severance. Less than a year later the employees were reimbursed by the ministry.

While the previous examples are not earth-shattering, they do speak to some of the limitations of Bill 49. What will be the minimum standard? Whatever the limit, it will force a number of workers to go to Small Claims Court to get what belongs to them. How many people would actually do this? What about having only two weeks to make a decision on how to proceed with your claim? How will workers even know what their rights are?

If we cannot trust companies to reinvest their profits in our community, why give any company more loopholes to shirk their responsibility to their employees and to our society? The bottom line is this: Profits will always preempt fairness, equity and human beings.

Private collectors: The proposed amendments would privatize the collection function of the Ministry of Labour's employment practices branch. This provides a look at a task which has traditionally been public. An ongoing difficulty has been the ministry's ability to collect wages assessed against employers because of the employers' refusal to pay. Your solution is to absolve the government of the responsibility to enforce the act by farming out the problem to a collection agency. Why create a market for vultures to come in and pick off hard-earned wages from anyone who was abused by their employer?

In addition, the employment standards director can authorize a private collector to charge a fee to persons who owe money. This is intolerable. The ideology behind the amendment shows a complete lack of understanding of the history of government and its role in society. Laws exist to protect all of us. Our society needs independent, impartial people whose only interest is in enforcing and upholding the law, not turning a profit. Will the police be next on your list of government employees who must justify their existence by being able to raise enough revenue to cover their costs?

Ms Margetson: The amendments in Bill 49 seriously tamper with the period of time that employees are entitled to back pay. Presently, employees are entitled to back pay for a two-year period. Bill 49 reduces this period significantly to six months from the filing of a complaint. Again, low-paid, vulnerable workers will suffer. They often cannot afford to finance a lawsuit and live in fear of their employer. They would not be able to file a complaint until they are terminated and/or change employers. They can work on promises for weeks or months, until they realize that they will not be granted their statutory rights by their employer and finally file the claim. As mentioned earlier, these workers will not be eligible for legal aid in order to institute a lawsuit.

Ms Witmer's statements regarding housekeeping, simplifying etc seem ludicrous in light of the heavy burden this places on vulnerable workers. Even more incomprehensible on this same issue of time periods is the continuation of the two-year period granted the Ministry of Labour to investigate and yet another two years to ensure the employer pays moneys owing to its workers. The serious impact on families waiting four years for money owed to them does not seem to be taken into consideration by Ms Witmer. How can she call this "facilitating," "housekeeping" or "streamlining"? It's beyond us. We're sure the buzzwords will fall on deaf ears in the families and communities of the most vulnerable non-organized workers of Ontario. The coalition's buzzwords for these amendments would sound more like "abusing," "cheating" and "selling out."

Ms Rockett: Alternative suggestions: proposed changes to make the Employment Standards Act more efficient and effective.

Under administration:

Allow anonymous complaints and third-party complaints.

Full investigation of employers' practices initiated by anonymous complaints and third-party complaints.

Proactive education and investigation procedures in industries competing on low wages and known to have more employers who violate the act, ie, hotels and restaurants, garments and cleaning, as well as education for new corporations.

Heavy penalties for employers who do not pay out orders within short, fixed periods of time and active prosecution of repeat offenders.

Mandatory posting of the act in all workplaces.

Severe penalties for firing a worker for attempting to enforce the act.

With content:

Have all parts of the Employment Standards Act apply to all workers in the provincial jurisdiction. The act now has long lists of people excluded from minimum wage, another list for public holidays, another for hours of work etc. If the law applied to everyone and everyone knew it, there would be a lot fewer violations of the act.

Include a prohibition against unjust dismissal. That way employees couldn't be as easily fired for just trying to stand up for their rights under the law.

Strengthen the act so that employers can't hide from a responsibility in the shell game of contractors and subcontractors.

As the changes mentioned above seem reasonable, and many are inexpensive, why are you not interested in implementing them under these circumstances of reduced spending? The Guelph-Wellington Coalition for Social Justice wonders why this government which abhors any special-interest group now seems to be blinded to the fact that these amendments are clearly a blatant example of pandering to special interests, namely, business.

Ms Margetson: We feel that Bill 49's proposed changes are part of a vicious attack on the most vulnerable workers in Ontario. Given the government's record over the past year of battering the poor, the elderly, the sick and the marginalized, we don't have any confidence in Ms Witmer's desire or ability to amend the act to protect workers in any way.

In the early 1980s the Ministry of Labour did 1,600 inspections per year of employers to ensure that there was compliance under the act. Over the last year there were 20. Clearly, the Minister of Labour and this government cannot be trusted to protect workers' rights.

It was reported that Michael Harris said in May that we must make the system more effective so that we can better use our resources to help workers. The Guelph-Wellington Coalition for Social Justice has serious doubts about that statement and about his knowledge of the proposed amendments in Bill 49. Mr Harris could not possibly have familiarized himself with this bill and still make this statement.

The real objective of these proposed changes is to save money and to finance the $8-billion tax cut. Employers are the winners in this game of cheat. The only improvements we see are the improved chances for employers to avoid minimum standards in Ontario workplaces. We want real improvements, not these improvements for employers in the games of chance and cheat.

In conclusion, we strongly recommend that standards must not be eroded or negotiated. Rights must be easily obtained, and enforcement of these is of paramount public interest and must never be privatized.

The Chair: Thank you both. We've got two minutes remaining, but I'll grant a minute or so to each caucus. This time the questioning will commence with the official opposition.

Mr Lalonde: Thank you very much for your presentation. I think you have put in an awful lot of time to prepare this brief. I'd just like to know what effect you think this new employment standard will have on family quality of life, the fact that employers will be able to extend your working hours and having to work during the evening instead of during the day, on Sunday and everything?

Ms Margetson: I think it will be very difficult for families and in particular families that are already under a lot of stress. I work in a low-income neighbourhood in Guelph, the Willow Road neighbourhood. In that neighbourhood, there is 35% unemployment and those people who are working are often working at low-paid or part-time jobs. The families are under stress. Family violence has increased this past summer by at least 25%. If anything, they need support and understanding from employers around family circumstances, and this will just take any hope of that ever happening away from these families.

Mr Lalonde: Were you satisfied with the actual employment standards that existed?

Ms Margetson: I think the employment standards were reasonable. There was room for improvement, certainly. I think Tracy very nicely read to you some of the ideas that we had around what some of these improvements could mean, but the proposed Bill 49 takes away many of the advantages that were in the Employment Standards Act and will weigh heavily upon the shoulders of vulnerable families and rightly all workers in Ontario, I believe.

Mr Lalonde: So really with the reduction of 45 enforcement officers, I don't think we're going to get any better. Even though we have a new employment standard in front of us, I don't think it will improve the situation at the present time.

Mr Christophererson: Thank you both for your presentation. As you know, my colleagues and I in the NDP agree that the "bad boss" Bill 49 is a real gift for the most unscrupulous employers in our province. I'd like to focus on the issue of people who feel themselves to be very vulnerable to standing up for their rights and having to make a choice between their rights and their job. I don't know if you were present earlier or not, but the minister herself was here and said that if people only knew they have protection under the law, if there were any retaliation they would feel far more comfortable. In fact, one of the representatives from the chamber of commerce here said that in terms of the six months moving to two years, that was to stop employees from, as he said, "sitting on the can and mulling it over," and that's why it's okay to go from two years to claim to six months. Knowing that 90% of all the claims filed with the ministry are made after people leave that employment, why do you think the change from two years to six months is so devastating for this vulnerable population?

Ms Rockett: Well, it's obvious —

Mr Christopherson: Well, I just want to say it's not that obvious to them, so please say it clearly.

Ms Rockett: You've been abused by your employer: They didn't pay you your vacation pay, they're not paying you overtime, whatever, you were forced to work on a holiday. Then trust is gone. You know that you don't have the power to go back.

Actually, I was in a similar circumstance, in that an employer I worked for, I'd given my notice because I was going to go to university, and the president of the firm told me of my outstanding vacation days, that they were going to deduct the days that the entire company had shut down over Christmas, because those were then actually voluntary holidays. So I had four days of pay taken away from me. At the time it was, like, what are my rights, or who do I go to, and why even bother? It's not worth it.

When you look at the couple of examples that we had, some employers, when they recognize an opportunity to take advantage of their worker, then they will. If you've been taken advantage of, you're not going to work there any longer; what's the point? Because it's just going to happen again. If you do go and complain, the employer finds out and you can be fired and then there's really no — fine, you get your termination pay. Thanks, that's great. How do I feed my family? How do I keep a roof over my head? So it puts pressure on employees to decide very quickly, am I going to put up with this? Am I going to put up with being abused?

Especially in the job market now. For people who say unemployment is only 9.7%, whatever, that's a joke. Look at the number of people still on welfare. It's at least double that, if not more. So there are not jobs out there for people to go to, and the jobs that are there do not pay that much. So you have people just scrambling to get by. They're forced to choose between just surviving or going over the brink.

That six-month period just allows employers to keep just taking away, especially if you introduce the minimum standard. Then the employer can say: "Okay, I'll just keep my little tally. Maybe it's $500, maybe it's $1,000. I'm up to $750 on this employee. It's been six months. I can nail him again for another couple hundred." It's totally to the benefit of the employer to abuse his or her worker, and that's disgusting.

The Chair: Excuse me, that's been seven minutes on Mr Christopherson's one minute, so I'll have to give the last question to the government.

Mr Derwyn Shea (High Park-Swansea): Thank you very much for your presentation. I'm not insensitive to some of the points that you've raised, but perhaps I could just pick up on a couple and ask for clarification. You expressed some concern about the reduction from two years to six months. I wonder if you can respond to a question that I have. Since about 90% of all claims are currently now put into effect within the six-month period, would that lead you to think that perhaps there's some merit in at least looking at a reduction of the level if there is some tradeoff in efficiencies?

Ms Margetson: I'm uncertain about what the reasons behind that are. If 90% of the claims are already going in within the six-month period, what that tells me is that 90% of workers in Ontario are able to get the supports that are necessary to act within that six months. But I also tells me that the 10% who aren't are likely the most vulnerable workers in Ontario. Maybe their English isn't particularly good. Maybe they don't have much formal education etc, or maybe they have five or six children that they need quickly — I'm not sure if any of you have actually ever been in a home of someone who just found out he was unemployed and had six children and he's been working in a minimum-wage job in a factory. I have been in that situation myself, and the chaos and the stress and the unbelievable fear that's in that family, it takes time for them to work that out. I've seen people who've been hospitalized in a psychiatric facility when that happens. It's a very difficult situation, especially if someone has other issues that they're dealing with, perhaps a mentally ill wife or two or three children who are learning-disabled. It's just like adding on top and on top. So why not give those 10% of people who need that additional time, the time? Find a way to give it to them.

Mr Shea: In terms of your presentation, you talked about the application of the act. You were very precise to say in your submissions that there should be no exclusions. Can I ask for clarification on that?

Ms Rockett: Sorry, which point?

Mr Shea: You want no excluded groups, no excluded occupations; you want everyone subject to the Employment Standards Act. Do I understand that clearly?

Ms Rockett: Yes, with the rider that obviously there are some groups, especially those that are — what's the terminology? — the emergency-type workers —

Interjection: Essential services.

Ms Rockett: — essential services that have to, obviously, work unusual hours.

Mr Shea: We had a presentation made — I guess it was back in Toronto; frankly, I'll have to check my notes — that particularly has impressed me, the information technology sector, and there are other sectors like it that are growing, which I'm sure you're familiar with, distance work, all that. In fact, today it was interesting to hear the city of Toronto indicate that one in five workers are now employed out of the home and the difficulties they've got in terms of planning and zoning and a whole range of things involved with that. I wonder, are you suggesting as well that all those involved in that sector should equally be made applicable to the ESA?

Ms Rockett: I guess it depends on whether they're self-employed or not. If you're self-employed, you have to manage your own time. If you're based on commission sales, again, you have to manage your own time, and that's part of being a successful worker.

Mr Shea: I see. Then maybe just a final question where I can touch on another part of your submission that I found interesting. You gave that interesting case of the toy company, and I forgot the name of it.

Ms Margetson: Little Tikes.

Mr Shea: Little Tikes. It certainly impressed me, that illustration. What would you have done in response to that, for example?

Ms Margetson: I don't think we were trying to make the point that we should have done something. I don't think anybody was trying to make that point. I think the point that we were trying to make is that it's an example of a situation where even an employer who is extremely well respected in the community, had a wonderful reputation, donated toys to day care centres, was community-minded, was well thought of, was involved in promoting voluntary activities, the run for MS, the big Ivan, the whole thing, a very community-minded company, and yet with no hesitation shut the doors. The loyalty is not to the employee. That is the point we were trying to make.

The Chair: Sorry, Mr Shea, we've gone well over. I've been almost as generous with you as I was with Mr Christopherson.

Mr Shea: I appreciate that, Chairman. I would have liked to pursue that one in great depth, like Mr Christopherson. It was an interesting path to pursue.

The Chair: Thank you both for taking the time to come and make your presentation before us here today. We certainly appreciate it.

Ms Margetson: You're welcome. Thank you for the opportunity.

The Chair: With that, that concludes our hearings here in Kitchener. This committee stands recessed until tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock in London.

The committee adjourned at 1633.

EMPLOYMENT STANDARDS
IMPROVEMENT ACT, 1996LOI DE 1996 SUR L'AMÉLIORATION
DES NORMES D'EMPLOI

Consideration of Bill 49, An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act / Projet de loi 49, Loi visant à améliorer la Loi sur les normes d'emploi.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Good morning. I call the meeting to order and on behalf of the committee members say how pleased we are to be in London today for our fourth day of hearings on Bill 49.

LONDON AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: We have our first group ready to present, the London and District Labour Council. Come forward to the table, please. Good morning. Just as a reminder, we have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between presentation time or question-and-answer period, and I wonder if you might be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the benefit of the Hansard reporter.

Ms Edna Anderson: My name is Edna Anderson. I'm vice-president of the London and District Labour Council.

Ms Carrol Anne Sceviour: Carrol Anne Sceviour, representative of the labour council.

Ms Sandi Ellis: I'm Sandi Ellis, representative of the labour council as well.

Ms Anderson: The London and District Labour Council welcomes the opportunity to present this submission on behalf of the over 2,400 affiliated members of our organization. In addition, we speak on behalf of many unorganized workers in our area who call our office for advice when employers do not follow the law set out in the Employment Standards Act.

We were not surprised when Bill 49, which allegedly made administrative changes, turned out to be another attack on workers, both organized and unorganized.

In addition, we feel that the flexibility it offers simply gives employers more ways to evade compliance with the act, which already has a shameful record of violations and failure to pay assessments owed to workers.

The real statistics from the employment standards working group are as follows:

(1) The time for a claim to be considered by an employment standards officer is nine months.

(2) The percentage of investigated Toronto employers found violating the Employment Standards Act was 94%, based on routine inspections by the ministry, and 71%, based on claims by workers.

(3) Routine inspections and audits in Ontario: The number of companies that had full audits was 21. The percentage of inspected/audited employers found violating the ESA was 81%.

(4) In 1994-95, assessments versus collections in Toronto: The total number of employees in the Ministry of Labour found to be owed money by their employers was 8,298 and the total claims collected was 3,552. The percentage of employees who did not receive money from their employers was 56%. We think that's disgraceful.

Enforcement under a collective agreement: Currently under the ESA, unionized employees have access to the considerable investigative and enforcement powers of the Ministry of Labour. This inexpensive and relatively expeditious method of proceedings has proved useful, particularly in situations of workplace closures and with issues such as severance pay and termination pay.

The Bill 49 changes eliminate recourse by unionized employees to this avenue and instead require that all unionized employees use the grievance procedure under the collective agreement to enforce their legal rights. The union will bear the burden of investigation, enforcement and the accompanying costs. The director can make an exception and allow a complaint under the act where he thinks it's appropriate, but for all practical purposes the enforcement of public legislation would be privatized.

Arbitrators will now have jurisdiction to make rulings that were formerly in the purview of an employment standards officer, a referee or an adjudicator. They will not be limited by the maximum or minimum amounts of the act. However, arbitrators lack the investigative capacity of the ESOs and may not be able to match the consistency of result that the act has had under public enforcement. Most important, employers could argue that as boards of arbitration do not have the critical powers to investigate whether particular activities or schemes were intended to defeat the intent and purposes of the act and its regulations, such cannot be determined. In such circumstances, unionized employees could well be left with no recourse whatsoever. This is particularly evident in cases of related employer or successorship provisions of the act. It's difficult to see how such provisions can be applied when the successor or related employer may well not be a party to the arbitration procedure.

Enforcement for non-unionized employees in sections 19 and 21 of the bill and sections 64.3, 64.4 and subsection 65(1) of the act. With these amendments the Ministry of Labour is proposing to end any enforcement in situations where they consider that violations may be resolved by other means: namely, in the courts. In other words, the amendments would download responsibility for enforcement of minimum standards for non-unionized workers. Employees would be forced to choose between making a complaint to the employment standards branch or filing a civil suit in the courts. Responsibility for enforcement is also downloaded on to non-unionized employees by limiting the amount recoverable through the employment standards to under $10,000.

I found this one difficult to understand, that you could limit the amount of liability, although the debt might be a lot higher. In fact, currently there is no limit on what's recoverable. What an employer owes an employee is generally what he has to pay. That seems like a good way. It's how I have to pay my debts.

An employee who files a claim at the Ministry of Labour for severance and termination pay is precluded from bringing a civil action concerning wrongful dismissal and claiming pay in lieu of notice which exceeds the statutory minimums. The effect of these amendments is that those employees who have chosen the more expeditious and cost-effective path of claiming through the ministry will have to forgo any attempt to obtain additional compensation through the courts. Legal proceedings are notoriously lengthy and prohibitively expensive for many, even though they may be entitled in common law to more than the statutory minimum under the ESA.

Just as in the provisions barring civil remedies in section 64.3, there are mirror provisions in 64.4 precluding an employee who starts a civil action for wrongful dismissal from claiming severance or termination payments under the act. Other provisions are also prohibited under the act once a civil action is started, such as an employer not paying wages owed, failure to comply with successor rights in the contract service sector etc. Employees who initiate a claim but decide they no longer wish to pursue their civil suit don't appear to have even the two weeks' time limit to change their mind. Rather, they appear to have no right at all to reinstitute a complaint under the act.

Maximum claims under section 21 of the bill and subsection 65(1) of the act. The amendments introduce, as noted above, a new statutory maximum amount that an employee may recover by filing a complaint under the act. This maximum of $10,000 would appear to apply to amounts owing in back wages and other money such as vacation, severance and termination pay. There are only a few exceptions, such as for orders awarding wages in respect of violations of the pregnancy and parental leave provisions and unlawful reprisals under the act.

The problem with implementing such a cap is that workers are often owed more than $10,000, even in the most poorly paid sectors of the workforce such as foodservices, garment workers, domestics and others. Indeed, workers who have been deprived of wages for a lengthy period of time are the very employees who will not have the means to hire a lawyer and wait the several years that it will take before their case is settled. In effect, therefore, this provision will encourage the worst employers to violate the most basic standards while at the same time compounding the problems for those workers with meagre resources.

I assisted a friend who is developmentally handicapped to recover wages from an unscrupulous restaurant owner who had hired him to work 35 hours a week for $25 and he could have his lunch there: soup and a sandwich. I haven't included in the brief some of the disgusting tactics that employer used to discourage this fellow from pursuing his rights. In fact, before he knew that I had an official capacity he was really rude to me as well. My friend's claim amounted to less than $300 and took almost a year to resolve.

I can tell you that he would not have been able to pursue that claim without a lot of help and assistance, and even in spite of that he was really terrified the day of the hearing because he was going to have to go and face that man he had worked for. He was nervous about having an adjudicator there and so on.

People who have handicaps of various types are even more disadvantaged by this change in the bill. This chap had a friendly ESA officer plus myself as his case worker helping him; he would never have pursued it otherwise. He didn't realize that employers can't enter into a deal with you that's contrary to the law.

In my opinion, the government should be aggressively pursuing employers who exploit and humiliate workers rather than withdrawing the few sympathetic supports that currently exist.

Regarding the use of private collectors, section 28 of the bill, new section 73 of the act, a fundamental problem with regard to the act has for some time now been the failure to enforce standards. This is no less true with regard to collections. The most frequent reason for the ministry's failure to collect wages assessed against employers has been the employers' refusal to pay. The answer to this problem, according to the proposed amendments, is not to start enforcing the act but rather to absolve the government of responsibility to enforce the act by farming the problem out to a private collection agency.

In addition, the employment standards director can authorize the private collector to charge a fee to the persons who are owed the money. Should the amount of money collected be less than the amount owing to the employee or employees, the regulations will enable the apportioning of the amount among the collector, the employee or employees and the government. Where the settlement is under 75% of the amount owing, the collector is required to obtain the approval of the director, but this still allows the collector incredible leeway, if not outright abuse, with someone else's money.

The danger here is that even persons, like my friend, whose earnings put them below the poverty line and who are owed money under the act could well be required to pay fees to the collector. A minimum-wage worker at $6.85 an hour, for example, could not only receive less money than is owed but also have to pay for it to be collected. Surely this raises ethical questions for the drafters of this bill.

We would suggest that while such an approach may be appropriate in commercial transactions, it's neither morally justified nor appropriate under these circumstances. We want the system of public enforcement to be maintained and improved, not eroded.

The London and District Labour Council is gravely concerned that employees, particularly the most vulnerable, will be pressured to agree to settlements of less than the full amount owing as collectors argue, if only for reasons of expediency, that less is better than nothing. Having at the same time to pay a collector amounts to nothing less than legalized theft.

The limitation periods: Under section 32 of the bill, section 82 of the act, workers who fail to file within this new time limit will have to take their employer to court to seek redress. The burden of cost will also have to be borne by an employee in such circumstances as that the Ontario legal aid plan has been scaled back and no longer covers most employment-related cases. In contrast, the ministry still has two years from the date the complaint is filed to conduct their investigation and a further two years to get the employer to pay moneys owing. In other words, an employee having made a complaint under the act could wait up to four years before receiving their money, and then only the part of it that the collector collects minus the user fee. That the government can rationalize such amendments as facilitating or streamlining procedures is almost beyond comprehension.

In conclusion, I would say there are several positive amendments that the labour council can support. However, in general, these changes impact the most vulnerable people in the workplace: the unorganized. It undermines their already precarious position.

The other thing is that the attempt was made to introduce these changes as if they were really insignificant, just housekeeping changes. We believe they should be included in the overall review so they can be openly debated and discussed. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): We don't have too much time here, but you speak about non-organized persons and the effect this bill will have on them. You've cited an example of the disabled person who was clearly being duped by his employer. Do you think this act will have more significance on the unorganized worker or the organized worker? I'll let you answer that one.

Ms Anderson: I believe it's going to impact both, but certainly unorganized workers are often less aware of their rights than organized workers. They also don't have the support of the elected representatives of their union. I can tell you that when that investigation was done in that particular restaurant, we knew of another woman who was also being exploited in a similar fashion. There was no complaint and the ministry did not investigate the fact that there was another handicapped person working there under similar circumstances.

Mr Hoy: Do you have any recommendation on how to improve the awareness? I know, not necessarily through my riding office but from people I meet in the riding, that there seems to be a lack of awareness, particularly of their rights to severance pay. Do you know how to recommend that we improve that?

Ms Anderson: It certainly appears that when the government wants to educate the public, it does a very good job of it. I think that they can do an equally good job of educating workers, both in unorganized and organized workplaces. Public education is something the government could undertake to make sure that people do know what their rights are. They did it with the Landlord and Tenant Act and they do it with other things they want to promote. I don't see why they couldn't do it with this act as well.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): Thank you for your presentation; I appreciate it. I can tell you that the presentation you've made on behalf of workers in the London area is very similar to what we've heard in Toronto and Hamilton and Kitchener and what I expect we'll continue to hear as we move across the province.

I'd like to take the short time we have to begin exploring an area we haven't yet talked about in any of the locations in any great detail, and it's the paragraph at the bottom of page 5, where you talk about a concern you have about privatizing the collection of money owed from employers. Your concern is that the most vulnerable might "be pressured into agreeing to settlements" — to use your wording — "of less than the full amount." There's protection in here that says that no settlements are binding if they're entered into as a result of fraud or coercion. But as Professor Fudge pointed out, that at least shows the government contemplates the fact that this kind of pressure can be brought to bear. Can you just expand a little on what your concern is in terms of the kind of pressure employees might face, particularly the most vulnerable kinds of workers?

Ms Anderson: It boils down to the same reason that people take their cheques to the cheque-cashing Money Mart and pay the 4% or 5% or whatever it is the Money Mart charges to get them cashed — because they can't get them cashed in a bank without having an account that has more than the cheque is worth in it. There's a real sense that people who are in dire circumstances want the money now. They can't afford to wait, even if it might mean that they would get a better settlement. All the collection agency has to do is say: "We can get it for you Tuesday, but you're only going to get $150. If you wait, you might get $500." It's very clear that there doesn't have to be a lot of coercion to persuade a person with no money that they can get some immediately. I've seen it with the Money Mart cheque-cashing thing; also with people who take their income tax and sell it, discount it with people who will do your income tax and take a percentage as well. We see it all the time with people on low incomes.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Thank you very much for your presentation. I'd like to explore a little different path. You mentioned employers who aren't willing to pay. Do you feel that it would be advantageous if the government would look at shutting down businesses in these cases and thereby putting all the workers out?

Ms Ellis: I don't think it's an issue of shutting down the business and putting all the workers out of work. In many cases, these people who are applying have already left. In fact, Professor Fudge's paper explains that over 90% of them have already left their employment or their employer has gone bankrupt. Those are the people who are seeking redress under the act. Those people already don't have a job, so you're not putting any employee out of work here. But that person who was the employer should not be allowed to go into another business until they have paid their dues to the business they previously owned. We see that happen all the time — it's opened down the street under another Ontario numbered company and he just keeps doing it and doing it.

Mr Ouellette: So this is just referring to businesses that have gone out of business. What about businesses that are currently operating where we have problems collecting from the employer to pay the employee? Should we shut down that business?

Ms Ellis: Employers who have businesses have assets, and just as we in the Hydro commissions can put a lien against a business to the city for payments, there should be some avenue of recourse for the government to put a lien against the assets of that company to pay the employees what's due to them.

Mr Ouellette: But still keep the businesses open so that we can have employees in there?

Ms Ellis: I would certainly think so. Our job is to keep employees working, it's not to put them out of work, but it is also to keep them working as long as they're getting wages.

Mr Ouellette: Obviously we're having difficulty in that we're only collecting, on average, 25 cents on the dollar. We're making an attempt to recoup up to 75% at least, and then the employee has the ability to say whether they want to bargain on the last 25% with a collector.

Ms Ellis: You have to understand logically that what Edna was talking about is exactly what's going to happen. The director is going to offer certificates to people left, right and centre because the collection agencies, in many cases, and I would think the majority of cases, will not be able to collect over 75%.

Mr Ouellette: We're trying to find a way that we can get employers to pay when it's required. Currently, the system is not working. What we're proposing is another opportunity and I was just asking if you felt that shutting down businesses would resolve the situation.

Ms Ellis: No.

The Chair: Thank you all for taking the time to come and make a presentation before us here today.

LONDON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: Our next group up is the London Chamber of Commerce, Mr Gordon VanderLeek and Mr James Thomas. Good morning, gentlemen.

Mr Gordon VanderLeek: It's a pleasure to be here and bring the position on behalf of the London Chamber of Commerce. I trust that our brief position paper is being or has been circulated to you, so we don't propose to read it — you may do that at your leisure — but just highlight a few aspects of it and be available for questions at the conclusion. I'm certainly also pleased that Jim Thomas can be here to assist in the presentation. He will speak to some of the specific provisions of Bill 49.

By way of background, the London Chamber of Commerce, as part of the chamber movement in general, is the largest and most broadly based business organization in London. If you look through our membership, we have individuals who are working out of their home who are members of the chamber as well as some of the city's largest business and service sector organizations. So we feel we come forward today speaking on behalf of a wide variety of businesses.

The chamber members employ nearly 50,000 people in the London and surrounding area, so clearly we take note of any legislative changes to employment standards or to workplace legislation. As indicated in the brief, we have appeared in the past to speak on issues of workplace health and safety, labour relations and also on employment standards. We appreciate the opportunity to be here today.

Looking at the context of the legislation, we support the government's efforts to reform the legislation. If you look to the nature of the working relationship and the employer-employee relationship over the past number of years, there's been significant change. I think that's a given. There's been much that has changed in our society, and the workplace has been no exception. The chamber of commerce supports the effort to bring reform and necessary updating to the legislation. We support the comprehensive review process and the two-stage process, understanding, of course, that we look forward to the second phase of the reform process.

In many instances, and we'll highlight a number of those today, we feel that the legislation as it currently stands, having gone through some piecemeal amendments over the years, is becoming increasingly complex for the business owner and, as we've reported in our report, non-user-friendly.

With that, by way of background, I can perhaps ask Mr Thomas to highlight for the members here the specific aspects of the legislation that we'd like to make commentary on today.

Mr James Thomas: Thanks for the opportunity to appear before the standing committee. Again, we have recently conducted a survey of our membership in the London Chamber of Commerce to see what their concerns are with regard to issues surrounding government programs. The number one thing that comes out in the survey of employers in our area when we talk to them is the amount of red tape and duplication of government effort they encounter as an employer on a regular basis.

So these amendments, which we see as streamlining the process, are indeed welcome by our membership and they make a lot of sense to us. In particular, things like limiting the recovery of money to a six-month period instead of it hanging for a two-year period, as currently exists, over an employer's head makes a lot of sense.

The elimination of duplication of claims I think in particular is an area that's extremely important to employers, particularly small employers who may have made an error, find it incredibly complex to have to go through at least two or three different forums for hearing a complaint. In fact, we see on a regular basis people who may file claims in unionized environments in three different forums. They may file a grievance, they may go to the Employment Standards Act and they may file a small claims action as well just to see where they get the best deal, if you will. So we think reducing the duplication of claims is a very welcome part of the changes to the act.

Extending the appeal process, a second item that we think makes a lot of sense, allows for a longer period for the employer to consider, and the employee if they want to, appealing an employment standards ruling and to perhaps negotiate a settlement or perhaps take the full merits of the case into consideration before deciding to appeal or not to appeal.

Those are the three main areas that I believe are important to our members. While we recognize that there are other parts to the act that have been changed and streamlined, we thought it would be important that we comment on those three areas: the reduction in the duplication of claims, limiting the recovery period and extending the appeal period. So we welcome the government's proposals under Bill 49 in these areas. Gordon, you may want to add a comment.

Mr VanderLeek: Just in conclusion — we're available for any specific questions that you may have — we look certainly with interest to the second phase of the reform process and the issues that we anticipate may arise there and we encourage the government to proceed without any undue delay in pursuing the overall reform of the legislation. This is certainly a step in the right direction, as indicated, to avoid duplication, to hopefully reduce the cost that is currently in place for the government to process that, and to place expertise in the appropriate area and to define the rules.

In looking at the changes that are proposed, we trust that they will define the rules under which the employer-employee relationship exists in Ontario, and that if both sides know the rules they're playing with, that bring some certainty to the environment and would also improve the environment for doing business in Ontario generally. Perhaps we can stop at that point and accept any questions.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen. That leaves us 12 minutes, four minutes per caucus. We'll start this round with Mr Christopherson, the third party.

Mr Christopherson: Gentlemen, thank you for your presentation. The minister has stated from the outset that Bill 49 is simply minor housekeeping. Do you agree with the minister?

Mr Thomas: If I could comment on that, I think they're not major changes that we're seeing in terms of the things that need to be reconsidered in the employment relationship. If you take a look at the increasing prevalence of home work and the impact on the Employment Standards Act, there are a whole range of things that need to be looked at. There are contradictory areas of the act that need to be reviewed. The issues surrounding overtime need to be given a close look. So I think a more comprehensive review of the Employment Standards Act in general is warranted.

Mr Christopherson: I think that's a yes.

Mr Thomas: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: I note that you make the statement, as have the other chambers of commerce that have made presentations, that you believe the changes do not impact on the act's protection of minimum employment standards, and I'd like to just pursue that a little bit. I would suggest to you that there have been minimum protections that are being taken away under Bill 49, such as the cap of $10,000 where none existed before. Regardless of the rationale for $10,000, the fact is there wasn't a cap before and now there is one; also the fact that there's now going to be a minimum and one will have to cross a minimum threshold before the ministry will follow up on a claim. Both of those are restrictions on rights once held by the employees.

A suggestion that both of those can be remedied by going to the courts now involves employees paying money to hire their own lawyers and perhaps take time off work, which they currently don't have to do under the existing legislation. I have some difficulty understanding how the recognized common sense of the fact that those are rights that are now being taken away reconciles with what you're stating: that there's no impact on the minimum rights that employees now enjoy. I see quite a discrepancy there. Could you explain that, please?

Mr Thomas: I think what we're seeing is a streamlining of the employment standards process, which is valuable to both the rights of an individual to make decisions and understand what decisions they are making in terms of the route of getting redress. I don't see that as a major problem.

Mr Christopherson: But if you had a right to have a problem that you have resolved by a government function, and that function is no longer there and you have to pay out of your own pocket to resolve the same problem, have you not lost a right? Have you not lost something? Because these employees are certainly losing rights that they now have under the existing law with Bill 49.

Mr Thomas: It's a change in the way the rights are applied, yes.

Mr Christopherson: It's a loss. It's costing them more money to get the protection they once had covered by the ministry. Let's keep in mind this is money that employees are owed. This is not some treasure hunt they're after; this is money they've worked for, that they're owed. Now they're going to have to pay money to get that money back with this law, when before they didn't have to. I have trouble understanding how you can suggest that the employees haven't lost something.

Mr Thomas: We view it as a positive change in streamlining the process; that employees have different ways of going at things now. I don't see it as the loss that you're claiming.

Mr Christopherson: With great respect, really, and I mean this very sincerely, I would suggest if the shoe were on the other foot and there were a cost being incurred by business to protect their legitimate rights that they didn't have to incur before, you'd be screaming from one end of this province to the other.

0940

Mr Thomas: I don't have a comment about your comment.

Mr Christopherson: I don't see any further point.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Simcoe Centre): I have a couple of questions I want to ask you. The first question is, would you be in favour of electronic filing of orders to pay, including the monetary payment?

Mr VanderLeek: Perhaps I can speak to that. I think in general it's laudable when government legislation keeps pace with the manner in which individuals communicate, and it's clear that in the 1990s the electronic form of communication is one that is becoming more acceptable. Subject to appropriate safeguards for that type of technology, I think it's laudable that the government look to those avenues to streamline the system so that we don't have an archaic system but we have a government system which is efficient and most cost-effective from the perspective of the taxpayer. Certainly if the electronic forum accomplishes that, then we're in favour of that in terms of reducing the cost of government, which ultimately is for the benefit of the members of our society.

Mr Tascona: There's one other area that I want to explore. One of the big problems we have, once the act is enforced, is the collection. Presently, the collection record is about 25 cents on the dollar. There have been some comments in terms of how the collection procedures are done. One suggestion in this legislation is to do it through private collection, but there are other mechanisms that might be considered. One area where they do collections is under WCB with respect to assessments. They use such mechanisms as liens, and they take money out of bank accounts. I'd just like to get your view on whether that would be a method that could be considered and what the business community would think of that in situations where we're dealing with employers that just are not going to pay and they just are refusing.

Mr Thomas: If we currently are experiencing a 25-cents-on-the-dollar recovery rate for claims, anything that we can do to make that more effective makes some sense. I don't have a problem in seeing how that would work, but I would like to take a closer look at it before agreeing to it.

Mr Tascona: WCB has an approach that it uses — you'd be familiar with that — in terms of collecting its assessments. That's one method that is used with employers, and it's been accepted practice for many years.

Mr VanderLeek: In terms of additional commentary on that, the chamber has always supported legislation which provides clear rules and clear understandings as to what the rights and obligations of the employer are. If there are moneys that are legitimately disputed but after adjudication are determined to be owing to an employee, then they ought to be paid and the rules ought to be followed. The chamber has always stood for that. Whatever system is in place in the specifics of enforcement brings integrity to the system and bodes well, on a general basis, for saying that in Ontario we play by defined rules and we expect people to live up to those rules on both sides, both employees and employers. So if we have an efficient collection system, presumably that would ensure that there's confidence in the system and confidence in government, and it creates a positive business environment.

The Chair: Moving to the official opposition, Mr Hoy.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. You mentioned that you see the necessity of discussing this bill in total and you're waiting for the second phase discussion paper. Do you think it would have been better to discuss this bill and ramifications as it applies to employers and employees all at once, rather than breaking it out in two separate pieces like this, for clarity for both the employer and the employee? There'll be another second round; we don't see the whole package in front of us as to what the government is intending to do.

Mr Thomas: My understanding of the second phase is that they will address some of the substantive issues in the act, that we need to take a look at those as one thing so the administrative issues we're dealing with at this point don't slip by the boards. It's important to get the administration right as well. I see these as more administrative than the real guts of the Employment Standards Act.

Mr VanderLeek: The other thing I would add to that is that we suspect there will be more attention brought to the second phase of the reform process. Perhaps the consultative process would be longer, more parties would be interested in participating in it and it would take a greater amount of time. Having said that, if the government can achieve certain cost savings immediately through administrative change, we applaud that and say that's money we could save now while we continue on the overall reform process. In that sense, the chamber is here today to say that we support the move to make immediate savings in streamlining the process and sending a clear signal to employees and employers that they're serious about reform and are beginning to take action. I think that process is suitable, and we'll deal with the substantive portions in the second phase as a package, to address the issues there.

Mr Hoy: Your comment that there may be more interest in the second phase is probably true, but I want to say that there is no lack of interest in this first phase. Our agenda per day, no matter what city we are in, is quite heavy. The interest is quite pronounced.

You did mention some specifics of what the chamber likes about the bill, in particular the elimination of duplication, the recovery limit at six months and the extended appeal periods. What's your feeling about the $10,000 limit that is proposed, notwithstanding the fact that 96% of the claims are under $10,000? It brings to my mind that the $10,000 limit seems to be misplaced in regard to the fact that 96% of claims are under $10,000 in the first place. It seems to put a restriction, in my mind, on that 4% of persons who might have claims that exceed that amount. Do you have any opinion on the $10,000?

Mr VanderLeek: With regard to the limit itself, we start from the premise, the fact that has been produced by the government, as you've indicated, that we're dealing with claims in excess of $10,000 as being 4% of the caseload. Our general observation would be that those individuals who have that much at stake would be prepared to deal with their claims through the processes that are available, and to that extent we support the government's efforts to direct what we can call its limited resources, because it cannot do everything, to those who are most vulnerable and who need the services the most. It provides some certainty to know that if you're above that amount you can proceed in a certain area.

We'll hopefully streamline the process such that more cases can be processed and more people can be assisted by the staff of the Ministry of Labour as they do the day-to-day work under the legislation. From an administrative perspective, I see the cap as simply providing a definition of where they want to focus their activities, much the way that a business would focus its activities pursuant to a business plan, saying, "We want to help people in these areas the most and focus our efforts." Presumably those who have claims for more than that have the opportunity to seek redress. I certainly don't agree with the position that rights are being taken away. The forum for exercising those rights perhaps is being amended and streamlined and clarified.

The Chair: Thank you both for taking the time to come before us here today. We appreciate it.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF GRAIN MILLERS, LOCAL 154

The Chair: That leads us to our next presentation, which will be from the American Federation of Grain Millers, Local 154. Good morning.

Mr Pat Blaney: I'd like to thank the committee for having the opportunity to speak this morning. I'd like to do something maybe a little more novel than I've heard so far, and that is to tell a story that has a happy ending, fortunately. It is really the story of our experience, and I'd like to draw some conclusions at the end to illustrate.

My name is Pat Blaney, I'm the president of the American Federation of Grain Millers. We represent 569 hourly employees of the Kellogg Co here in London. The Kellogg Co has been established in our community since the early 1920s. It has gained a reputation as a solid employer, providing excellent wages and benefits, with minimal layoffs and a relatively constructive labour relations environment. In short, it's a fine place to work.

As well, our facility has the distinction as the low-cost producer of ready-to-eat breakfast cereal inside the Kellogg organization. In the last number of years we have established consecutive record profit levels year to year. We are proud of our plant and the wide variety of domestic and export products we produce.

Our history, however, has not always been that promising or as constructive. We believe that in the absence of the specific safeguards established under the Employment Standards Act our business success and working environment would be radically different from what we see today.

Historically, the cereal business has been seasonal in nature. Layoffs for junior employees were significant and longer-term due to the nature of the business. The language in successive collective agreements has evolved around these two premises; that is, the seasonal nature of the cereal business as well as the day-to-day fluctuations of the work.

More than 25 years ago, Kellogg applied for and obtained a permit under subsection 20(1) of the Employment Standards Act. The permit, known as the basic permit, gives the company permission to exceed the hours-of-work limits in the act — eight hours in a day and 48 hours in a week. Of course, the permit only gives the company permission to ask the employees to work in excess of those hours. The permission can be given in law by either the employee or the employees' agent, in this case the union.

The various collective agreements made reference that under given circumstances employees could be forced — more commonly known as compulsory overtime — to work overtime to support operational requirements, and it was generally not abused then.

Throughout the 1970s it was apparent that the nature of the business was changing, becoming less seasonal and requiring an increased need for staffing through the weekends. There was growing concern in the summer months, specifically by junior employees being forced unduly. I think it would be safe to say that most people begrudgingly accepted the reality of the business and that this was going to take place.

However, on February 9, 1982, the company announced plans to construct and develop a massive state-of-the-art cereal facility that would be known as Project 2000, or P2000 as we refer to it here in London. The project was presented as a leap from the traditional cog-and-pulley technology that was in place at the time to a futuristic automated production system that would bring, among other things, a stable scheduling practice that would marginalize the need for forcing, job ownership and job security through better business.

By 1985 it became painfully apparent that our P2000 plant expansion had some significant oversights in developing our technology. There was a real concern by both parties that if we did not get Project 2000 up and flying — it was referred to as the white elephant or the albatross by some senior officials — if we did not get it to full production we would be in jeopardy of having the plug pulled on the whole project, and there was some real concern about the long-term viability of the facility at all.

In 1987 the company applied for and obtained an additional permit under subsection 20(2) of the Employment Standards Act. This additional permit permitted the company to exceed the scope of the subsection 20(1) permit. By this point in time, the forcing of employees to work overtime to support the operation had completely gotten out of hand. It had become a common occurrence for the company to default to compulsory overtime, which it believed it had the right to institute, to support the business objectives of the day.

However, before the company utilized the subsection 20(2) permit, it consulted with the union and obtained the union's support. The support was obtained in large measure because the company agreed to ask individual union members whether they were prepared to agree to work overtime. Those who agreed, by signing the form, could then work additional overtime for which the company could ask pursuant to its subsection 20(2) permit.

However, it quickly became apparent that the issuing of the subsection 20(2) permit was not a solution and did little to alleviate the instances of forcing employees to work overtime in general. If anything, the additional permit only allowed the company to short-staff and maintain increasing plant production goals that were captured through scheduling excessive overtime requirements.

The resulting undue stress took its toll on marriages, families, personal relationships and in an increased incidence of substance abuse. A case in point — and there are many of them from this point in time — is that on the weekend of June 11, 1988, we had a member who was scheduled to work, against his protest, the Saturday of his wedding. No one really ever expected this fellow to show up, but through the attendance control process we have he was going to be considered AWOL all the same.

Our absenteeism rate was out of control. Employees who were forced to work extra shifts on weekends often would take time off during the week, which in turn would jeopardize the production and create a vacancy which was, more often than not, filled by forcing again. It was a catch-22.

In 1988, our plant morale was at an all-time low. Members were frustrated and exhausted and had had enough. We experienced our first strike in our 50-year history as a labour union. Subsequent to that, union-management labour relationships became rigid and reactionary with little trust or good faith between the parties. The company held tightly to the notion that it had to have the flexibility and security that compulsory overtime provided to meet the business opportunities of the future. As well, it was professed by the company that the new technology now in place, with the associated support training, would eventually reduce the need for excessive overtime.

The reality was quite the reverse. There was continual pressure to drive the business to offset the considerable capital investment in the project. The complexity of the new technology and operation in our facility required far more intensive support training than originally envisioned. Quite simply, it's never-ending and it's perpetual today.

Throughout all the union-management scheduling initiatives and all the joint task force debriefings, forcing of excess hours continued unabated. Every occurrence was explained away as the result of one unforeseen business pressure or another that necessitated the forcing to take place.

In the fall of 1989, the union began what turned out to be an arduous process through Mr Mulligan of the employment standards branch of the Ministry of Labour. It was our intent to wrestle from the company both the subsections 20(1) and 20(2) excess-hours permits. We intended through this process to compel the company to sit down and work jointly with the union towards alternatives to the working conditions as they related to forced overtime.

Initially, we were successful in establishing limited restrictions on forced overtime through joint discussions. The parties initiated and developed a "weekend worker" concept that enabled a limited number of employees to work Saturday and Sunday only. This, in itself, would ultimately fulfil the staffing requirements and flexibility needs for a seven-day-a-week operation. As well, we jointly developed the concept of "banked overtime," which allowed employees who volunteered to work overtime to take banked paid time off work at a more convenient time later on.

On December 20, 1990, the parties sat before arbitrator Maureen Saltman to bring to conclusion the precise scope of the contractual language that pertained to the company's ability to force employees to work excess hours. I've enclosed a document there. The decision of the arbitrator, as it pertained to the Employment Standards Act, ultimately compelled the parties to jointly work towards the total elimination of forced overtime by the 1991 negotiations.

Today, we are the envy of our US counterparts, which by the way still work under forced overtime; I should say "struggle" under forced overtime. Our facility has been recognized for numerous achievements from production volumes to exceptional safety standards. We operate seven days per week without forced overtime. Plant absenteeism and lost time are at an all-time low and below the national average. The weekend worker crew has afforded the company the needed flexibility in scheduling production requirements. We continue to work jointly on numerous plant initiatives that are showing tangible results. What would have been considered unthinkable in 1989 has become the norm today. We are very proud of what we have achieved.

We have by no means a perfect working environment, but it's a far cry from what it could have been if we had not had the assistance and safeguards established under the Employment Standards Act. We have managed to set right, for the success of everyone, the deteriorating situation we were unsuccessful in correcting through successive contract negotiations.

In conclusion, subsection 64.5(1) of the act, Bill 49, will effectively dismantle the enforcement authority of the Ministry of Labour that, in our example, helped to turn around a deteriorating situation we alone were unable to. Far too much of the burden and associated cost of policing and enforcement will be saddled on the backs of labour. We're a small union, as unions go. We can't afford this.

There also seems to be some mystique that puts too much reliance on the negotiations process and far too little consideration on the inherent inequalities of the bargaining powers of the parties. I cannot stress enough the importance of standards and the importance of the ministry and its authority to uphold and maintain those standards. In our example, regardless of the process we had to undertake to ensure our rights in the Employment Standards Act, we were assured as citizens of this province, as well as union members, of the same protection through the Employment Standards Act. The act as proposed in 64.5(2) creates two different systems of protection: those that are associated with unions, and everybody else. It's wrong; it's fundamentally wrong.

At its heart, this bill will not promote or foster good labour relations practices. The whole tone of subsections 64.5(1) through (5) has mean-spirited implications to it. As with the grievance procedure that this act will promote, it will by default increase a confrontational environment in the workplace. Leaders in industry, as does Kellogg, recognize the significant role and contribution healthy labour relations play in our ability to compete on a world market — and we do compete on a world market.

I'm deeply concerned by the long-term impact this legislation will have in impeding the conciliatory environment we have jointly cultivated, along with our business success at Kellogg. You cannot have one without the other.

Finally, one last point that I picked up this morning when I was looking over the bill. I'm puzzled by two phrases — one phrase, actually, that's in two different spots — in 64.5(2) and (4), that to the best of my knowledge don't appear anywhere else in the Employment Standards Act. It's a new quote: "including an employee who is not a member of the trade union." They're speaking about the obligation to represent. I couldn't for the life of me imagine how that would ever apply in environments like ours unless we were representing some of the salaried staff. I'm bothered by where we're going with this.

The Chair: That leaves us two minutes for questioning per caucus. We'll start with the government members.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): Just as a point of interest, could you please give us some idea of the number of employees in the London division?

Mr Blaney: As I stated, there are 569 hourly employees.

Mrs Fisher: Of those, given your experience of coming through to a happy end because of negotiation, during the course of that time, could you speculate, even, how many employees would have left this place of employment because of the condition that you were talking about?

Mr Blaney: With this expansion, we certainly went through a number of people who retired. If anything, other than through attrition, people weren't leaving.

Mrs Fisher: The reason I'm asking that question is, one of the things you don't mention that has been sort of a highlight, if you will, of the hearings to date is this issue of, once a person leaves, perhaps leaving in fear of other reprisals in the event they come forward with their concerns, we often find that perhaps the person is owed money. Collection is an issue that has been high on the agenda from other participating parties to date. Of those who left voluntarily, would you remember if you were part of the process in making sure those people were paid for any lost wages or outstanding vacation pay or those types of things?

Mr Blaney: As I started to say, Kellogg has been in London a long time. It's a reputable company. I couldn't ever imagine having that situation even arise.

The Chair: That's the time for the government side.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. I can understand the fluctuation of the work that might occur at Kellogg, having been a farmer. During the period that you were having this extended overtime for many of your workers, was there any new hiring taking place?

Mr Blaney: There was hiring. Because of the expansion, what was initially considered or envisioned as — the phrase was a "turnkey operation" that would require far fewer people than were working there at the time. It was very manually intensive originally. It was considered that the population would probably drop — I'm trying to recall — probably 25%, but as it turned out, with technology you also need expertise and we were hiring highly skilled people at that time.

Mr Hoy: So there was some hiring, but yet you still had overtime problems.

Mr Blaney: We had a certain number of people who were retiring simply because the window of opportunity was right for them, maybe because of their age, they didn't want to take on the challenge of the new project. It was very sophisticated.

Mr Hoy: The company in question, is it involved in ISO 9000 or any other like program?

Mr Blaney: No, to the best of my knowledge they're not.

Mr Hoy: They're not.

Mr Blaney: They're aware of it; we've discussed it, but no, they're not.

Mr Hoy: Notwithstanding the fact that they're not involved in that, the quality at the plant was maintained, and the quality of the product, probably to their benefit if the answer was yes, even though workers were asked to maybe endure some hardships?

Mr Blaney: I guess you could appreciate, in the food industry, quality is an ongoing issue and it was certainly an issue by the union and the company through this time. A lot of things fall by the wayside. Quality is one of them that has always been monitored and, as I said, is perpetual. There were concerns.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Blaney, for a very helpful presentation.

On page 4 you talk about the fact that — this is the second-last paragraph on the page — "The company was holding tight to the notion that it had to have the flexibility and security that compulsory overtime provided." We know that although it's been withdrawn at this time, it's still alive and well to be resurrected later, the notion of being able to contract out of minimum rights.

Then, I jotted down when you said that you're a smaller union and you can't afford this, meaning if you got into that kind of struggle without that protection underneath — I'd just like to explore that a bit in terms of what you think would happen to either you and your members or a similar situation anywhere in Ontario where that right was now legally available to companies, and what would happen in a case where they start putting on the table serious concessions, not just to the better benefits that you have, but those fundamental rights that are now in the Employment Standards Act, and decided to take you all the way, including a strike, including using scabs, and were going to go for broke. What kind of situation would that put you or maybe a similar union in, if that became the law of the land?

Mr Blaney: Of course, initially, our fears would be that they would financially break us and that is our concern now. Ultimately, I am sure and I can see if legislation like this is pushed forward, you're going to see the positions polarized even more than they tend to be, you're going to see amalgamations of smaller organizations with larger ones and then you are going to have a very polarized work setting. As I said, with the mean-spiritedness that I read that underlies a lot of this act, you're going to have something that is not in the best interests of business and it's not in the best interests of labour.

Mr Christopherson: Is there going to be a lot of confrontation, do you think; lead to confrontation, possibly violence, create real serious problems?

Mr Blaney: It certainly is and we were very close to that in the heyday of this, mainly before we used the act to try and get some semblance of order of what was going on. The company truly believed at the time that it could not survive and there was lots of discussion going on about how irresponsible it was that the union would be trying to destroy this company. The contrary was true. We were trying to work with the company to make sure we could be successful. We recognize what's happening in the world, what's happening in the food industry with free trade and NAFTA, how we sit in North America as an organization, internally as well as externally, and we've thrived based on that.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Blaney, for coming before us here today. We appreciate it.

LONDON AND DISTRICT CONSTRUCTION ASSOCIATION

The Chair: That takes us to our next group, the London and District Construction Association. Good morning. We have 20 minutes, as you probably heard me say to the last presenter, for you to divide as you see fit between presentation time or question-and-answer period.

Mr Jerry Fassaert: My name is Jerry Fassaert. I'm representing the London and District Construction Association. I'd like to thank you for this opportunity of speaking to the committee this morning.

As I'm sure you're aware, the construction industry has a number of exemptions to parts of the Employment Standards Act relating to hours of work, overtime, termination and severance. I note that Bill 49 addresses mostly administrative changes to the act, and further, that there will be a complete review of the act in the fall. However, it is our impression that all aspects of the act may be reviewed and discussed at this committee, and to that we propose to address the following:

(a) Exemptions for the construction industry found in regulation 327 affecting section 57, part IV and part VI; and

(b) part XIV, subsections 58(2), (3), (4) and clause (6)(c) regarding termination and severance.

The construction industry is unique and different from most static production-oriented industries such as automotive and mining. Our industry employs persons for relatively short periods of time on a particular site or project. When the project is completed or the work available for that particular trade is completed, then employment on that site is terminated. The employee may be laid off or transferred to another site to begin again. Parts of our industry are also seasonal. Although building construction is becoming less and less dependent on the weather due to technology, the part of the industry affecting roadbuilding and sewer and watermain construction is still seasonal to a high degree. Because of this uniqueness in this area of the industry, previous governments have provided exemptions to the act which are required by the industry to remain productive and competitive.

In regulation 327 of the act, you'll note that clause 2(c) exempts the construction industry from section 57 of the act referring to termination and layoff. Regulation 327, clause 4(d), exempts construction from part IV of the act referring to hours of work. Regulation 327, section 15, goes further and extends the hours of work for roadbuilding to 55 hours per week and regulation 327, subsection 16(3), provides up to 50 hours of work per week for the sewer and watermain portion of the industry.

These three exemptions are extremely important to the industry. Due to its structure, normal termination and severance provisions do not work for either the employees or the employer. Due to the seasonal aspect of roadbuilding and sewer and watermain work, it is essential that the exemptions of these areas are continued.

Therefore, we request the continuance of the exemptions for construction as described in regulation 327. We further request that the sewer and watermain industry have the ability to work up to 55 hours per week, the same as the roadbuilding sector. In many cases, these industries work hand in glove and side by side. Fifty-five hours is a minimum requirement for both. This would require a change to regulation 327, subsection 16(3), to indicate 55 hours versus 50 hours.

Our other concern lies in part XIV of the act, specifically subsections 58(2), (3), (4) and clause (6)(e). I've enclosed appendix A, which describes those areas. As I have mentioned, the construction industry is exempt from the termination and severance portions of the act. There have been instances, however, where the construction employees working in fabrication shops have been treated differently from the regular construction employees who may be working on a site. The confusion arises through clause 58(6)(e), which is an exemption for construction employees where same work "at the site thereof." Those employees working at fabrication may or may not work at a site. However, their employment is necessitated by the existence of the project or site. They are equally paid and in many cases are working under the same collective agreements as the outside personnel. However, they are being treated by the enforcement bodies as manufacturing employees, when in fact they are construction employees.

We request that the language in clause 58(6)(e) be altered to reflect the true construction nature of these shop employees.

In summary, we look forward to the proposed complete review of the act in the fall, and again I thank you for the opportunity to bring our concerns to your attention.

The Vice-Chair (Mrs Barbara Fisher): Thank you very much for your presentation. We have just under five minutes per caucus, starting with the official opposition.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): Thank you for your presentation. You haven't addressed any of the specific amendments that are in Bill 49, but you have raised the question about — would you have thought it would have been better to have done this all at once, the review of the Employment Standards Act, the entire act? Because it's difficult even to address the concerns you've raised. We haven't had a chance to look at them. We'll certainly keep them in mind as the government proceeds with its discussion paper and eventually with legislation. Do you think it would have been a better project to have done this all at once?

Mr Fassaert: I don't think there's a problem with doing it in this fashion. It gives us a chance to express our concerns now and then there'll be a further review in the fall.

Mr Duncan: You like the notion of having the opportunity to present your views before legislation is drafted?

Mr Fassaert: Yes. I think it gives you an idea of what is going on out there.

Mr Christopherson: Like my colleague from the Liberal caucus, I don't have a lot to comment on, given that it's a fairly focused and specific presentation, and it is the first time this has been raised.

I would be curious — and I do not at this point know the answer — should this become a full-blown issue, whether or not it's likely in your opinion that the unions that represent many of your employees would have a different point of view on what you are suggesting, or is this one of those areas where there's a common front and a common interest?

Mr Fassaert: Certainly, I think the union representation would have a different focus. I'm not so sure if the membership would agree with that. Mainly I'm talking about the 55 and 50 hours. There's always a movement afoot in negotiations to reduce the number of hours of work. The reality is, the men now are not working 55 hours, they're working 50 hours, and I'm sure that the ability to work 55 hours would be there and the men would benefit from that, if it was there. Now, the way the construction industry is going, there certainly isn't any room to pay overtime, so the men are working 50 hours only and I think they would appreciate that ability to work those extra five hours. It boils down to an extra hour a day and certainly a lot can be accomplished in that hour.

Mr Christopherson: Are there any women in the industry?

Mr Fassaert: There are — some. Not a great deal, but all the unions have some women membership.

Mr Christopherson: Then I guess, based on what you've said, it's fair to say that it's likely there would be an equally balanced perspective that would be different than yours on this issue, and if the government decides this will be part of what they look at, in fairness, they the government will need to ensure that both sides of this particular point of view are thoroughly heard and discussed?

Mr Fassaert: I would agree with that.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham East): Thank you very much for your presentation. I just think the freshness of what you've told us this morning, the newness of it is important. It's important because it shows that indeed each sector, as the world of work itself is changing, has unique and specific needs; that sector being the home worker, that sector being the telecommunications worker or indeed the construction worker; each sector has unique and specific circumstances for their working conditions.

We've heard the rhetoric these last few days of hearings, starting on Monday. Gord Wilson addressed this as the big, bad business bill. We think that in fact this bill is an attempt to address those workplace changes that are so essential to be competitive. My question to you, representing the London and District Construction Association, are you prepared to work with the union leadership in this changing world of work and make those adjustments and changes that suit the needs of both the employer and the employee?

Mr Fassaert: I feel that in London there's a very good relationship between management and the unions and I find that the unions certainly have their membership's best interests at heart but are always willing to look at a situation that will improve the competitive nature of the companies that they represent also.

1020

Mr O'Toole: If I refer to a couple of sections here — and I may even refer to the previous presenter — where the workplace participants, that is, the leadership and management and union, worked out their differences, they may need mediators or facilitators or arbitrators to do that. If I look at the exemptions that currently exist, which are exemptions that have evolved specifically to recognize the unique nature and needs of the construction industry, they have been developed by some similar process —

Mr Fassaert: That's correct.

Mr O'Toole: — amendments to the legislation. I think it is negative, listening here to the presenters, that no change — the status quo — is acceptable. I think that's Ludditism or putting your head in the sand. The world of work is changing, would you agree?

Mr Fassaert: I do.

Mr O'Toole: The technology is changing, and the act has to be changed to respond to those changing realities.

I appreciate your sector bringing this to our attention. As you've said, part 2 of the hearings is a fuller, broader discussion and more of the meat of the issue than some of the administrative things we're trying to do here to expedite protection for the most vulnerable workers.

The Vice-Chair: The parliamentary assistant would like to speak. There are two minutes left in our time.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): Thank you very much for your presentation. I appreciate it.

I just want to put something on the record from yesterday, not involving your presentation though. It was a comment with respect to workers having access to the employment standards office in Kitchener, and I was given a number by a worker that they had trouble getting through to. I was able to reach the employment standards office there. Regrettably, it was the wrong number they had been given. In the phone book the correct number was indicated, but that's something we will certainly take back, to try to see if we can't go even beyond the call of duty to communicate clearly where people can phone for help.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation this morning.

LIFE*SPIN

The Vice-Chair: I would ask the representative from Life*Spin to come forward, please. Good morning and welcome to our hearing process. I'd ask you please for the sake of Hansard to identify yourself and the group you represent.

Mr Andrew Bolter: My name is Andrew Bolter and I represent an organization called Life*Spin. I am director of community development programs at Life*Spin.

I'll give you some background of the organization so you can see the perspective from which we come.

Life*Spin stands for Low Income Family Empowerment*Sole-Support Parents Information Network. It's a community-based, non-profit organization which provides information about access to services and meaningful employment for low-income people.

We assist our clients in their dealings with government social service agencies and we aim to gain access to and share and promote the exchange of knowledge of social and community services that are available for individuals and families.

We're committed to creating an environment of trust, respect and self-empowerment within ourselves and our community. We treat all of our clients with respect, dignity and appropriate concern.

We're a front-line organization dealing directly with people who are poor, both the working poor whose numbers seem to us to be increasing and those who find themselves on social assistance. On a daily basis, we deal with fellow Londoners who are finding it impossible to find appropriate shelter, food, clothing, work, and cannot pay their hydro, gas or phone bills, if they can manage to get a phone in the first place. Our clients are people who are in a constant struggle to maintain the basic and fundamental necessities of life.

We are also actively engaged in supporting and assisting community development projects that will tap into the resources and talents of those in the low-income community who cannot utilize their talents, skills and energy because of a lack of opportunity and access to capital to start community-based businesses.

We believe that healthy communities need a truly local economy so that everyone in the community benefits. We believe that the fundamental economic problems in our society are caused by the increased concentration of wealth and not by the poor who seem to have become the scapegoats in this government's agenda.

It's interesting to note that many of our clients are referred directly to us from the constituency offices of local MPPs: Dianne Cunningham, Bob Wood, Bruce Smith and Marion Boyd. The Life*Spin phone number is also provided by the city of London to general welfare applicants during the application process. We see this as an endorsement of our organization by the province and the city of London, and we trust the government funding on which we have relied will continue to come to us so that we continue to assist the constituency offices and the constituents of our local MPPs and help empower the economically disadvantaged in our community.

From our front-line perspective, we see that things are getting worse for the poor in this province. There are more food banks right now than McDonald's restaurants. There are more children living in shelters in Toronto than single males. People are hurting as a direct result of the policies, choices and actions of the Ontario government, not only through the cuts to welfare but also other changes that have a huge and disproportionate impact on the poor and the most disadvantaged. We are seeing changes to workers' compensation, legal aid, the Landlord and Tenant Act — and rent review is on the table — removal of subsidies for public transit, deregulation of environmental standards, and today we are here dealing with the Employment Standards Act.

The proposed changes to the Employment Standards Act, on top of these other changes to programs and government services, are going to compound the detrimental impact of recent government actions on the poor. After reviewing the proposed changes to the employment standards legislation, we are at a loss to understand how anyone could imagine that anyone other than the employer is going to benefit from them. Perhaps the Employment Standards Improvement Act should be renamed the Employment Standards Removal Act. This would be a more honest title.

We also do not understand why, if the government is going to review the act and make what are described as comprehensive changes to it in the fall, these housekeeping measures are going ahead. If the government is inviting input into the process for what it terms housekeeping changes, then I trust we will be able to have further input into the hearings on the proposed comprehensive changes.

The fact is, the proposed changes we are addressing today are more than housekeeping; they are fundamental changes. To describe them as housekeeping is misleading. Surely the raison d'être of employment standards is to provide a basic level of expectation in terms of health and safety, minimum wages, maximum hours of work, overtime pay, public holidays, vacations, pregnancy and parental leave, equal pay for equal work, termination notice, severance pay and adjustment measures for pay by employees and employers as to minimum treatment of employees. This protects employees from employers who seek to take advantage of them.

If anything, the employment standards in Ontario have been low compared to the rest of the world. I don't know why we always have to compare ourselves with the US. In many European countries, for instance, there is a minimum annual vacation period of four weeks, and much more protection for employees generally.

I read in yesterday's paper — actually it was the day before yesterday — that the government is backing away from making employment standards negotiable under the collective bargaining process; at least it's doing so during this phase of the proposed changes. It would appear that it will be back on the table in the comprehensive round. The whole concept of negotiating employment standards in each workplace can only benefit the employer. The employer is in a position of power. This is especially so when people are desperate for work and especially so in non-unionized situations.

Simply put, employers have the power to hire and fire. The rise of unionism and collective bargaining was a direct result of employees organizing themselves in an attempt to address this imbalance of power and obtain fairly basic standards of employment. Collective bargaining has historically done much to raise the working conditions of unionized and non-unionized employees.

The existing Employment Standards Act provides a modest, minimum level of treatment of employees by business. The courts have interpreted these amounts as minimums and have often awarded much greater monetary amounts than those dictated in the act, especially in the areas of wrongful dismissal and severance. But the existing act has many problems. Much of this is due to a lack of enforcement. Much of the money owed to employees by employers remains unpaid. It takes a long time for an employee to recover moneys owed. However, despite these problems, the act does provide basic standards that all employers must meet.

A critique of some of the proposed changes to the act: I'll start with the maximum and the minimum levels of claim.

There's a $10,000 cap on claims. We disagree with any cap on permissible recoveries of money by an employee. Such a cap will only benefit employers. Even among low-income sectors — domestic workers or garment workers, for example — there can be claims in excess of this amount. Why should an employer who steals more than $10,000 from their employees be let off? There is no logic to this. It goes against fundamental concepts of justice and the concept of damages in law.

There should be no limit to the amount claimed. The argument that employees who have claims over $10,000 or under a prescribed minimum can simply take the matter to court won't work. Firstly, who can afford to retain a lawyer and go to court? Certainly a low-income employee cannot. Legal aid will not cover employment law. A low-income employee will be forced basically to forgo their legal rights. It takes years to bring an action to trial in the civil courts of this province. Small Claims Courts will be tied up with litigation on any claims below the prescribed minimum.

Low-income employees will have no choice but to use the mechanisms available in the Employment Standards Act in order to protect themselves. The court is not an option. It is astonishing to us that this government can claim that the changes to the act will promote self-reliance. How can you be self-reliant when you have no access to justice and no means of asserting your rights?

It's interesting to note that while the maximum of $10,000 is intended to be embedded in the act, which makes amendment more cumbersome, any minimums are going to be in the regulations, making it much easier for a government to simply make changes. Perhaps the rationale for this is that it would be easier for the minimums to be gradually increased to take more cases away from the responsibility of the ministry.

Limitation periods are being changed as well, with the proposed changes to them. Bill 49 proposes a six-month period during which a worker can make a complaint for any infraction by the employer of employment standards. Any investigation by the ministry will only go back six months. Money cannot be recovered if it became owing to an employee more than six months before the facts upon which the proceeding or prosecution was first based. This means an employer can breach the standards with impunity, knowing full well that they will be liable only for six months of infractions. The existing two-year complaint period is in line with most civil limitation periods, but these generally start to run when the plaintiff ought to have known the case they have.

Retention of a two-year limitation period is essential, given that while employed there is a huge disincentive to make a complaint against an employer. In the real workplace, employees who make complaints have no protection from the employer against harassment and retribution, so they wait until they have another job or are laid off before they complain. Non-unionized, low-income workers are particularly vulnerable because typically the poor live from paycheque to paycheque and, as stated already, they cannot afford to take their employers to court. Furthermore, as employers are required to keep detailed employment records, it would be relatively easy to work out exactly how much the employee had been ripped off. The limitation period should not be changed to six months.

The provision giving the ministry two years to conduct its investigation and another two years to collect the moneys owing is bizarre. An employee could conceivably wait four years before receiving money that is rightfully theirs. Where is the administrative efficiency in this?

Now I'm going to talk about negotiation of employment standards, because that I think is on the agenda, at least long term.

It is our view that the provision for negotiation of employment standards is based on a misconceived notion that somehow, in order to compete in the so-called global economy, we have to provide a cheap labour pool. The statement by this government that "Ontario is open for business" says it all. "Open for business" means making political choices based on reducing the cost of doing business, thereby maximizing the profits of those corporations and businesses that choose to do business here. It has nothing to do with making our society more just, building communities from within, or ensuring that everyone has a reasonable home, food on the table and a sustainable, decent job.

In a situation where an individual is faced with a choice of work or no work, they are likely to accept working conditions and standards far below what is healthy and fair. Hungry people tend to focus on providing the next meal for themselves and their dependants rather than whether the plant they work in is safe or their health is suffering because of required long hours of employment.

This government has it backwards. We should start with the individual and the community and say, "What kinds of businesses will benefit us, give us a healthy and inclusive society in which everyone benefits from the economy?" That is the way this country developed and grew. Instead, governments are competing with each other in a frenzy of cutting and reducing, downsizing and deregulating so that the transnational corporate moneys that whisk around the globe — and there's a lot of money — from bank to bank flow through their own banks. Our provincial government seems to have bought into this frenzy. It's as if there's no debate: We have a global economy, globalization is a fact, and we have to do what other countries are doing. I think that's ridiculous. It closes the debate. The debate should remain open. It's very Chomskyst.

At Life*Spin, we see people caught up by these forces and feeling frightened, out of control and helpless before them. We don't see any signs of hope and opportunity. There are few jobs. Our clients join the ranks of people applying for the few jobs that come available in London. Governments are saying that it's the pressure of the new global market; their hands are tied; we have no choice.

Dignified work can provide dignity, but undignified work cannot. We need clear, non-negotiable minimum employment standards to protect the most vulnerable to prevent any erosion of our already very mediocre employment standards. We must also remember that rights are hollow if they are not enforceable. We have to be able to protect employees who assert their rights against employers who seek to take advantage of them.

We strongly oppose this government's efforts to lower employment standards. Instead the government should focus on ensuring that employers pay the money they owe to workers rather than giving unscrupulous employers the incentive to cheat.

This committee should recommend that Bill 49 be scrapped.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Bolter, for an excellent presentation. I'm particularly moved by your reference to the Employment Standards Removal Act. I think that's a great phrase; quite accurate too.

I would also point out to you, when you say that after reviewing the proposed changes to the ESA legislation you're at a loss to understand how anyone could imagine that anyone other than the employer is going to benefit from them, it's interesting that every single chamber of commerce from every community has come in and defended the fact that they don't think there's any loss here to workers, that this maintains the standards that are there.

My question, though, to be specific, is to ask you to comment just a little bit more, because I'm seeing this more and more as a crucial part of this issue: You say on page 10 at the bottom that retention of a two-year limitation is essential given there is a huge disincentive to make a complaint against an employer. "In the real workplace, employees who make complaints have no protection," you go on to say, against employer harassment and retribution. We had a representative from the Kitchener-Waterloo chamber of commerce yesterday say that what this change will do is prevent an employee from "sitting on his can and mulling it over," as if to suggest that somehow there was some game-playing on the part of employees. Would you just expand on why you think this clause is so crucial, especially for the most vulnerable workers?

Mr Bolter: I'm not sure whether that gentleman in the chamber of commerce has ever been an employee of someone else or what kind of background he had in the workforce, but my only comment is that I think, whatever business you're in, if an employee makes a complaint against an employer, human nature being what it is, there's going to be a potential of a breakdown of relationship. Any complaint made under this act is going to be basically a complaint that, "You're ripping me off." People don't like to hear that.

The act, from what I can see, will not provide any protection for an employee who does that. Unless there's some kind of setup in which there are teeth in an enforcement mechanism that will enable an employee to say, "Well, I am being harassed," it's not going to work.

1040

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much, Andrew, for a very sensitive presentation and appeal this morning. You do justice to the people you're attempting to represent. Just asking a little background, how long have you been in existence?

Mr Bolter: It's been, I believe, five years.

Mr O'Toole: Five years; about the same the NDP were elected. Would you agree that the last five to 10 years have really seen a lot of difficulty? The economy, and I'm not blaming anyone, for a variety of reasons — well, perhaps you could explain to me: Why has the economy in the last five to 10 years really been in a downward spiral? Is it a world phenomenon? Could you respond to that?

Mr Bolter: I think I'd have to take about 12 hours to answer that question.

Mr O'Toole: Just quick — you know, we haven't got all day.

Mr Duncan: Mulroney.

Mr Derwyn Shea (High Park-Swansea): Trudeau.

Mr Bolter: I would say it's choices made —

Mr O'Toole: Shouldn't we do something?

Mr Bolter: — by governments.

Mr O'Toole: Exactly right.

Mr Bolter: This government should pay attention to that.

Mr O'Toole: I think so. As we start our first year of mandate under way, I think you're right to say that we do want people to have jobs and dignity. When I look back to the travesty, and I have five children, the future has been diminished; the future has been spent for them. We've doubled the debt. We paid better benefits than any other province. Did it solve the problem? No. You told us this morning there are more McDonald's, and it's in the last five years. What we're trying to do is change that.

I want you to focus on one part, the limitation period. The reality is that you can't claim —

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, Mr O'Toole. I'm sorry; your time has expired. Mr Duncan or a member of the official opposition, please.

Mr Duncan: Do you think taking away workers' rights and hurting the vulnerable is going to make society any better?

Mr Bolter: No.

Mr Duncan: Do you think that the response we've heard from this government is going to solve the problems that the working poor and, more importantly, those who aren't working have?

Mr Bolter: No. I think they're increasing the problems.

Mr Duncan: Do you think we ought to put the rhetoric about what's happened in the last five to 10 years aside and start working together to find solutions for people who have problems in this society?

Mr Bolter: Yes. I think we should stop blaming each other and just get on with it.

Mr Duncan: That's really a good point. You know, the chamber of commerce — the chambers in different communities have come and said, "Look, we do have to work together here," and a number of union representatives yesterday said that this government's poisoning collective bargaining in this province and poisoning those relationships in the labour markets which we need to be competitive and efficient. Do you think this type of change is going to help make labour relations and the investment climate better in Ontario or do you think it's going to harm the investment climate?

Mr Bolter: I think it's got a potential of creating diversity between unions and management because the collective bargaining process, if it's used for standards, is going to basically open the door to a lot more strikes and more disagreement. You need a clear minimum standard from which you can work.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Bolter, for coming forward this morning.

ALL CANADA COLLECT

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that the representative from All Canada Collect come forward, please. Good morning. For the sake of Hansard, I would ask you to introduce yourself.

Mr Gerry Coffin: Thank you very much. My name is Gerry Coffin and my presentation is basically very focused because it is really dealing with one issue, and that is the issue with respect to accounts receivable being turned over to private collection agencies.

I'm here to talk about a specific part of the proposed amendments as they relate to my industry, which is that of the private collection of accounts, and how it will assist the government. I believe that using private collection agencies will solve some of the problems the government is faced with today. You can turn time and effort into more productive and efficient use of existing manpower. Time is money. We're not suggesting the employees are inefficient; we simply say that when it comes to collecting past due accounts we're more efficient due to the fact that we deal with this on a daily basis.

While I'm not a designated spokesman for our industry, I've been an active participant as a collection agency owner for over 25 years and feel that I can speak with a certain amount of firsthand knowledge.

Our industry is one that's very closely regulated by the provincial government. All agencies are bonded, licensed and adhere to strict guidelines, regardless of the size of the agency or the location across the province. Forgive me if I refer to my own company, which is the Associated Credit Bureaus of Ontario. It is simply because I'm more familiar with the policies and the procedures of this group and I play a key part in the decisions and the quality of the service that we as a group of approximately 25 privately owned agencies provide to local businesses in every part of the province.

Collecting accounts is all we do. Generally speaking, there's nothing more inefficient than someone doing something that they're not trained to do or, worse still, having someone do something that they really don't feel comfortable doing. Collecting accounts — if you don't feel comfortable doing this sort of thing, it really is not very efficient. We surround ourselves with people who are licensed and trained to deal with debtors. They're trained in the techniques of negotiating and finalizing matters as quickly as possible. They're trained to ask for and receive payment in full of all accounts.

Just allow me to list a few reasons why we are successful in our collection efforts.

First of all, there is the psychological effect of the third party being involved; second is the consistent and regular follow-up to ensure continuity; third, knowledge of court rules and procedures as they pertain to collection matters; fourth, ability to negotiate settlements; and fifth, technology to locate assets and realize on same to satisfy any judgements.

Please allow me to address the proposed provisions, specifically subsection 73.0.2(2), which states:

"The director may authorize the collector to collect a reasonable fee or reasonable disbursements or both from each person from whom the collector seeks to collect...the director may impose conditions on the authorization and may determine what constitutes a reasonable fee and reasonable disbursements."

The simple answer to my concern appears to be dealt with in subsection (4) of the same section, which states:

"Clauses 22(a) and (c) of the Collection Agencies Act do not apply with respect to fees authorized under subsection (2)."

My concern is simply this: Section 22 of the Collection Agencies Act states that, "No collection agency or collector shall,

"(a) collect or attempt to collect for a person for whom it acts any money in addition to the amount owing by the debtor;

"(c) receive or make an agreement for the additional payment of any money by a debtor of a creditor for whom the collection agency acts, either on its own account or for the creditor and whether as a charge, cost, expense or otherwise...."

I'd like to share my understanding of the spirit of section 73.0.2 that's before this matter today. In most cases, as we understand it, a portion of the amount outstanding will be trust moneys owed to an employee. The normal practice for a collection agency is to take an account, collect the account, keep an agreed percentage and return the net amount to the client. In this case the client will be the Ministry of Labour, which is in fact assigning a trust receivable. Naturally they would want him or her to receive the full amount.

My concern essentially is this: The two acts are in a possible conflict.

I have made legal consultation and am advised that if this section is passed in its present form, fees may be added. However, he quickly goes on to state that at any time there's any ambiguity in law between acts, the act with restrictions or imperative rights on any individual will prevail.

As a licensed collection agency, we must be aware of detrimental consequences that could arise out of obvious violations. I would therefore request that section 73.0.2 be fine-tuned to simply add, "In all circumstances, the reasonable fee and disbursements, or both, collected from each person from whom the collector seeks to collect shall be deemed to be moneys owing by the debtor and shall not be considered moneys in addition to the amount owing by the debtor."

It is obvious that the intent of the section is to expand the powers of the Collection Agencies Act and to address the problems contained in the act because they have made reference to it in subsection 73.0.2(4). The goal should therefore be to redefine the wording of the act to uncover any difficulties that have to date gone unnoticed.

I would respectfully recommend to this committee that they make the drafting amendments so as to ensure there are no uncertainties in the future. Thank you very much.

The Vice-Chair: I thank you very much. We have just over four minutes per caucus and we'll start this time with the government side and Mr Tascona.

Mr Tascona: Thank you for your presentation. Can you tell me how much training and experience you have in collecting funds?

Mr Coffin: Me personally?

Mr Tascona: Yes.

Mr Coffin: Approximately 35 years.

Mr Tascona: What kind of training did you receive to do that?

Mr Coffin: I worked with two different finance companies for approximately 15 years. We're licensed; we are required to write an exam to hold a collection agency licence. There's no formal training per se. Most of it is on-the-job training.

Mr Tascona: Do you think that experience helps you do a better job?

Mr Coffin: Oh, definitely it does.

Mr Tascona: Why is that?

Mr Coffin: First of all, we're focused. I guess I use the analogy — quite frequently people will send their salespeople around to pick up their accounts receivable or to collect on their accounts receivable and there always appears to be a conflict. A person is going in and trying to sell a widget but at the same time is asking to pick up the accounts receivable. Collecting accounts is all we do, and I think that that's the main focus.

Mr Tascona: I find that very interesting because I was with the employment standards officers branch, actually in 1985, and at that time all we were responsible for, and up until 1993, I believe, the officers were only responsible for enforcing the act. But in 1993 the previous government disbanded the collections branch and discharged 10 people from their jobs and turned it over to the employment standards officer.

Mr Coffin: That's my understanding. My understanding is now that the employment standards officers do the actual audit, determine the amount of the claim, and then turn right around and have to come back and try to collect it from the company. Again, it's a matter of which is the most important job that gets the most attention. It's my understanding that the officers are relatively busy doing the audits and going out and handling them case by case, that the collection of accounts sort of becomes a secondary issue, and that they're not really being looked after on a regular basis.

Mr Tascona: Would you believe you need training in collections to be able to do it effectively?

Mr Coffin: Yes, because it becomes a matter of knowing the procedures, knowing the court procedures. It's my understanding that if there is an order made against the company, that order can be converted to an automatic judgement against the shareholders and the directors of the company. It's my understanding that that has not been issued, or has never been issued, that there have been no attempts made to collect from the directors of the company.

Again, the collections are only effective if you understand the procedures of the courts and you can locate assets to attempt to collect this matters.

Mr Shea: That's an interesting response. Your view then is that the current method by which government staff are attempting to collect is not particularly efficient.

Mr Coffin: No, it's not.

Mr Shea: That where there's an attempt and a desire on the part of the government to ensure that a dollar owed is a dollar that should be collected completely and returned to the employee, has not been an objective that's been achieved so far.

Mr Coffin: That's my understanding.

Mr Shea: You believe that the private sector could do that more effectively than government.

Mr Coffin: Yes, I do.

Mr Shea: You have to bear with me for a moment because, on the one hand I have the evidence given that we have government employees who have knowledge of the act; on the other hand, I have the argument that the private sector has training and skill; and in the middle I've got companies that by and large don't want to pay anybody and either go bankrupt or don't want to pay anybody and will stonewall. What would lead me to believe that you could be a better job collecting and dealing with those kinds of companies than government employees?

Mr Coffin: Again, it's part of our tactic, if you want to call it that, for collecting. We're perhaps a little tenacious. We continue on against an individual case.

Mr Shea: You would go after the directors and you would apply other systems than currently are being applied right now.

Mr Coffin: Oh, by all means. Again, it's my understanding that a letter goes out and possibly a phone call goes out to the defaulting company, with no follow-up beyond that point. So, again, it becomes a situation of the squeaky wheel getting the grease. If you don't ask someone and don't chase after people, they are not going to pay. So therefore, yes, we would locate the assets of the directors and the owners of these companies and attempt to collect from them.

Mr Duncan: The official opposition sympathizes with what the government is trying to do; that is, find a better way to collect moneys owing. The two concerns that have been raised in the hearings to date are: the notion that many of the people that you try to collect for go out of business or close down and it becomes legally very difficult; the other concern that's been expressed is the notion that a collection agency could negotiate less than 100% of the wages owing. I wonder how you would address that particular concern. Say you won a tender to do collection, how would you address it? At what point would you suggest to an employee or a group of employees that it's better to settle for 50 cents on the dollar versus 100%? Just give a sense of how you would respond to that.

Mr Coffin: It's happening on a daily basis. Our procedure within my office is to simply take an account in, and once we have the account listed, we are allowed to investigate both that company and that individual. It becomes legal, then, to investigate him and find out what assets he has. Upon completion of the investigation, we obviously are going to ask for the full amount at the outset. But in many cases it does become more prudent to collect 60% or 75% of the total amount now than to wait down the road and take it over a period of time. But it's not a decision that's lightly made, to take 60 cents on the dollar or 80 cents on the dollar, whatever it is; it's on an individual case basis.

Mr Duncan: Just to pursue that line of thinking a little bit, at what point would you decide to recommend, say, 60 cents on the dollar versus going after the directors of a company, assuming it's an incorporated organization?

Mr Coffin: If there are assets from a director, we will not recommend taking a settlement on the company just to make it easy on the company. Again, we deal with this on a daily basis. The problem with most accounts receivable with companies is that they do not have personal guarantees, so you have no attachment other than the limited company. If that limited company already owes well in excess of its assets, there's no point.

Mr Duncan: Just another question too, if I can. My understanding is — and maybe others around the table, perhaps research, can confirm this — that a large percentage of those wages that do go uncollected would happen in a situation where you have an unincorporated business or a sole proprietorship. How would you be able to deal with that situation as distinct from, say, an employment standards officer, who today would be the one who has to try to enforce collection?

Mr Coffin: I can only go from what my understanding is, that the employment standards people are telling me that they just don't have the time or the wherewithal to be able to determine exactly what that person has. If the person says, "I don't owe any money," or, "I don't have any assets," the employment standards people basically have to say, "That's it," whereas we would put a full-time person on to investigate that.

Mr Duncan: This is perhaps a bit unfair, and I don't mean to be unfair to you. Could you predict on, say, a percentage basis how much more you could collect on average than the existing system? What could your industry, in terms of percentages, do to improve collections: 10% better, 15%, 20%, 30% better?

Mr Coffin: Again, I'm only going from information that I'm receiving. I believe, quite frankly, that the employment standards business — and I'm using it because there is the hammer of having the director — I believe that there could be easily a 25% to 30% increase in the collection.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Coffin, for your presentation. Let me say at the outset that I certainly have no qualms or difficulties at all with the role that your corporation plays in our society, and I think that you're entitled to do that, and that has no bearing on the approach that I'm going to take. I just wanted to say that for the record.

Having said that, I would ask, first of all, you do consider yourself to be an expert in the field of collections?

Mr Coffin: Yes, I do.

Mr Christopherson: Would you consider most of your employees, if not all, to be experts in the field of collections?

Mr Coffin: At various stages of training, yes.

Mr Christopherson: Right. When they're fully trained, you'd consider them to be experts?

Mr Coffin: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: If you or any of them were suddenly hired by the provincial government and you were no longer a private sector worker or employee but suddenly a public sector employee, would you lose that expertise?

Mr Coffin: I perhaps wouldn't lose that expertise; I might lose some of my motivation, because we work on production.

Mr Christopherson: Are you suggesting that everyone who is in the public sector is not a professional?

Mr Coffin: No, I'm not suggesting that at all.

Mr Christopherson: Okay, because I would suggest to you that professionalism implies the fact that you don't need to be necessarily paid to do a job that's proper, that you are paid for. If there's good, proper motivation for that and moral reasons, then that should be enough; if it isn't, then that's a problem that an individual would have, not the fact that they're a public sector employee. Is that fair?

Mr Coffin: That's fair.

Mr Christopherson: I'd like to move a little then and talk about an ideal situation, where you'd go to an employer, do what you do best, they throw their arms in the air and say, "Uncle," give 100% of the money owed to the employee, and then on top of that is the penalty the employer has to pay, because they have to pay your fees and cover off other costs, and the employee gets all of their money. Would you say that would be the ideal?

Mr Coffin: That's Utopia, yes.

Mr Christopherson: Right. Now, let's say we're into a situation where we're at an 80% settlement. You get the company to offer 80%. You go to the employee and say, "I think this is the best we're going to get," and you use the judgement that Mr Duncan brought out of you that you would use. I would suggest to you that if you did that, the employee is going to lose something, because once you get under 100%, when the employer offers to make a settlement with you, there's two pieces they have to pay: one is the amount that the employee gets, and then they have to pay the money on top of that to cover your fee, which you're rightfully entitled to, and the profit that's built into that.

Do you not think it's fair to say that some of that money could have gone to the employee if it didn't have to go to you, and if that were part of the service the Ministry of Labour provided then the employee would get maybe 85%, 86% or 90% of their money, you would be providing a professional service and the most vulnerable in our society wouldn't be getting the short end of the stick in this deal?

Mr Coffin: But 80% of something is better than 100% of nothing.

Mr Christopherson: I'm not arguing that point. I'm just saying that if you can get 80% and on top of that the employer is going to pay you your rightful fee, with your rightful profit margin built in, if you didn't have that part of it, that would be money the employer would be giving back to the employee, and instead of an 80% deal it's an 85% deal. Is that fair?

Mr Coffin: That's fair.

Mr Christopherson: If that's fair, then you can understand why unions and people who represent the most vulnerable have a great deal of difficulty with moving to privatization of this service, because it's the employee who's going to lose.

Mr Coffin: Again, I can only go by what I am told, that the people who are actually handling it right now do not have the time to do an effective job.

Mr Christopherson: I wouldn't argue that point. If we really wanted to go after this, I'm just suggesting that the government's alternative of privatizing it is not necessarily the only or the best way to go.

Mr Coffin: I can't comment on that.

Mr Christopherson: You didn't write this law; the government did. By the way, I appreciate the forthrightness of your answers, and I'm sure that if ultimately this is the way it goes — they have a majority — that you'll do a professional job. But I would submit on behalf of the NDP that this is not the way to go for the most vulnerable employees in our society. This government is giving them short shrift, and that's wrong.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Coffin, for making your thoughts known today at the hearing process.

OXFORD REGIONAL LABOUR COUNCIL

The Vice-Chair: I would ask the representatives from the Oxford Regional Labour Council to come forward, please. Good morning, gentlemen.

Mr Broderick Carey: I'm Broderick Carey, president of the Oxford Regional Labour Council. With me today is Wayne Colbran, the financial secretary for the Oxford Regional Labour Council.

In introducing the Bill 49 amendments on May 13, Minister of Labour Elizabeth Witmer claimed she was making housekeeping amendments to the Employment Standards Act. She described the bill as "facilitating administration and enforcement by reducing ambiguity, simplifying definitions and streamlining procedures." The reality is that this is not minor housekeeping but major Hoover cleaning with suction force equal to a tornado. These changes will make it easier for an employer to cheat their employees and harder for workers to enforce their rights. It strips unionized workers of their historic floor of rights which they have had under the Ontario law for decades.

This submission is made on behalf of the Oxford Regional Labour Council, located in Oxford county. The Oxford Regional Labour Council has been servicing its affiliates and communities since 1955. At present, we have 27 affiliated unions that administer over 50 collective agreements and represent over 8,000 workers and their families. These workers and the businesses they work in represent an average picture of Ontario's manufacturing and service industries. We are employed in everything from mining of lime and gypsum to foundries, auto parts and assembly, transportation, textiles and retail, and as municipal workers, health care deliverers and workers in the agricultural product sector.

The flexible standards section we'll skip over. I understand the government at this point has backed off temporarily from it, but I want to make it very clear we were against that suggestion on May 13, we're against that suggestion on August 22 and we will continue to be against that suggestion of flexible standards in the future. We will not give in to that and we clearly stand in opposition to that.

Turning to page 5, enforcement under a collective agreement: Currently, under the Employment Standards Act unionized employees have access to considerable investigative and enforcement powers of the Ministry of Labour. This inexpensive and relatively expeditious method of proceeding has been proven useful, particularly in situations of workplace closures and with issues such as severance and termination pay.

The Bill 49 changes eliminate recourse by unionized employees to this avenue and instead require all unionized employees to use the grievance procedure under the collective agreement to enforce their legal rights. The unions will bear the burden of investigation, enforcement and their accompanying costs. The director can make an exception and allow a complaint under the act where he thinks it is appropriate, but for all practical purposes the enforcement of public legislation has been privatized.

Should these amendments pass, the collective agreement will have the Employment Standards Act virtually deemed to be included in it. A union will be faced with the potential of claims against it by dissatisfied members. Although the existing duty of fair representation has not in the past been seen as requiring a trade union to represent employees in respect to employment standards, with this amendment change a union can be faced with complaints by members concerning fair representation. This could well mean that a failure of enforcement will be seen by the labour relations board as constituting a breach of the duty of fair representation. Thus, unions will face both additional obligations and liability costs.

Arbitrators will now have jurisdiction and make rulings that were formerly in the purview of an employment standards officer, a referee or an adjudicator. They will not be limited by the maximum or minimum amounts of the act. However, arbitrators lack the investigative capacity of the ESOs and may not be able to match the consistency of result the act has had under public enforcement. Most important, employers could argue that as boards of arbitration do not have the critical powers to investigate whether particular activities or schemes were intended to defeat the intent and the purpose of the act and its regulations, such cannot be determined. In such circumstances, unionized employees could well be left with no recourse whatsoever. This is particularly evident in cases of related-employer or successorship provisions of the act. It is difficult to see how such provisions can be applied when the successor or related employer may well not be party to the arbitration proceeding.

Enforcement for non-unionized employees: With these amendments, the Ministry of Labour is proposing to end any enforcement in situations where it considers violations may be resolved by other means; namely, the courts. In other words, the amendments would download responsibility for the enforcement of minimum standards for non-unionized workers. Employees would be forced to choose between making a complaint to the employment standards branch or filing a civil suit in the courts. Responsibility for enforcement is also downloaded on to non-unionized employees by limiting the amount recoverable through employment standards to under $10,000. Currently, there is no limit on what is recoverable. What an employer owes an employee is generally what he has to pay. An employee who files a claim with the Ministry of Labour for severance or termination pay is precluded from beginning a civil action concerning wrongful dismissal or claiming pay in lieu of notice which exceeds the statutory minimum.

The effect of these amendments is that those employees who have chosen the more expeditious and cost-effective path of claiming through the ministry will have to forgo any attempt to obtain additional compensation through the courts. Legal proceedings are notoriously lengthy and prohibitively expensive for many, even though they may be entitled in common law to more than the statutory minimums under the Employment Standards Act.

An employee who seeks to obtain a remedy in excess of $10,000 and who can afford to wait the several years a civil case will take, and at the same time pay a lawyer, will have to forgo the relatively more efficient statutory machinery in respect of even those amounts clearly within the purview of the employment standards officer.

Employees who file a complaint under the act will have only two weeks to decide whether to continue under the act or withdraw their complaint and pursue the civil remedy. Those unaware of their legal rights may well be excluded from commencing a civil action unless they obtain the necessary legal advice within the short, two-week period.

Just as there are the provisions barring civil remedies in section 64.3, there are mirror provisions in section 64.4 precluding any employee who starts a civil action for wrongful dismissal from claiming severance or termination payments under the act. Other provisions are also prohibited under the act once a civil action has started, such as an employer not paying wages owed and failure to comply with successor rights in the contract service sector. Employees who initiate claims but decide they no longer wish to pursue their civil suit don't appear to have even the two-week time limit to change their mind. Rather, they appear to have no right at all to reinstitute a complaint under the act.

Maximum claims: The amendments introduce, as noted above, a new statutory maximum amount that an employee may recover by filing a complaint under the act. This maximum of $10,000 would appear to apply to amounts owing of back wages and other moneys such as vacation pay, severance or termination pay. There are only a few exceptions, such as for orders awarding wages in respect to violations of the pregnancy and parental leave provisions and unlawful reprisals under the act.

The problem with implementing such a cap is that workers are often owed more than $10,000, even in the most poorly paid sectors of the workforce, such as food service, garment workers, domestics and others. Indeed, workers who have been deprived of their wages for lengthy periods of time are the very employees who will not have the means to hire a lawyer and wait the several years it would take before their case is settled. In effect, therefore, this provision will encourage the worst employers to violate the most basic standards, while at the same time compounding problems for those workers with meagre resources.

This $10,000 limit would have penalized an Oxford county worker of some $20,000 more and let the bad boss off the hook. He was a unionized employee who discovered while on layoff that his employer was using another plant with less senior employees doing the work. While he was on layoff, this same employer was bringing in the spouse and children of a supervisor to work in the plant. Even after going through proper procedures and through the employment standards branch and winning his case, this employer still refuses to pay up. This is a unionized environment. Could you imagine what it would be like for the unorganized to try and get it resolved?

Bill 49 also gives the minister the right to set minimum amounts for claims through regulation. Workers who make a claim below the minimum, which is as yet unknown, will be denied the right to file a complaint or have an investigation. Dependent upon the amount of this minimum, it could well have the effect of an employer keeping his violations under the minimum in any six-month period and thereby avoiding any legal penalty.

Use of private collectors: The proposed amendments intend to privatize the collection agency function of the Ministry of Labour's employment practices branch. This is an important change, providing one of the first looks at the government's actual privatization of a task which has traditionally been public. Private operators will, should these proposals be implemented, have the power to collect amounts owing under the act.

A fundamental problem with regard to the act has for some time now been the failure to enforce standards. This is no less true with regard to collections. The most frequent reason for the ministry's failure to collect wages assessed against an employer has been the employer's refusal to pay. The answer to this problem, according to the proposed amendments, is not to start enforcing the act but rather to absolve the government of the responsibility to enforce the act by farming out the problem to a collection agency.

In addition, the employment standards director can authorize the private collector to charge a fee from persons who owe money. Should the amount of money collected be less than the amount owing to the employee or employees, the regulations will enable the apportioning of the amount to the collector, the employee or employees and the government. Where the settlement is under 75% of the amount owing, the collector is required to obtain the approval of the director. But this still allows the collector incredible leeway, if not outright abuse, with someone else's money. The danger here is that even persons whose earnings put them below the poverty line and who are owed money under the act could well be required to pay fees to the collector. A minimum wage worker at $6.85 per hour, for example, could not only receive less money than what is owed but also have to pay to have it collected. Surely this raises ethical questions for the drafters. We would suggest that while such an approach may be appropriate in commercial transactions, it is neither morally justified nor appropriate in the circumstances. We want the system of public enforcement to be maintained and improved.

This provision will likely lead to employees receiving considerably smaller settlements. As well, they open the door to unconscionable abuse. The Oxford Regional Labour Council is gravely concerned that employees, particularly the most vulnerable, will be pressured to agree to settlements of less than the full amount owing as collectors argue, if only for the reasons of expediency, that less is better than nothing. Having at the same time to pay a collector amounts to nothing less than legalized theft. At the same time, unscrupulous employers will de facto now find their assessments for violations lowered and thus be encouraged to continue their violations of minimum standards.

Limitation periods: The proposed amendments in Bill 49 significantly change a number of time periods in the act. The major change is that employees will be entitled to back pay for a period of only six months from the date the complaint was filed instead of the existing two-year period. This restriction on time will penalize vulnerable workers who often find it necessary to file a complaint only after they have severed their employment relationship either by quitting or by changing employers. This is a substantive restriction, particularly for workers who have been denied their statutory rights for a longer period of time and cannot afford a civil suit. Only in certain circumstances, such as where the breach is a continued one or where there are violations in the case of several employees, is the limitation period extended.

Workers who fail to file within the this new time limit will have to take their employer to court in order to seek redress. The burden of cost will also have to be borne by the employee in such circumstances, as the Ontario legal aid plan has been scaled back and no longer covers most employment-related cases.

In contrast, the ministry still has two years from the day the complaint was filed in order to conduct their investigation and a further two years to get the employer to pay moneys owing. In other words, an employee having made a complaint under the act could wait up to four years before receiving their money, and then only the part of it that the collector gets, minus the user fee. That the government can rationalize such amendments as "facilitating administration" and "streamlining procedures" is almost beyond comprehension.

Minor amendments: There are several positive amendments in Bill 49. Two are noted below. The first concerns vacation entitlements and the second concerns seniority and service during pregnancy and parental leave.

Entitlement to vacation pay is one of the few amendments in Bill 49 that the Oxford Regional Labour Council can support. With the inclusion of this amendment, the act will clearly provide that the vacation entitlement of two weeks per year will accrue whether or not the employee actively works all of this period or was absent due to illness or leave.

A distinction remains between entitlement to time off and entitlement to vacation pay. Vacation pay continues to be based on 4% earnings over the preceding 12 months. Thus, where a leave has resulted in decreased earnings, it may still be reflected in reduced statutory entitlement to vacation pay.

The amendments to seniority and service during pregnancy and parental leave ensure that all employees are credited with benefits and seniority while on such leave. With the passage of this amendment, the length of the employee's time on leave will be included in calculating length of employment, length of service or seniority, for purposes of determining rights under a collective agreement or contract of employment.

The passage of these amendments into legislation would take precedence over contractual language whether or not the contract refers to active employment.

Conclusion: Bill 49, in the government's words, is An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act. Nothing can be further from the truth. Oxford Regional Labour Council believes in basic societal standards in terms of hours of work, overtime pay, vacation pay, severance and public holidays. Bill 49 eliminates the floor for minimum standards. The floor has been eliminated under one foot of the worker, with the other foot on a banana peel.

As for the non-unionized workers, the most vulnerable in the workforce, Bill 49 can be compared to hanging from a greased rope and sliding to the bottom. This bill is about undermining their already precarious existence and as such is totally unacceptable.

As noted in our introduction, these amendments come on the eve of a comprehensive review of the act. The proper procedure would have been to include such changes as part of such a review and not try to pass them off as housekeeping changes. Beyond this, the core of the problem is the nature of the amendments themselves. As our comments already make clear, standards shouldn't be eroded, standards should not be made negotiable, rights shouldn't be made more difficult to obtain and enforcement shouldn't be contracted out and privatized.

The Harris agenda is to shrink the size of government and divest itself of public service. Once again, this government is putting the burden on the poor, most vulnerable and workers to achieve their $10 billion slashed from the budget to pay their wealthy friends a tax break.

Mr Duncan: Thank you for your presentation. It's a very succinct analysis. One area where we have some sympathy with what the government is attempting to do is to streamline the efficiency of operation of the ministry.

My question is this: On page 6 of your brief, in terms of enforcement of non-unionized employees, you spoke about the opportunity to elect to go from civil suit back to employment standards or vice versa. Recognizing that clearly you support the way things have been, would amendments to the bill that would give effect to some sort of second or third opportunity for somebody to elect down the road make those provisions more palatable?

Mr Carey: I can't see any reason why we can't leave it as it is now, where they have the options, and clearly leave it that way.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your excellent presentation. On the bottom of page 8, in the very last sentence you say, when you're referring to the cap of $10,000, "...this provision will encourage the worst employers to violate the most basic standards, while at the same time compounding the problems for those workers with meagre resources." The minister said on Monday when we launched these hearings, referring to the $10,000, that those claims often "involve individuals in executive positions." We also heard from the union that represents the employment standards officers. They said in their presentation: "The ministry's reasoning, as noted in the expenditure reduction strategy report 1996-98, is to lower the caseload as 'higher-paid' employees would use civil action to collect. The assumption must be, when an employee files a claim in excess of $10,000, they are higher-paid employees. This is not so."

Why do you and the union that represents the workers that actually deal with these cases believe the minister is, to be gentle, "inaccurate" when she says that these are all people in executive positions? What's the reality as you and your colleagues know it?

Mr Wayne Colbran: The reality you can see in that clause that you're talking about is the example that we're giving there. I've been personally involved with this one. This person is owed over $35,000. He's been fighting this thing over a year and a half. The Ontario Labour Relations Board has ruled in his favour and the employer just refuses to pay. This person now is on welfare, and there's no way that somebody on welfare can afford to go through the legal system of the court. Even if he could, it will be another two or three years while this employer just hires himself a lawyer and still refuses to pay. This isn't just an off-the-wall example. This happens all the time.

Mr Baird: Thank you very much for your presentation. I appreciate the time you took to travel from Oxford county to present to us today.

There's just one thing I'd clarify in Mr Christopherson's remarks: He was correct the first time when he said the minister said "often," and then he later said "all." She certainly didn't mean "all"; she said "often," as Mr Christopherson first quoted.

When the employment standards officers came before us I made this comment to them. One of the groups that recommended that we go back to a cap — there used to be a cap in years past — was the employment standards officers themselves, who sat on a ministry committee that looked into this issue. It's funny that their union, representing them, came and said that no, they didn't like it, yet the employment standards officers themselves were one group, 50% of the members of a committee, who made the suggestion to the government.

Mr Christopherson: They couldn't respond because they ran out of time. Come on. Be fair.

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, you're out of order.

Mr Baird: That's a fact. The truth remains that they didn't come to speak to me afterwards, and that's what's in the ministry. That's the advice we got.

Mr Christopherson: If I'm allowed on the record, I'll give you that response. How's that?

Mr Baird: You can certainly table it with the committee. That was just a comment, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Thank you both for taking the time to come before us to make a presentation this morning. We certainly appreciate it.

LONDON HOTEL AND MOTEL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group up is the city of London Hotel and Motel Association. Good morning. We have 20 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between presentation time or questions and answers.

Mr Chris Vachon: I'd like to start by saying good morning to everyone. My name is Chris Vachon. As mentioned, I represent the London hotel association and I am the general manager of Station Park Inn here in the city of London. I want to thank you and your committee first for allowing us the opportunity to be here today.

Employment standards reform is important, and therefore we support the government's initiative to repair it. Bill 49 is the first stage of this process, and we look forward to the extensive consultation process that will precede the introduction of the second stage of this reform package.

Bill 49, in our estimation and supported by our advisers, does not alter minimum employment standards in Ontario. What the legislation does is make technical changes to the act. These changes are aimed at improving administration and enforcement of employment standards as well as reducing ambiguity and simplifying language. We also see the bill signalling a significant reduction in the government's role in administering and enforcing the act.

The analysis is before you.

Act enforcement through collective agreement. The bill specifies that obligations under the act will be enforceable through collective agreements as if the act were part of a collective agreement. Employees covered by a collective agreement will not be permitted to file complaints under the act without the permission of the director. In essence, the grievance and arbitration procedure will reduce enforcement through the administrative machinery of the act. Powers of arbitration with respect to claims under the act will be expanded to include the powers of employment standards officers, adjudicators or referees under the act.

Parallel proceedings in court and under the act prohibited: The bill prohibits an employee from commencing a wrongful dismissal action in court if he or she files a complaint claiming termination or severance pay under the act. Similarly, where there is an employee complaint under the act for wages owing, breach of building services, successor provisions or the benefit provision of the act, a civil action seeking a remedy for the same matter is prohibited. These restrictions apply even if the amount owing exceeds the maximum for which an order can be made under the act. Civil actions are permitted if the employee withdraws the employment standards complaint within two weeks after filing it.

In parallel to the foregoing restrictions, an employee cannot initiate a complaint under the act for the specified matters if a civil action covering the same matter has been commenced. Effectively, the bill will require employees to choose whether to sue in court or to seek enforcement through the act.

Increasing flexibility for provision of greater benefits in contracts: The bill will make it easier for employers to establish that they have provided greater rights and benefits than are required by the act and thus obtain certain provisions of the act. When a group of collective agreement provisions — severance pay, hours worked, overtime, public holidays and vacation — are considered together, rather than separate as in past years, the collective agreement will prevail if it provides superior rights. In addition, statutory regulatory provisions, as well as provisions in oral, expressed or implied contracts, will prevail over employment standards if they confer a greater right than is provided by the employment standard.

Under the section on service during pregnancy and parental leave, the bill requires the length of employee pregnancy or parental leave to be included not only in determining seniority, as required by the current act, but also in determining the length of service for all rights except for the completion of the probationary period. Thus, all rights in the employment contracts that are service-driven will continue to accrue during the leave. All employers should review their contracts of employment to determine the impact this change will have.

Vacations: The present vacation of at least two weeks upon completion of 12 months of employment is amended to apply whether or not the employment was active employment. The pay during the vacation must not be less than 4% of the wages, excluding vacation, earned by the employee in the 12 months for which the vacation is given. This clarifies and simplifies existing provisions in the act.

Maximum amount of orders: Employment standards officers will not be permitted to make an order for an amount greater than $10,000 in respect of one employee, with the exception of orders relating to breach of the pregnancy or parental leave, lie detector, retail business holidays and garnishment provisions, and termination and severance pay in connection with breaches of such provisions. Arbitrators will not be subject to these restrictions. The bill provides for regulations prohibiting officers from issuing orders below the level specified in the regulation.

Collections: The bill sets out mechanisms for directors to use private collection agencies to collect amounts owing under the act. This will provide the ability to contract out a function that is now performed within the ministry. Collectors will be authorized to agree to compromises or settlements of claims if the person to whom the money is owed agrees, provided it is not less than 75%, or such other percentages as may be prescribed, of the money to which the person is entitled, unless the director approves otherwise.

Compromise of right under the act: Compromises and settlements respecting moneys owing under the act will be binding once the money stipulated in the compromise or settlement is paid, unless the arrangement is entered into as a result of fraud or coercion. In the current act, there was very little ability to contract out of the act's requirements. Employment standards officers will be given additional authority to settle complaints without making a prior finding of what wages are owing.

Limitation periods in a prosecution or proceeding under the act: No person will be entitled to recover money that becomes due to the person more than six months before the facts upon which the prosecution or proceeding is based first come to the knowledge of the director, subject to certain exceptions. In the current act, the limitation provided is two years.

Review of orders: An employment standards officer will be deemed to have refused to issue an order if a proceeding is not commenced within two years after the facts upon which the refusal is based first come to the knowledge of the director. Employees may request the review of an order or refusal to issue an order, in writing, within 45 days. The director has the discretion to extend this time limit in certain circumstances. Certain orders may be reviewed by way of a hearing. In the case of the employer, application for a hearing is dependent on paying the wages and administration costs required by the order.

Administrative changes: Complaints under the act will be able to be filed in either written or electronic form. Employment standards officers will be able to obtain copies of documents kept in electronic form. Certain changes concerning the service of documents under the act are also made.

We, the members of the London Hotel and Motel Association, zone 5 of the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association, support Bill 49, as it signals progressive change in employment standards in Ontario. It is not reducing the standards. It should be further emphasized that we are not seeking a reduction in benefits. We are good employers. We want to ensure our employees are treated fairly and receive that which is their due.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Vachon, for your presentation. I'm asking a question I don't know the answer to, which is dangerous for politicians, but I don't. What percentage of your industry would you say is unionized?

Mr Vachon: We just joined forces with the Hotel Association of Metropolitan Toronto, bringing us 40 additional major — international in some cases — hotels. As it stands right now, being myself the director of membership for the Ontario association, there is approximately 12% right now. The concentration is in Toronto.

Mr Christopherson: So 12% are unionized and the rest are non-union.

Mr Vachon: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: You would agree that if you don't have a collective agreement, the only real protection that you have, the only real bill of rights, is the Employment Standards Act? It's that or nothing.

Mr Vachon: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: I would just then like to pursue with you the notion you put forward that this is not reducing standards to those people who have the Employment Standards Act as their only piece of protection when, as I've raised earlier, there's a cap on how much money people can claim for and the only way they can get beyond that is to pay a lawyer, which means they're out money they wouldn't otherwise be with this bill. There are a lot of other examples; I don't have a lot of time. But I would like to hear a little further how you can square your statement that it's not reducing standards when I can point to you time after time where employees will be net losers as a result of Bill 49. They're out money, and I think in your business that means you lose something.

Mr Vachon: Right. With respect to the question directly, I'm not at liberty to extend the comments on behalf of the association or on behalf of the London Hotel and Motel Association other than what we put forth on a collective agreement and as advised with our lobbyists with Queen's Park. This is our document that we're reading from. I'm sorry. I can't speak of any personal view because of the properties that I've been running, the four in the last 10 years have not been unionized, so I can't directly answer your question.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you very much for your presentation. You should never feel nervous in front of us; we're the ones who are supposed to feel nervous.

But anyway, limitation periods: I just want to give you some background on that for the sake of the record. The evidence is that 85% to 90% of the employment standards claims currently are filed within the six months. Are you aware of that? That's the current status: 85% to 90% are filed within six months. Furthermore, Alberta, Manitoba, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia already have a six-month provision for the limitation period. So we're really trying to harmonize some of the things that currently exist in the Canadian marketplace.

Also on the limitation period, it's very important to pass on to your membership — much of what you said is very reflective of what we said, but to expand, we need to say that in the case of repeated claims, like failure in overtime payment, it's possible the limitation period can be expanded up to one year. This message doesn't seem to be getting out, and I think it's important for you to pass that on to your membership.

I just ask one last question. Will your organization be participating in part two of the full discussion on the employment standards changes?

Mr Vachon: Yes, and I can say that quite confidently because, again, our lobbyist with Queen's Park is actively pursuing and having the associations that were represented in different municipalities following through the process as well. So to answer your question, are we? We'd like to. Will we? Yes, if the opportunity presents itself.

Mr Duncan: Thank you for your presentation. The official opposition is not unsympathetic to the government's desire to try and improve the efficiency of the act. However, I guess we do differ with you with respect to the reduction of minimum standards. We believe there are clear reductions in minimum standards. Our view is that you can achieve both ends, that number one, you can improve the efficient administration of the act, and number two, do that without impacting directly on minimum standards.

My question to you is this, and I've asked a number of other business organizations this question. The types of businesses in my experience that will actually be impacted by these provisions are a very small percentage. I would assume the vast majority of your members are good employers who probably have never had claims for back wages, or if they have, it's been a very rare circumstance. Given that, why would organizations such as yours be as concerned as you are about some of these issues?

Mr Vachon: I can't speak on behalf of the association. Some of these issues that are before me — not all of them can I speak directly on, but I know these have been real issues that have been brought up within the city of London and are concerns with the 38 properties we represent as motels and hotels in the city.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before us here this morning and making your presentation. We certainly appreciate it.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, LONDON AND DISTRICT COUNCIL

The Chair: Which takes us to our last presentation of the morning, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, London council. Good morning again. And again you have your full 20 minutes, even if it takes us over the noon deadline.

Ms Harriet Miller: Good morning. My name is Harriet Miller and I'm here representing the London and district council of the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

I shall say up front the reason why a member of the executive is not here is because they're all gainfully employed out there and cannot get time off for union business. That brings me back to part of the tenet of what the Ontario Federation of Labour and CUPE have talked about, because in downloading, as I see it, in your streamlining process some of the responsibilities to the unions, it's important to realize — and I'm going to guess that 99% of the union executive members are volunteers. They don't have the time and they certainly don't have the resources.

So the reason I am here: I am very interested in women's issues and I think that's primarily why I've been asked to come and speak on behalf of the executive of this council that I have been involved with in the past. So on behalf of hundreds and hundreds of volunteers with CUPE in the London area, I'm happy to be here today.

I do want to tell you, though, because I don't know whether it's been explained to this group, at least at this hearing, that there are 12 or 13 of these councils in Ontario and we are actively involved in this. We're involved in, heaven forbid, the days of protest, and we lobby and we communicate and we get together on issues and share concerns.

First of all, somebody over here, Mr O'Toole, mentioned Gord Wilson's brief. The CUPE brief I know — did Sid Ryan already present to you? He will be doing so. He will no doubt be going through the whole brief. Because we were not able to get together with the council to pick priority items, which has been suggested by CUPE, I've just taken a few thoughts and concerns out of the brief, although I've done a lot of reading on this myself and have been very interested. But I would not take specific issues without getting direction from the council to do so.

My general comments:

It is the position of the London and district council of the Canadian Union of Public Employees that the employment standards legislation is among the most fundamental pieces of labour legislation for ordinary working people in this province. The purpose of this legislation has been to establish vital minimum standards designed to protect workers from the exploitation handed out by the province's worst employers.

We submit that any amendments to this legislation must enshrine a basic principle of continued improvement in the employment standards of workers so that they may be protected from the excesses of the labour market, and I'm going to make a general comment on that example at the end.

The Minister of Labour has portrayed the changes found in Bill 49, the employment improvement act, as housekeeping amendments that would facilitate administration and enforcement by reducing ambiguity, simplifying definitions and streamlining procedures. On the contrary, the council is concerned that the amendments are in fact significant changes designed to frustrate the legitimate claims of workers under the act by undermining workers' most basic rights.

Claims under the act will limit the ability of workers to enforce their rights under the law. The method in which an employee may recover from an alleged violation of the act — do you call it an acronym when you say ESA? We'll call it "the act" — is significantly changed to limit the worker's ability to obtain full redress under the law. The substance of what may be claimed has been limited under Bill 49 so as to set a minimum and maximum amount that a claimant may obtain as a result of a violation of the act. Also, the duration of acceptable claims has been shortened in order to reduce the amounts that may be recovered against employers that have violated the law. Together, these changes will reduce the total amount workers may claim from their employers under the act.

Several underlying themes arise throughout the amendments. The Ministry of Labour is attempting to rid itself of the cost and responsibility of enforcing the act. All of the changes designed to channel complaints into the court or grievance arbitration systems seem to help the ministry reduce its budget.

The elimination of a universal floor of rights for unionized workers indicates an effort by the government to erode the general level of employment standards in Ontario. Allowing employers with a bargaining agent the opportunity of setting workplace employment standards will lead some employers to erode current standards, and of this we have no doubt. These changes will encourage unscrupulous employers to realize cost savings by abusing their employees' rights under the act. Given the increased difficulty of enforcement for non-unionized employees, some employers will increasingly disregard the substance of the law designed to protect these employees. This faulty enforcement regime will move unionized employees to insist on workplace concessions.

Employers may simply contract out their work to unprincipled employers that do not abide by the law.

How's my time?

The Chair: We have lots of time. We still have 11-and-a-half minutes left.

Ms Miller: All right. I wanted to give you an example of something that's happened that was brought to our council by way of information, which is with one of our employers. In looking to make savings and also make the employees feel good, they said that the top level in a particular bargaining unit really was management. Fine. Okay, that case can be made, as we realize in law. So they made them into the next level up in this particular establishment and then, lo and behold, what they did is they said, "Oh, by the way, we have to cut back in all levels of the operation," and all the people they'd just taken out of the top level of the union and put into the lower level of management, they let them all go. This is what actually happened in the city of London in one of our workplaces.

Most of our employers are fabulous. We hear wonderful, wonderful accolades. But I'm afraid, silly as it may sound, that that $10,000 ceiling — some employers may just push things to the limit in whatever area of this law, get it over the $10,000 and say: "Whoops, $10,250. You'd better get yourself a lawyer." So I just don't agree at all with the limit on that.

1150

Also, we just had a report from a Jean Read, looking at the Pay Equity Act and changes they're making there. There are significant changes that are going to be suggested.

In Bill 40, which was scuttled by Bill 26 —

Mr Baird: Bill 7.

Ms Miller: Was it? What was 26? Oh, that was the restructuring or whatever.

There was a very important thing in that act that was taken out of Bill 40. This is just to demonstrate my fear with this government. There was a clause in Bill 40 that said that every collective agreement was deemed to have a particular clause, which was, "No employee shall be disciplined or discharged without just cause." That was scrapped. That is extremely significant. What I'm hearing here and seeing in this paperwork is that if we do not keep a mechanism for all citizens of Ontario to have a mechanism within the Ministry of Labour on employment standards, I can see that we may end up with more and more problems, people in litigation, horror stories.

On topic but off topic, there was a gentleman here from Kellogg today, and one very positive thing I remember from that — I didn't know what the upset was at Kellogg, but out of that period of time there came an employee protection program which was acute stress psychological help. It's ironic that with the stress, they talked about — people weren't gone, but in effect, they put in place, union and management, a marvellous way of dealing with acute stress, alcoholism and family problems. I don't know specifically if it came around that time, but it appears to me to have been at that point in time.

The government appears to be abdicating its responsibility of ensuring employment standards for all its citizens. We strongly protest any reduction in standards in any laws that have made Ontario one of the model societies, to be the envy of other less fortunate and farsighted jurisdictions.

I think it's ironic, just to say in absolutely closing, that Mike Harris and Ralph Klein, yesterday, with their peers at the first ministers' conference, their idea on medicare was scuttled, because the rest of the country is saying, "Uh-uh, it's not going to be touched; it's universality there." In Ontario, I hope the Conservative Party and Mike Harris in particular look to whom they're supposed to be representing. I know they are of a higher position in status in many ways, but they have to represent the people of this province. And the unions are going to be very happy to be involved at the second phase, I'm sure.

The Chair: That leaves us two minutes per caucus for any comments or questions, and we'll commence with the government members.

Mr Baird: I just have a short comment. I know my colleague from Toronto would like to say a few words.

Just briefly, you mentioned that Sid Ryan spoke to us. I'd just indicate that Mr Ryan met privately with the minister last week about, among other things, the Employment Standards Act and the changes in Bill 49. So I can assure you that she does certainly take the time —

Ms Miller: I notice it said August 19, which was last Monday, so maybe that's —

Mr Baird: Yes. So she has met with him. We are hearing from a good number of CUPE groups and a good number of them were even on the government's list that we wanted to hear from.

Ms Miller: Wonderful.

Mr Baird: I grew up in a CUPE household myself.

Ms Miller: Oh, did you?

Mr Tascona: The one thing we've been finding out throughout the hearings is that the collection process isn't working. We collect about 25 cents on every dollar. We're scratching our heads for methods to ensure that the workers get paid for their work. One of the problems, we found out, is that in excess of 50% of the employers who won't pay is because of financial reasons, and they use the protection of the Bankruptcy Act to get away from their obligations. That's an area we can't control. It's under the federal government's mandate and they've done nothing.

One other area you were looking at is some way of talking about private collections, but there are other measures that can be considered where there have been collections. Do you have any experience with the Occupational Health and Safety Act?

Ms Miller: Yes, I do.

Mr Tascona: Have you ever been involved where an officer — are you familiar with the powers that they have with respect to shutting down a workplace?

Ms Miller: I certainly am.

Mr Tascona: Now, do you think that those types of powers in terms of a specific type of circumstance — the employment standards officer's powers are limited to enforcement etc, but in a circumstance, would you believe that having the power to shut down an operation to ensure the collection of wages would be something that would be, on a balance, fair to the employer, fair to society, fair to the workers that are not being able to work, if that in fact was done? Because it's done under health and safety.

Ms Miller: Right.

Mr Tascona: They shut down the operation if they breach the act. What do you think?

Ms Miller: I think that would be a wonderful thing to have in the act, because I think it would make employers realize they have to be accountable and they shouldn't abdicate their responsibilities.

Mr Tascona: But where should it be used? It can't be used all the time. It has to be used in a certain circumstance. Where do you think it should be used?

Ms Miller: I wouldn't have the answer. I know that it has quite a bit to do with the whole bankruptcy law and —

Mr Tascona: Would it be a situation where there's one worker —

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Tascona; sorry.

Ms Miller: I think the government should be involved, should it happen. It shouldn't be an individual worker against the employer, in my personal opinion.

Mr Duncan: Thank you very much for your presentation. In your view, you had indicated by way of example and even said, I think, that most of the employers you deal with are good employers and that a lot of these things won't affect them. One of the arguments that's been made by other labour organizations is that this will in fact impede collective bargaining and the fast resolution of disputes at the bargaining table, particularly if, in the second stage of reform, the government goes ahead with the minimum floors. Would it be the view of CUPE as well that these types of changes to the Employment Standards Act would in fact impede collective bargaining and likely lead to a less stable labour market?

Ms Miller: Absolutely; very, very, very seriously.

The Chair: That takes us to — oops, we still have Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: I'll be very brief. You mention in your opening comments that you wanted to see and would be supportive of continued improvements to the Employment Standards Act. Yesterday in Kitchener, we had John Cunningham, who's the president of the United Steelworkers, Local 677, referring to this as the "bad boss" Bill 49, and he said, referring to the government, "You must be Hood Robin, who robs from the poor to legislate to the rich." With that in mind and your statement in mind, how do you feel about the name of this act being An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act, and who do you think it improves it for?

Ms Miller: If there's any improvement at all as it presently sits, I think it's an improvement for the employers. I think it's detrimental to the employees. I think the name makes no sense with it calling it improvement.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Miller, for taking the time to come before us today. With that, that completes our morning session. The committee stands recessed till 1 o'clock back in this room.

The committee recessed from 1159 to 1309.

LONDON REGIONAL ADVOCATES GROUP

The Chair: Our first group up this afternoon is the London Regional Advocates Group. Good afternoon.

Ms Jayne McKenzie: Good afternoon. I am Jayne McKenzie from OPSEU Local 220, a member of London Regional Advocates Group. With me are Susan Green from WRIST, Workers Repetitive Injury Support Team, and Frank Stilson from LOSH, London Occupational Safety and Health. We are three out of 60 members of the London Regional Advocates Group.

Ms Susan Green: Good afternoon. First off, I would like to thank the New Democratic Party for their diligence in making sure that the vulnerable people of this province had the ability to challenge this piece of legislation for what it is, nothing more than a way for the employers to spit in the faces of their workers. "Open for business" means higher profits and fewer rights. The commonsense government has done nothing for the working people of this province other than reduce their rights with every piece of legislation they turn out. Special-interest groups, basically the voting population, have been ignored in favour of their business buddies, 10% of the population. The tax base that the special-interest groups represent is the majority of taxes paid. The larger corporations have eroded the amount of taxes they pay by continually applying pressure to reduce their taxes and create loopholes. The current commonsense government continues to ignore us by trying to convince us that Bill 49 is good for us, that it will help us.

The London Regional Advocates Group consists of representatives of many diversified groups: unions, injured workers' groups, legal aid groups, occupational health and safety groups, ethnic groups. Our requirement for membership is that there is no fee for service. We have no constitution or bylaws; just dedicated people.

These dedicated people see the vulnerable of our region every day in their jobs and in their volunteer roles. We see what happens when the rules and regulations that are already in place are laughed at by unscrupulous employers. They ignore the current Employment Standards Act. Bill 49 gives them no reason to change; in fact, it gives them more leeway to cheat their employees. After all, just because one employee launches a complaint doesn't mean the rest of the employees will be able to get justice, and just because one employee wins their complaint doesn't mean it sets a precedent with the rest of the employees either. These same employers that cheat on the employment standards are the same employers who defraud the WCB, are lax in health and safety and are generally just all-around bad bosses.

Bill 49 falls short of doing anything to protect the working people of Ontario from these bad bosses; in fact, it does the opposite. It protects these bad bosses by capping the amount the employees can retrieve. It narrows the window in which employees can get what is rightfully theirs. It slams doors on employees making one complaint for the good of all employees.

Yes, the bad bosses will continue to thrive in this commonsense Ontario while their employees will cower in fear of losing their jobs and wait unrealistic time frames to recover what was theirs to begin with. Generally speaking, these people cannot afford the cost of litigation, nor can they afford to be without the money that is owed to them. A day's pay is $54.80, and generally that is exactly what the bad boss is willing to pay — minimum wage only. That $54.80 begins to put food on the table or a roof over their head. There is no tidy little nest egg for them to fall back on. There is no emergency cash to be had.

The bad boss has already demonstrated that he does not care about the Employment Standards Act by flagrantly ignoring it, so why not fire the bad employee who reported him too? They always have a justifiable reason to get rid of this employee who may have just cost them some of their profit, and with the job market the way it is the employer has no problem filling the vacant spot. Forward with production; on and onwards with profitable deceptions. After all, what have they got to lose?

I perceive the government as being not unlike parents with two children, the workers and the corporate structure. It seems as if the parents are neglecting, abandoning one of the children, the workers, while spoiling the already greedy child. The neglected ones will start to show signs of this abandonment as time progresses, and the effects of these pieces of all this bad legislation or neglectful parenting will come into play.

Ms McKenzie: The Employment Standards Act provides us with minimum wages and conditions of employment. It's our position at the London Regional Advocates Group that Bill 49 erodes the fundamental foundations of these rights of all workers in this province, at least those few currently covered.

One aspect is to reduce the amount of time a worker can file to six months. Mr Stilson will be addressing that. The other is the ministry's abdication of the responsibility of enforcement. The Ministry of Labour is not currently known for its proactive approach either in enforcing the law or in encouraging compliance. The historical response has been to deal with individual complaints on a case-by-case basis. The result has been slow-moving and considered relatively unresponsive.

Rather than grabbing the bull by the horns and dealing with the problems of investigation, compliance and enforcement, Bill 49 recommends abdicating that legal responsibility for enforcement and hiding the problems under a rug. I'd suggest that rug is one woven from regression and privatization. It might be housekeeping, but dirt pushed under the rug doesn't make for a clean house. It always returns and has to be dealt with again.

Since 1995, ministry by ministry, the provincial government has reiterated its position that it only makes the laws, it is not in the enforcement business. I'd ask the committee to consider a comparison between the Employment Standards Act and Highway 401. The laws of the province regulate the speed limit on the 401 to 100 kilometres. Enforcement comes from the police, and they use a variety of methods including, in the past, the controversial photo-radar, found to be highly effective. There is also controversy right now as to whether to increase that speed limit. It's well known and accepted that a vast number of drivers on the 401 reduce their speed to the legal limit when enforcement is there. It's also accepted that when enforcement is inadequate or completely absent, compliance with that maximum 100-kilometre limit diminishes and the average speed easily goes from 100 kilometres to 110 or 120. Without compliance and enforcement on the lanes of the 401, it becomes dangerous at the best of times and at other times life-threatening.

The same can be said of the workplaces in Ontario. They can bear a striking resemblance to the 401. Some employers adhere to the speed limit and travel consistently and steadily in the right-hand lane. Other employers travel without regard or concern for the welfare of others. They speed recklessly through in the passing lane at dangerous rates. An example would be our past-year documented instances when trucking companies disregarded the basic fundamental rules of the road with faulty brakes or tires. These have resulted in lost lives. Had the government or the public called for less enforcement of the rules of the road? No. Cries from the public, and indeed from the government itself, have been for tighter and stricter enforcement of these regulations.

The workers of this province expect no less than the drivers of this province: minimum reasonable standards and standards which are applicable to all across the board; standards legislated, then enforced, by those responsible for the standards. The government has available to it recommendations that would increase and ensure better compliance. One recommendation would be content changes to make the Employment Standards Act more effective. Have all parts of the ESA apply to all workers in the provincial jurisdiction, as opposed to excluding various categories from minimum wage, another list for public holidays, another for hours of work. Apply the law to everyone and let everyone know it. There would be a lot fewer violations of the act.

There are other administrative changes that would make the ESA more effective and efficient. They would be better use of the resources of the ministry and ensure that complaints dealing with both workers and employers would be speedily resolved. They would be spot audits of employers' books with an investigation of all individual complaints, leading to full investigations if any additional violations are found; proactive education and investigation procedures; heavy penalties for employers who do not pay out orders within short or fixed times; mandatory posting of the act in all workplaces, as it is with the Workers' Compensation Act and Occupational Health and Safety Act; shorter time limits on ministry investigations; and education about the Employment Standards Act in all materials and forums for new companies incorporating in Ontario.

Should the provincial government choose to continue with what it is referring to as housekeeping changes, we have one more change that would be in keeping with that, and that would be the suggestion that the Minister of Labour change her title to that of Minister of Corporations.

Mr Frank Stilson: I come here not to speak for myself but to speak for two workers who were killed in London less than four blocks from this room. They are Brad Olson, age 23, and Louis Dupont, age 27. My message goes out to the members of this committee, the Premier of Ontario, the employment standards policymakers, lawyers — all the people who had a hand in this situation in London. I think there is responsibility directed towards those people.

I talk in terms of hours of work. I spent four days at this inquest with the parents of these two people. His mother, on one of the four days, accounted the hours of work of Brad Olson, and I'll summarize those. He worked from January 1995 until May 15, the day of his death. The total number of days is 126; he worked 122 days. During the month of January, he started on January 9 and worked 21 days, 12 hours a day; he had one day off. In February, he had one day off. So in January and February he worked 44 days without a day off. In March he had one day off and in April he had one day off. In May, he had one day off.

During the proceedings of the inquest the company did not dispute that. The company did not dispute that it did not have a permit for excessive hours over eight hours in a day or 44 in a week. No orders, no charges were laid against this company, right from the top legal people who decide on these issues down to the inspectors who were not responding to anything. The other issue was a health and safety concern. There was no confined-space training. No charges were laid.

This case was brought up on CBC, and the person responsible for laying charges said they would not be laid. To this day, we still do not know why charges were not laid. The death of two people, not injury but deaths, and no charges laid. People are still scratching their heads, "Why did this happen?" when the company admitted it had no permit, it violated the Occupational Health and Safety Act and the Employment Standards Act.

This government wants to lessen those employment standards when under the existing ones people are being killed — not gipped out of money, not fired for no reason, but killed — because of the lack of enforcement from the employment standards branch right from the top down to the inspectors. Now, there are good inspectors and there are bad inspectors, but in this case the inspectors just gather the information; it's up to the policy people, the legal people to decide.

What message does this give to employers in this province? That they can kill two people and nothing, no consequence. Kill somebody on Highway 401 and there are consequences. It should be the same. I encourage this committee to ensure standards are enforced and that they are not lessened in any way, or more deaths in this city and in this province will happen.

Mr Hoy: Thank you very much for your presentation, all three sections of it. You seem to be referring to different aspects of this law and other laws. Your analogy with the 401 enforcement is one that all should take note of. However, I would mention that it seems, particularly in the rural areas, I'm hearing that policing is not what it was at one time either. Break-and-enter cases are not investigated. People are told to simply call their insurance company, which costs workers and others more money in terms of premiums and perhaps lack of coverage if they were to have more incidents than one, two or three. There seems to be a downloading of responsibilities by this government to other areas, other aspects of our society. But I appreciate the comments that you made in total.

Mr Christopherson: I also want to thank you for your presentation. I'd like to ask your thoughts as they relate to the most vulnerable in the workplace. I want to keep coming back to that often, because I think that's the crux of this as a recognition that the people who rely on this law the most are the ones that already have the least, the least power, the least access to the levers of power, in our society. The government continues to maintain that the changes they're making are not going to lessen the rights that the most vulnerable have.

In light of the fact that 90% of all the claims are made after people leave the employment of an employer they believe has violated their rights, and given the fact that they will not be allowed now to go back beyond six months, what do you think the circumstances are that employees are facing? What is the world that they're facing on the job that would support the claim that this law leaves those people vulnerable to, first of all, initial action by employers, but also retaliation, regardless of the fact there are laws there that say they shouldn't; the fact that people feel they're vulnerable and they can't afford to take on the boss and they have to make a choice between their rights and their job? Can you give me your experience in this area with vulnerable workers.

Mr Stilson: I think I hear every day that people have to put their jobs on the line. Either they don't enforce health and safety standards or employment standards; they say, "Well, I can't push that, because I'll lose my job." What this legislation or these proposals would do is give a message to employers that they can get away with more, more murder, more killing in the workplace if they were lessened, if they were left to the workplace parties. A lot of people that I see, and these two people that I just mentioned, did not belong to a union. So I think it's going to just lessen the rights and give a message to employers that they can get away with it under the old Employment Standards Act, get away with murder; they're going to get away with it even more and say: "Ah, great, we don't have to do anything now. We don't have to get a permit." That's the message that is given to employers today.

Mr O'Toole: Thank you for your presentation. In all sincerity, Frank, your comments with regard to the untimely and unfortunate deaths of Brad Olson and Louis Dupont, it's regrettable and it proves in very large measure that the standard enforced at that time — if I understand, the time was January to May 1995?

Mr Stilson: It was May 1995, the deaths.

Mr O'Toole: I would guess that the Employment Standards Act that was in place at that time, being administered by the then government under Mr Christopherson, was not working. They had every duty and responsibility, as we do, to make the proper amendments. Do you agree that there should be some changes to the current standards with respect to not lessening those standards?

Mr Stilson: Certainly I think there should be changes to the standards. But you could have the best standards in the world, but if you have policy people at the top saying on CBC TV that there are going to be no charges laid, then those people should be questioned. The law should definitely be changed, but those people should be questioned or removed from office. Clearly, at the inquest, two lives were taken, the company admitted that they had no permit, that they broke the law, and still nothing happened.

Mr O'Toole: On the 100-kilometres-per-hour comparison, I think there's an excellent analogy there, that people have a responsibility to obey the law. I think that's really all we're trying to do.

The Chair: Thank you, all three of you, for taking the time to come in and make your presentations before us here today.

SUSAN SMITH

The Chair: Our next presenter is Ms Susan Smith. Would you come forward, please. I understand Ms Smith may be making some comments or all of her comments in French, and I remind the committee that's to be found on channel 2, canal 2.

Ms Susan Smith: Not all comments in French, but some of them.

The Chair: Good afternoon, and just a reminder that we have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between a presentation time and question-and-answer period.

M^{me} Smith : Je remercie le greffier du comité propre pour cette opportunité de faire une présentation. Ceci est un autre exemple d'un nom de projet de loi qui ne répond à peu près pas du tout à ce qui se passe dans le projet de loi. Il n'y a qu'une seule amélioration dans ce projet de loi. Je vais passer très peu de temps là-dessus et je vais passer le reste du temps à critiquer ce qui manque là-dessus.

There is one minor positive amendment in this bill; only one. The amendments to seniority and service during pregnancy and parental leave ensure that all employees are credited with benefits and seniority while on such leaves. It's very significant to not see these terms as periods of unemployment; they are terms of leave.

With the passage of this particular amendment, the length of an employee's time on leave will be included in calculating length of employment, length of service or seniority for the purposes of determining rights under a collective agreement or a contract of employment. And the passage of these amendments into legislation would take precedence over contractual language, whether or not the contract refers to active employment. You could do it by regulation instead of waiting for a lengthy period of time.

I'll speak at the very end to the chronology of this bill.

There are substantive parts in this bill that represent the nadir of what you could be doing as legislators, the absolute depths to which you could plumb your efforts in terms of respect for the citizens of the province.

It's my understanding that Pat — I think her name is Ms Daley or Ms Coursey — was the last ADM in charge of employment standards, for maintaining employment standards in this government. I'm certainly not familiar with any critique of members of the current government, whether as candidates or as incumbents, that you rose to the occasion to challenge that. It falls within the context of what the government has already done.

Other changes include Bill 7, which is to segregate full- and part-time workers from the same collective bargaining units.

You have a discussion paper on rent increases related to extraordinary operating costs that are not capped, including "utilities." But, of course, you realize Ontario Hydro and London Hydro rates have been frozen.

You've also passed Bill 20 and made changes to the Development Charges Act by regulation, ministerial regulation, whereby charges are now frozen. So with still funding water surcharges, for instance, in this community are still funding new industries, small or large, and even the local development charges monitoring committee regularly acknowledges that where the costs are borne they're borne by users of services, who are residential services.

There's a very high number of renters in this community. There's also a high number of people making very close to minimum wage. It's not a low number of people in this particular urban community.

One of the things that you neglect to do in a so-called improvement of employment standards is you don't remove the freeze that dates all the way back to January 1995 on the minimum wage. If you were looking for fiscal targets or valued savings and linkages, the only thing I could tie it to is a political promise of a stupid tax cut.

I'm sure business would generally approve of a continued freeze, but I don't feel that's your responsibility as a committee on resources development, human resources development for this province.

This community is also affected to a great extent by the health care industry. As there have been recent announcements about the changes to health care and change of delivery, certainly people in the field of home care are not as well protected as they need to be by the current minimum employment standards. And I would suggest some of the limitation periods certainly don't address concerns of a large number of workers in this community.

One of the things that you don't have in this bill is an increase in the number of paid holidays for the province, and that really puzzles me. It seems to me that's one of the obvious places to improve employment standards. I don't think there are too many people who wouldn't think an additional day off is needed in the months of November, possibly January and February. You should be adding at least three public holidays to the Employment Standards Act. It's long overdue.

Other people have mentioned the young men who were killed on the job here in London in May 1995. It was very distressing to sit through the coroner's inquest and hear a manager with the employment standards branch seemingly quite unable to answer the most basic question about enforcement.

I appreciate that it's a priority of the government currently to do a lot of political spinning to get your message out, so in terms of doing more for less, the Ministry of Labour has a desire to do a great number of things less, certainly less things. Asking workplace parties to become more self-reliant in achieving standards; if you're going to do that, then why aren't you raising penalties, implementing real penalties and raising penalties, for non-compliance so that there's an impediment? The ministry will divest itself of services and programs that do not support its refocused core businesses. Maybe you should be going to the public to prove where you already haven't done that.

Finally, I will comment on chronology and timing. You have felt the need to go to the public with this bill, but frankly, it was because you were forced to by the NDP caucus. But you know, it only took you three days to pass the bill that's numbered one before this, Bill 48. And I appreciate Rob Sampson's payoff was a ministerial portfolio, minister for privatization. The amendments that he read in to the exemptions include — I'll just point out that's another misnamed bill, of course. It eliminates the tax-free allowance.

It's really interesting that a provincial Legislature presumes to redraft federal tax legislation. Rob Sampson's language, which has been taped, which he read in as the amendment to the bill, includes an exemption for an allowance for any other purpose. Presumably that would include extraordinary expenses incurred if there were another legal strike impeding legislators' entrance to the Ontario Legislature. That's an example of an allowance for any other purpose, which now is treated as an income-tax-free allowance used by members of the Legislature. It took three days to pass it.

Of course, one of the government colleagues who had dwelt in that not-quite-purgatory of enjoying preferential income-tax-free treatment of political pay from 1979 to 1993 and only paid regular income tax on his income in 1994, it appeared Mr Vankoughnet had that money burning a hole in his pocket, literally days and hours after Bill 48 was passed, read three times and proclaimed into law by the Lieutenant Governor in less than three days. Think you could do the same in terms of regulatory changes for the one minor improvement that's been made to leave for parental and pregnancy purposes?

I'd like you to actually do some work on the bill on employment standards and improve them.

The Chair: That allows us about two and a half minutes per caucus and we'll commence this time with the third party.

Mrs Marion Boyd (London Centre): Thank you very much for your presentation. I gather that what really irks you most about this particular bill is how it sits in context with other pieces of legislation that the government has passed and that basically what you're trying to do is alert people to the fact that this is a piece of a whole sort of plan which in fact goes through and takes away rights of workers and takes away the rights of individuals in many different ways. You've given us some examples of that.

I was a little surprised that you didn't talk a bit more about Bill 7 in this context, because obviously it was the first bill that really said this is a government that is going to take away the rights that workers have had and is determined to rewrite the balance between employers and employees. The government keeps claiming they're restoring that balance so that it's there, and those who oppose this kind of action say that what has happened is a disruption of this balance.

I gather what you're saying in your discussion of this is that this is just another piece of a larger puzzle which shifts that balance more and more in favour of the employer and puts employees in a much more vulnerable position.

Ms Smith: It does very much so. Bill 7 was passed on Halloween — "Boo." What's wrong with you people? Bill 7 as a context, as a set piece for what falls in place with Bill 26 — again, the misnaming of this bill as an improvement to employment standards is an insult to anybody who was educated in the public education system in this province. It's definitely part of a set piece: the changes to workers' compensation that are proposed, the notion of no stress-related injury in the workplace. The reality that a minimum employment standard touches a human being's life in Ontario is something that ought to be awfully seriously contemplated, and then get to work and do your job.

Interjection.

Ms Smith: It is. We're waiting for more.

Mr Baird: Thank you very much for your presentation. You mentioned minimum wage. What amount would you like to see the minimum wage at?

Ms Smith: If you did it by regulation quite quickly I'd be looking for a figure around, say, $9.75 an hour minimum just to get everybody over the — phased, a short period of time; first change.

Mr Baird: I should say that during the election campaign we indicated that we would freeze the minimum wage. Like it or dislike it, it was certainly up front. It didn't come as a surprise. Do you know what the minimum wage is in comparable jurisdictions, our neighbours: Quebec, Manitoba, Michigan, New York?

Ms Smith: Yes, I do. There is a context, of course. When you look at American jurisdictions you'd look at the dollar, you'd look at the political situation in terms of electoral change. You'd have to keep in mind the woefully inadequate federal minimum wage and the way that that's structured. Certainly with the devolution, or Mr Harris out in Jasper asking for certain areas of jurisdiction, it's pretty frightening.

Manitoba for over a decade, for over a dozen years, has had a minimum 40-hour workweek and an eight-hour day in its employment standards that are rigorously enforced. They've had that for I believe well over 12 years. I believe it's lower in Quebec currently, and they've had a utility cost freeze as well. Among a number of things to be factored in and looked at that are in the purview of the provincial government, you would want to look at those issues.

Mr Baird: I certainly can't think of anyplace within 4,000 kilometres of here where the minimum wage is higher.

Ms Smith: Nor mutual fund investments.

Mr Baird: Some have said they would be happy to see the minimum wage increased, in your case to $9 or $9.80 an hour, even if that meant some people would lose their jobs. If that were the case, would you still support the minimum wage increasing?

Ms Smith: Mr Baird, it's really interesting that you would raise the context of people losing their jobs. I can sit here as someone in my community who's really cognizant of, not so much in my own case, many other people whose work, unremunerated, is a substantial contribution to the economy, to the welfare of the community, to every aspect that touches the communities we live in, their viability, economic viability, livability, quality of life, resources development. If you put your mind in the context of what this committee can stand for in terms of resources development, I really think you would want to contemplate that there is all kinds of work done without remuneration in our communities. It may involve a bit of gender analysis, to be sure, but there's lots of work.

Mr Baird: What about the question, though? I'm very interested to know: If it meant that fewer people would be employed but making, let's say, a 50% higher wage, would that be acceptable?

Ms Smith: I don't accept your premise or analysis at all. I think it's deeply flawed.

Mr Baird: Do you have any economists who could indicate that this wouldn't be the case? I can't think of one.

Ms Smith: Let me point out that if I were going to write a theoretical paper on the privatization of universities, departments of economics would be the first part the private sector could pay for, not the public. I don't need an economist.

Mr Hoy: Thank you very much for your presentation this afternoon. I think that if the committee has economists coming forth, we'll ask them those hard questions, should they be here.

I appreciate very much what you've said today. We seem to have centred around the minimum wage discussion. I want to let you know that 30% of the people in my riding make under $30,000 a year, so it's a very significant portion of the population of the riding of Essex-Kent. As well, I think that many people have come here and are fearful of a reduction in the minimum wage, let alone an increase happening. They're more concerned about possible reductions under this act and they've indicated clearly that the minimum wage provides people in Ontario with a quality of life which is very important to all of us. I think that's a concern of yours, particularly in the earlier part of your presentation.

We must be cognizant that the rich, yes indeed, can afford certain changes that this government is proposing, but I submit that the 30% of my riding is not interested in quick action by the government without any voice on their behalf. I appreciate people like yourself and others who have come in the last four days to speak up on behalf of those persons.

Ms Smith: May I respond very briefly? Mr Hoy, I'm surprised that's the statistic. I would have thought there would be a number somewhat higher than 30% in your riding whose incomes are under $30,000 a year. I think that may be the case, and certainly the notion of a lowering of minimum employment standards, including the minimum wage — first of all, before you ever contemplate that even by regulation which, I suppose, all other things seeming to be equal and recreational drugs not being involved, it's possible that this government would contemplate doing that. But there would be enough people who read the Globe and Mail who would look for a companion piece of legislation showing a dramatic reduction in direct indemnity, sessional indemnity, for the members.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Smith. We appreciate your coming before us here this afternoon.

LAZARUS COMMUNITY ACTION COALITION

The Chair: The next presentation will be from the Lazarus Community Action Coalition. Good afternoon.

Ms Jacqueline Thompson: Hi. My name is Jacqueline Thompson. I'm a member of the Lazarus Community Action Coalition and am on the steering committee of the provincial coalition as well as the Ontario Social Safety Network.

"Some persons of a desponding spirit are in great concern about that vast number of poor people who are aged, diseased or maimed, and I have been desired to employ my thoughts, what course may be taken to ease the nation of so grievous an encumbrance. But I am not in the least pain upon that matter, because it is very well known that they are every day dying and rotting by cold and famine, and filth and vermin, as fast as can be reasonably expected. And as to the younger labourers, they are now in almost as hopeful a condition. They cannot get work, and consequently pine away for want of nourishment to a degree that if at any time they are accidentally hired to common labour, they have not the strength to perform it, and thus the country and themselves are happily delivered from the evils to come." That's a quote from Jonathan Swift in 1729 from A Modest Proposal.

The Lazarus Community Action Coalition urges this standing committee to recommend against the proposed changes in the Employment Standards Act. The proposals of the present provincial government under Bill 49 require serious critique, consideration, alterations and clear evaluation criteria before they even begin to meet the reform promises as outlined by the minister and the Premier.

The Lazarus Community Action Coalition requested time to present to the committee today because we care about the people who live here. We care about the quality of life and the working conditions and standards in this province we call home. We are concerned not just for ourselves but also for the future and the conditions of the province we will some day leave behind for our children and our neighbours' children. We believe that as citizens we have a collective responsibility to our community and that the government is intended to protect and uphold the interests and values of the people who live here.

One advantage of being situated in a global economy which is often overlooked in favour of focusing only on the global market is that there are numerous successful examples of leadership and decision-making in the contemporary world beyond the less-than-successful neighbours to the south of our borders. In the global picture, these government proposals undermine our economy, our integrity, our principles and the social responsibility to our citizens. On a local level, as citizens and taxpayers we're appalled and outraged by the implicit and explicit erosion of work standards and the impact these will have on the communities where we live, work and raise our families.

While there are numerous concerns with the proposed changes, as well as sensible alternatives, time restraints force these to be presented only in written submissions. However, the dismantling and proposed privatization of the collection function of the Ministry of Labour's employment practices branch speaks very clearly about where this government plans to invest our tax dollars. They propose to forgo investing in our communities in favour of seeking only to generate profits for private businesses and private interests. This specific amendment, like the others proposed in Bill 49, can be evaluated on the basis of factual information, economic analysis and social responsibility.

Beginning with the promotional rhetoric, the provincial government offers only factual misinformation. They promised to "focus on the resolution of claims by contracting out the time-consuming and expensive process of collecting money owed to employees by employers." This rhetoric presents the problem as issues of fiscal responsibility and accountability to the vulnerable employees.

Another implied benefit perpetuated by this rhetoric that is unsubstantiated by the ministry's own facts is the myth that a great number of collections are made by the ministry. In fact, the collection department was closed in 1993 and collection duties were reassigned to the employment standards officers. The Ontario Ministry of Labour employment practices branch annual reports from 1985-86 through to 1995-96 show that over the last three years, $280,271,306, more than 79% in assessments against employers, remains uncollected by the ministry.

Furthermore, according to the Ministry of Labour expenditure reduction strategy 1996-98, the ministry intends to further reduce these positions from 150 personnel to 104. Almost one third of the entire remaining department will no longer be available to process claims for vulnerable workers in our province.

One more missing fact is the actual number of claims the ministry promises to focus on resolving. Routine investigations to determine violations have drastically declined from 1,304 in 1980-81 to a mere 21 investigations in 1994-95. The reduced number of employment standards officers ensures that this situation will worsen.

The facts indicate that this system is not working for the benefit of vulnerable workers, and the proposed changes that we see before us today will further reduce the ability to do so. An example in our own community that this failure to protect workers by enforcing and collecting claim assessments of the Employment Standards act has a detrimental effect: In 1989 the Magna corporation closed its Webster's manufacturing plant in London. Webster's and its parent company left workers without the severance and vacation pay dollars they were legally entitled to receive. This left workers in our community without adequate resources to provide for the basic needs of their families. While some of the dollars owed were made available to workers through the publicly funded employee wage protection program, additional publicly funded income assistance programs were required to meet the basic needs of these families.

Tax dollars were utilized as a business loan to Magna Corp, a loan that incurs no interest and has no guarantee of repayment. Indeed, the only monetary cost to Magna for assuming use of our tax dollars is up to 10% of the assessment or a $100 administration fee. The loss of these dollars from our community also impacts on local businesses that would have provided services and basic necessities to these families. The hardship created for the families has never been assessed or compensated.

This example leads us to question the economic analysis that presumes shifting responsibility to the private sector will save taxpayers' money. Such a presumption can only be reached by glossing over or simply ignoring the impact analysis as direct savings in one department are subsequently downloaded into other jurisdictions. Closing the collections branch saved the province the wages and administration of one department; however, it directly impacted the number of investigations employment standards officers were able to conduct. This, in turn, reduced the number of potential collections.

Another option that was and is still available is to increase the number of routine investigations and improve the collections of assessments against employers in violation of the law. This would have created more jobs and, hence, a larger tax revenue base.

Secondly, procedures to enforce the Employment Standards Act are currently available under the act. The provincial government can now file certificates of the orders issued against the employers in court. The penalties assessed against employers, even at the $100 minimum per claim over the past three years, will earn revenues of least $4,718,200. The maximum revenues, using the 10% administrative fee, will potentially amount to $20,827,130 for the same time period.

Additionally, when the publicly funded employee wage protection program covers the amounts owing to employees, it should not only be repaid directly by the delinquent employers, it should be treated as an investment of taxpayers' dollars as a business loan that incurs and compounds interest for the duration of the time it remains unpaid. In addition, employers who violate the legislation should be required to pay for the cost of collecting the money owed, over and above the minimal administrative fees.

Not only would the investigations and collections branches become mutually self-sustaining but the enforcement of reasonable sanctions would act as a deterrent and disincentive to further violations by employers and, subsequently, cut through years of accumulated red tape.

These are options that are both fiscally responsible and accountable to vulnerable employees. The folks in this community are aware that there truly is a mechanism available to focus on the resolution of claims, a procedure that is neither time-consuming nor expensive. Common sense is completely lacking in the proposed amendments, which leads us to the third set of criteria against which they should be measured.

Social responsibility: This is perhaps the area of the most reprehensible shortcomings of the proposed amendments. Time restraints force us to limit consideration to one area; however, I am confident that you now have in hand detailed documentation outlining the punitive nature of the other amendments.

Contracting out collections of assessment entitlement to private collection agencies will create the necessity of numerous solutions to deal with a whole new set of difficulties for the vulnerable in our community.

First, private collection agencies exist to generate profits, not to recoup the money employees are legally entitled to receive. The proposed amendments to the act automatically reduce the potential assessment by up to 75% of what the employee is rightfully entitled to receive. In addition to providing additional interest-free business loans to employers, workers are effectively losing 25% of their wage entitlement. This reduction is particularly devastating for unorganized workers who work in low-paid sectors or occupations such as food processing, foodservice, cleaning, telemarketing, domestic workers and homemakers. Many of these workers are women.

Secondly, to date, the Employment Standards Act has ensured conditions and terms of employment that are not subject to negotiations or disputes, including minimum wage levels, overtime pay, paid vacations, severance pay etc. While not particularly abundant, these basic standards maintained an equal playing field upon which employers can compete. Under the proposed amendments, the provincial government is interfering with the free market. As responsible employers who value the tax revenues of high employment in our community and the business it generates locally, we are appalled by the government sanctions to remove the equal standards currently in place.

Finally, the money generated by employment to access basic necessities is reduced under these amendments and must be subsequently replaced by public dollars to care for the needs in our community. The workers have earned their money and they should not be expected, required or coerced to accept anything less. We find it appalling that you would further suggest that low-income workers must rely on the publicly funded court system to access the money that rightfully belongs to them. Not only is the overburdened court system funded by our tax dollars, justice is virtually inaccessible to those who cannot afford legal representation. In addition, we are well aware of the problems created by the interlinking and overlapping barriers that impact differentially on the poor and the vulnerable within our community.

One example is many citizens carry debts which they pay off slowly over the time when they're working. When employers withhold money that rightfully belongs to the employees, it places the workers in jeopardy of losing their credit standing and of being pursued by the same collection agencies to pay off their debts in full immediately. Thus, collection agencies will recoup the total of all outstanding debts as soon as there is any money to claim. In situations where employees cannot access money owed to them, they are effectively forced to rely on income assistance programs to get by. Furthermore, the Ministry of Community and Social Services will also recoup in full all money provided to the family during the time the income should have been available. Because the collection agency has the power to recover all outstanding debts first, the family may be charged huge overpayments by the Ministry of Community and Social Services. This ministry will deem the income received, regardless of the fact the recipient had no access to or control of the claims processed by the collection agency.

There are numerous similar considerations that have not been taken into account in designing these amendments. Indeed, Gerry Coffin for All Canada Collect pointed out this morning that the proposed amendments were not well planned or researched and create conflicts and violations between acts in regard to the legislation governing the collection agencies.

This proposed bill does not protect vulnerable workers; it increases their hardship. This bill does not save taxpayers money; it saves businesses money and threatens to further reduce Ontario's tax revenue base, simply by reducing the potential taxable income of workers. It would be wise to consider facts in the future, such as the fact that corporate taxes only contribute 8% of the total tax revenues. It is hardly fiscally responsible to propose amendments that remove all hope of eliminating some of the deficit and, further, seek to cast the working standards into a status comparable to that of developing nations around the world.

In closing, I would like to remind you that this is the United Nations International Year for the Eradication of Poverty. If nothing more, it should serve to remind you that there are places in the world where minimum employment standards do not exist, where corporations produce goods for great profits in the global market, where folks sell their organs and their daughters to feed their families. The profits generated in these free zones provide what could loosely be defined as jobs and the profits are sucked out of the communities where they were generated. They do not make the communities a better place to live. They do not provide an adequate standard of living for the residents there. In fact, the presence of the profit generators ensures painful deaths and moral degradation.

If that is truly the vision this government has for our province and our people, then why bother putting us through this exercise of consultation? Why not simply abolish all standards today? After all, would it not be more profitable to have children producing goods locally, rather than having to import them all the way from Honduran sweat shops?

The Chair: Thank you. That allows us one minute per caucus for questioning. We'll start with the government.

Mr Tascona: Thank you very much for your presentation. I'm interested, with respect to page 9 of your brief, in your comments on the role that collection agencies play in collecting debts. You seem to be suggesting that the collection agencies have been very efficient in collecting debts involving the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Ms Thompson: No, currently — and this is one of the reasons why this stuff needs to be looked at and researched — debts that are owing to collection agencies are protected under the legislation. They can't take Ministry of Community and Social Services dollars and apply them to debts because they are only for the basic needs of families. Under this legislation, that protection is gone and the families don't get that money to survive and live on. They may go months with no income whatsoever under this legislation. You need to look at that change really carefully before you touch it.

Mr Tascona: We're not looking at that change. You're commenting on the role of collection agencies and you made comments about them. It would appear that they do a fairly efficient job in what they do.

Ms Thompson: So could the ministry if it would do the work.

Mr Tascona: The ministry did do it and it was disbanded in 1993 by the NDP. They laid off 12 employees, effectively terminated them, and we don't do it any more.

Ms Thompson: You're going to lay off one third more employees, according to your strategy. What you need to do is hire one third more and start processing those claims.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon. On page 7 you say, "Contracting out collections of assessment entitlements to private collection agencies" — and I won't read the rest of it. It seems to me that what we could have in the future if we go the private collecting route is that like cases could be treated very differently from one to the other. One person, under the proposal that the government's put forward, might get 82% of what they were entitled to. Someone with exactly the same case or circumstances might only get 75%. That in itself I think is worrisome. I appreciate your brief this afternoon very much.

There was another group that made a comment that the Ministry of Community and Social Services may be ready to assure that people on workfare will be protected and will be watching over the employment standards —

Ms Thompson: They've already lost all their rights.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. I'd like to just pick up on one sentence in particular, on page 10 at the top, when you said, "In closing, I would like to remind you that this is the United Nations International Year for the Eradication of Poverty." The last presenter talked about this issue in the context of an overall Tory agenda that outright hurts the most vulnerable and the weakest in our society.

We know that the 22% cut in the income of the poorest of the poor in Ontario, the reductions in education transfer payments, the benefit cuts that are coming to WCB disabled workers, and now we've got this bill of rights for workers under attack — in the context of what the United Nations says, and I'm sure the government has mouthed the words somewhere by one of their ministers about how much they care about this, what is your sense of where we're going to be by the time the mandate of this government ends up in terms of the standard of living of the poorest of the poor and the working poor and the most vulnerable in our society, including this bill?

Ms Thompson: It's clear that they're moving towards a vision of the free zones where the corporate profits are all that matter. The communities where they're generated don't matter whatsoever. The profits leave the communities. The Lazarus Community Action Coalition believes in community and one of the things that we're doing in partnership with organizations around the province through the Ontario social safety network is monitoring the effects on communities of changes such as we're seeing put forward on the table to take to the United Nations. Canada is up for review, specifically since the elimination of CAP and putting in place measures such as workfare. We will be drawing attention globally to the situation that this government is carrying on in this province.

Mr Christopherson: Very good.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before us here today. We appreciate you taking the time.

CHATHAM AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: That leads us to the Chatham and District Labour Council. We have 20 minutes for you to divide as you see fit.

Mr Buddy Kitchen: Okay. Thanks a lot. As an introduction, the Chatham and District Labour Council welcomes the opportunity to appear before this committee and to address our concerns regarding the Employment Standards Improvement Act, Bill 49. It must be stated at the outset that we believe our concerns about Bill 49 to be serious. The fact that we travelled 130 miles for a 20-minute presentation indicates our desire to be heard. I'd like to also say I'm very glad to see a couple of local politicians here, as opposed to talking to people I don't really know.

The Chatham and District Labour Council is the central labour body for private and public sector unions in the Kent county area. We represent 25 different unions and upwards of 11,000 members from a broad range of services and industries. These include truck manufacturing, auto parts suppliers, hospital and retail sectors, food processing, telecommunications and government services.

On May 13, 1996, when Labour Minister Witmer introduced Bill 49 amendments, she claimed they were only housekeeping changes to the Employment Standards Act. It is our view that what was presented as minor amendments contain substantive changes, changes which clearly benefit employers and diminish access to justice for both organized and unorganized workers.

The proposed changes will make it easier for employers to escape penalty where they violate basic standards and harder for the average working person in Ontario to enforce his or her rights. These amendments strip unionized workers of the basic standards they have built on under Ontario law for decades. Instead, under Bill 49 these basic standards will become additional items to be negotiated at the bargaining table.

We understand, according to a London Free Press article of August 20, 1996, the minister has now temporarily withdrawn a section of the bill centring around flexible standards, which is section 3 of the bill. This will not stop us from commenting on this section.

Although we appreciate the fact that this most controversial amendment will come under closer scrutiny through a comprehensive review of the act, it is our view the reason behind the withdrawal of this section is directly related to two very significant and public events, those being the Ontario Federation of Labour's bad boss hotline and the employment standards violations at the Screaming Tale restaurants in Belleville and Port Hope.

The OFL bad boss hotline was set up in early August as a toll-free line to allow workers to call in if they were experiencing problems at work, and it has generated more public attention and media scrutiny than this government wishes it would. At a time when this government wants to relax employment standards and enforcement, the hotline is receiving over 100 calls per day regarding violations. Calls include tales of employers not paying wages owed, not granting due vacation or statutory holidays, forcing employees to work beyond legislative limits. Other calls include complaints of firing without cause and harassment.

Realizing that this government has laid off a large number of employment standards officers, some employers have resorted to obscene tactics. As this government is shirking its responsibility in protecting vulnerable people in the workplace, the case of the Screaming Tale Restaurant came to light. In this case, the employer refused to pay servers in his establishment the minimum wage required by law. Instead, he said they were volunteer servers and were working for tips only. The official response to these complaints by the ministry was that it would take at least one to two months for the ministry to look into this matter. Complaints of this nature could be handled much faster if the Ministry of Labour would hire back the hundreds of employment standards officers laid off since last year.

The very nature of these violations is the core of the amendments this government would like to introduce. Witness the way employers comply with these present burdensome regulations now.

These are both classic examples of what happens when the provincial government puts blind faith in the goodwill of employers to provide a decent and fair workplace. What you get are bad bosses. These same employers are becoming accustomed to getting anything they want from this government and are feeling untouchable in this deregulated Ontario. They are abusing and exploiting their employees more than ever.

Failing repeal of this entire bill, largely because of the support given by the business community, I urge the minister to at least rename this bill and call it what it actually is, an Employer's Standard Act. As you heard this morning, it would be administered by the Minister of Corporations.

It is our opinion that any amendment to the Employment Standards Act has to recognize the enormous imbalance of power that exists between employers and employees. Accepting this, it then has to be recognized that individual employees, and in particular non-unionized employees, are in an unequal bargaining position in relation to their employers.

Employment standards then must concern the protection of workers. To that end, the Employment Standards Act and any changes must and should continue to institute uniform, fair and reasonable minimum standards to protect the interests of workers who are in an unequal bargaining position in relation to their employer.

The Chatham and District Labour Council sees no way employment standards in Ontario pose a barrier to profitability, competitiveness and economic growth. What they can do is add a degree of stability to local economies by guaranteeing minimum standards in local employment.

This government claims the objective of Bill 49 is to simplify and streamline the enforcement and administration of the Employment Standards Act. It has already been pointed out that there is no problem in doing either now; it's just not being done.

I'd like to talk about some sections of the bill. With regard to the one pertaining to the flexible standards, realizing this is a section which has been withdrawn for future consideration, I would still like to comment. As it stands, this section allows the workplace parties to contract out minimum standards if the total package under the agreement, "assessed together," confers greater rights than the Employment Standards Act. Workplace parties are being asked to compare and value together non-monetary rights such as hours of work with monetary rights such as overtime pay, contingent rights such as severance pay, and mixed rights, which would include such things as vacation and statutory holidays. This is like comparing apples and oranges.

This amendment will make negotiated settlements much harder to achieve and destroys the intent of workers having the benefit of a complete and coherent set of workplace standards governing important aspects of their working conditions. I'll tell you right now, living in Kent county, they just settled one strike in Wallaceburg and there's another one in Tilbury right now. It's just proving to me it's harder and harder to get a collective agreement nowadays without having to go through negotiating what are considered to be basic standards now.

Enforcement for non-unionized employees: These amendments would download responsibility for the enforcement of minimum standards for non-unionized workers to the individual workers themselves, if they choose the courts to recoup what is rightfully owing them. This is time-consuming and costly. They can, however, choose the employment standards branch through a complaint, but are restricted to collect only $10,000 regardless of what is owing. They have a short, two-week window to decide if they would like to continue under the act or withdraw and pursue a civil remedy. They lose recourse if they do not obtain the necessary legal advice by deadline. For an employee, this amendment is both restrictive and punitive. It does not serve the cause of basic justice in the workplace.

Maximum claims: As stated above, $10,000 is the proposed maximum amount an employee may recover by filing a complaint under the act. The problem is that workers are often owed more than this. Workers who are owed this amount would probably not have the financial means to pursue this through the courts and are being forced to accept less than what they are owed. This could encourage the worst employers — and there are some of them out there — to violate the most basic standard and profit from it.

The minister will now have the right to set a minimum amount for a claim through regulation. Workers who make a claim below the minimum, which is as yet unknown, will be denied the right to file a complaint or have an investigation. Imagine if the taxpayers of this province asked for the right not to pay their taxes if they were below a certain dollar figure and they got to choose that dollar figure.

Use of private collectors: This amendment will give private collectors the power to collect amounts owing under the act. It is ironic to think the government's solution to its own inability to collect moneys owed because it didn't enforce the act to begin with is to absolve itself of the responsibility and farm the problem to a collection agency. Tom Sawyer could take a lesson in whitewashing here.

Private collectors may be authorized to charge fees. No doubt, these will be passed on so that the individual who receives the money will be getting less than they are owed. Working people need the current system of public enforcement maintained and improved.

Limitation periods: I include this if only to show the hypocrisy of these amendments. Bill 49 changes a number of time periods in the act. The major change is that employees will be entitled to back pay for a period of only six months from the date the complaint was filed, instead of the previous two years. In contrast, the ministry still has two years from the date the complaint is filed to conduct its investigation and a further two years to get the employer to pay moneys owing. In other words, an employee having made a complaint under the act could wait up to four years before receiving only six months' back pay, not the previous two-year amount. Keep in mind that this could be reduced, depending on the amount the private collector collects minus the user fees.

In conclusion, as our comments on some amendments to Bill 49 and our comments addressed in our introduction indicate, no one concerned with basic minimum standards in terms of employment could possibly favour these amendments. Bill 49 is not about the protection of the interests of workers and it does not attempt to remedy the imbalance of power that exists between employer and employee.

As for the unorganized, Bill 49 is about the race to the bottom. It is about this government's effort to strip what little protection they have under the law away from them. It is about this government's openly aligning itself with the employers and the employer associations of this province, yet telling workers it is acting on their behalf. This is unacceptable.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for being here today. I recognize the exact route you probably travelled to get here, very much so, and have always appreciated your attendance at any of the public forums I might have in the riding.

You talked a bit about the bad boss hotline. I assume the answer will be yes, but you say there are 100 calls a day coming in. Is it the OFL's intention to catalogue what type of infractions or complaints are coming in and then eventually make them public, and more particularly to the government?

Mr Kitchen: Actually, they are trying to do that now, but when they set it up they didn't anticipate the number of calls they are getting now and they don't necessarily have the capability at this time. I phoned the OFL for the statistics on Monday. They say that 100 calls a day is a factual number. This highlights some of the things they receive.

Some of the other things they talked about were violations of minimum wage. Let's say, for instance, the minimum wage was $1, and for eight hours they would pay them $8. But really, particularly for young kids, to earn their $8 they are having to work 10 hours to get it. On paper they're putting down that they are paying out the minimum wage when in reality they are not.

It's not just the OFL. Our labour council gets an awful lot of phone calls, particularly at this time of year, from people asking if there's anything we can do for them because of employment standards violations. A lot have to do with students and so on, particularly with seasonal work and what could be considered summer employment. So we get a lot of phone calls above and beyond this hotline itself.

Mr Hoy: We've also had submissions — and I think you're touching on it when you talk about unorganized labour — that it's a fact that there is a vast percentage of people who currently are unemployed, so the employment market is very good from the employer's standpoint. He has many people to choose from. People are willing to maybe look away from some of these infractions because they desperately need a job. The government has said that it was going to create 725,000 jobs over its mandate. Clearly that figure of almost three quarters of a million jobs would help to improve things vastly. What's your opinion on the government's performance to date in creating these 725,000 jobs?

Mr Kitchen: In Chatham, I'm represented by two different levels of government, provincial and federal, and both of them campaigned on a job creation program. There has been a supposed increase in jobs, and they're a new kind of jobs; they're called net jobs. I don't know really what those are, but both levels of government are taking credit for those, so these 35,000 new net jobs that have been produced in Ontario, is that 17,000 for the provincial and 18,000 for the feds, or are they both claiming the 35,000? I really don't know.

I don't see the jobs. The place I work at, we're into a massive layoff. A few years ago we hired 1,000 people. That was good for the statistics, but now they just laid off 1,200. With that there's the ripple effect through the community also. I don't see it. I have a 21-year-old daughter who has been essentially looking for full-time employment for over two years now and can't find it, so what she's doing is like many students are doing: going back to school.

Mr Christopherson: Buddy, thanks very much for your presentation. Good to see you again.

On page 7, I believe, you talk about the issue of a new minimum amount, a threshold that a worker has to cross in terms of money they're owed before the ministry will respond. In fact, in some documents it's been referred to as preventing nuisance claims, which is of course quite troublesome for those of us who consider every dollar a worker is owed to be a dollar they're entitled to. It's not anybody's nuisance; it's their money and they're bloody well owed it.

I'd like to ask you two questions. One is, given the fact that the government is giving itself the right to set that minimum by regulation, which means in the cabinet room, not on the floor of the Legislature, and one decision of cabinet can move it, do you, on behalf of the people you represent, have a real concern that the long-term plan of this government is to slowly, when no one's watching, move that dollar figure up further and further so that workers lose more and more money that they're entitled to because it falls into that "nuisance" category?

Secondly, in the real world out there that workers face, especially those not covered by a collective agreement, do you see the possibility that if you've got a bad boss — and that's what we're talking about here, the bad boss — who is violating the laws anyway, can you see some of them actually sitting down and calculating: "Okay, the minimum is $100 a year. That means I can go after $50 or $75 per employee every six months and they can't touch me"? Do you see that as realistic or is that just a lot of rhetoric?

Could you comment on those two things?

Mr Kitchen: No, I see that as very realistic.

Let me start off by saying I don't like things being done by regulation in the back room. I'm an open and honest person and anything I say will be open and honest and subject to debate, and I'll accept that fact. But the fact of the matter is, to do something by regulation in the back room which affects people and will impact their lifestyle, I don't like that way that government can be done. Yes, I can see that being done, and the impact of it being done that way really penalizes the person being owed.

Again, let's make reference to the concept of tax-paying. If I owe the government some money, they damn well expect me to pay it. They're not going to let me pay a minimum amount. I think they do have the freedom of a dollar or so, that you don't have to pay anything less than a dollar, but if I owe them money, everything they have coming, they expect. I think that should be the way for employees also. With a minimum wage that has been frozen now — and people will argue it's not at a livable, decent rate — people who are owed money, had they had to work at a minimum wage rate, yes, every dollar matters and probably every quarter matters in that instance.

I'm trying to think of the second question. Yes, there are bad bosses out there, there's no doubt about it, and I think I gave examples here of what bosses, if left to their druthers, would do. They're violating the existing standards, let alone watered-down standards, now. I think the reason they're doing that is because they understand that employment standards officers have been laid off and there's a possibility that they can get away with it. If they can do it at tougher standards, what are they going to do at lower standards under the same situation? I'm not by any means saying that all employers are bad, but there are bad employers out there.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. Sorry to cut you off, but we're going over on each answer here.

Mr Kitchen: That's fine. I'm used to that.

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton North): Thank you very much for your presentation. Your comments on collections, particularly on summer employment and students, interested me. Ten years or maybe 12 years ago I went through that process with my son, who had been stung with unpaid wages on his last week of employment, cutting grass during the summer. We were able to recapture the funds through the employment standards officer.

I guess in the debate we've been having for the last number of days, we keep hearing this term "bad bosses." We heard it yesterday in Kitchener and in Hamilton and in Toronto as well. I don't think anyone in government or out of government, in previous governments or in current governments, will support bad bosses. Certainly the chamber of commerce I think was asked that question in Kitchener or Hamilton and indicated they didn't represent bad bosses.

Mr Kitchener: Then we don't represent bad employees.

Mr Chudleigh: Exactly. I don't think any legitimate organization represents bad employees either.

What the problem gets down to is identifying what a bad boss is, what a bad employee is, and not only identifying them but putting it in words in legislation that has teeth. That's a very, very difficult process.

We've been through the area of trying to collect money through the government in two or three different ways, and none of them seemed to have worked very well. We have never used the system of using professionals to collect it, collection agencies, which is proposed in this piece of legislation, and we are hopeful this will improve the situation in that area.

But in the area of identifying bad bosses, is there anything that you can help us with? What kinds of criteria do you look at? If you were out looking for a job and you if you did have the opportunity of two jobs, what would the criteria be to identify a good boss or a bad boss?

Mr Kitchener: Well, some of it could be reputation. A large turnover of employees could be indicative.

You're saying you're having a hard time collecting money. Just to get back to it, because I don't want to lose this thought, it seems to me this government has introduced — I don't know whether it's legislation, regulation or they're just at least talking about it — about recouping money from "deadbeat dads." This is a new thing. It was for a long, long time thought that they couldn't recoup this money, but now this government has found a way of recouping this money.

Mr Chudleigh: Not yet. We're trying.

Mr Kitchener: Yes, but I mean —

Mr Chudleigh: We're trying to do it through the income tax.

Mr Kitchener: Maybe we could do the same thing with moneys owed to employees from —

Mrs Boyd: Their driver's licence.

Mr Kitchener: Yes, take their driver's licence away, or maybe put their picture up at the post office or something along that line.

In one sector of the government you're saying government will recoup this money that's owed, yet in another sector you're saying you can't do it so we want to privatize it. To me that doesn't make sense. You've addressed essentially the same kind of issue in a different ministry, so why not try it here?

The concept of bad bosses might even go beyond dollars and cents. Some of it is you're trying to recognize scruples and morals possibly. We could have got into the same debate when anti-scab legislation was repealed, and I would have argued to you at that time that a reputable employer would not bring in scabs. I would say the same thing: A reputable employer, a reputable boss, would not purposely go out to screw his employees. But the fact of the matter is, there are some out there who are doing it.

You were saying about your son, your child who couldn't recoup their summer wages. I got a call last summer — and this happened to deal with this college painting, where they go around. It was extremely hard for us to do it. Despite the fact that we didn't have to, we tried to help this individual. Many times the community that they do the work in, the employer is in a different one. I don't know if you know where Chatham is, but when you come from Chatham —

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, sir.

Mr Kitchener: — and you find out that it's in Mississauga, that's big-town Ontario compared to us and we get lost in it.

The Vice-Chair: I'm sorry to interrupt. We are about five minutes over now in the whole presentation.

Mr Kitchener: Are we? I was having a lot of fun.

The Vice-Chair: We do appreciate your sharing your thoughts with us today. Thank you very much.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO AREA COUNCIL

The Vice-Chair: Could we have the United Steelworkers of America, southwestern Ontario area council, come forward. I'd ask you please, for the sake of Hansard, to introduce yourself to everybody present.

Mr Terry Coleman: Can I just start by saying that I'm slightly hearing-impaired and I'm having a little trouble. I don't know if it's the acoustics in the room. I'd ask anybody that addresses me to speak slowly and clearly, please. And I didn't hear what you said right now.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. I said welcome to the proceedings and would you please introduce yourself to the committee here as well as for the sake of Hansard.

Mr Coleman: My name is Terry Coleman. I'm here representing the southwestern Ontario Steelworkers area council. I want to start out by thanking the resources development committee, on behalf of our 3,500 members, for this opportunity to air our views on Bill 49. We administer 46 collective agreements in almost every sector of the economy in the southwest area.

It is with great trepidation that I come before you confronted with a piece of legislation authored by a government in a modern democracy that would call Bill 49 "An Act to improve the Employment Standards Act." The minister introduced this bill as housekeeping, and yet the potential impact of this bill is so far-reaching that shock waves were felt immediately throughout the province. How could a Minister of Labour, whose duty it is in cabinet to defend workers, be so out of touch with workers' needs?

Section 1, enforcement of the ESA — or not: Under a collective agreement, in section 20 of the bill, new section 64.5 of the act, the Employment Standards Act can now be considered to be part of that collective agreement. It will then be the union's duty to investigate and enforce the Employment Standards Act through the grievance and arbitration procedures.

This change speaks quite clearly of privatizing enforcement of a public act. We need an open and public debate to see if the people of Ontario want or need their laws administered by a private body with no recourse to investigate, settle or determine claims. The union will not have access to an employment standards officer's report, personnel and employment records, setting the stage for abuse and obstruction by corporate counsel and ultimately ensuring that justice is not served. Considering the costs and liability involved to a small local union for supplying both fair representation and arbitrators' fees, it is out of reach to furnish this service.

If you will recall from my introduction, the southwestern Ontario Steelworkers area council services 3,500 members and administers 46 collective agreements. That means the average unit size is 76 members. A unit of 76 members simply does not have the resources to police the Employment Standards Act. Do we then pretend there's nothing wrong and not proceed? Who is served by this change?

We are of the opinion that privatizing enforcement is folly. In fact, knowing the conditions of employment today, enforcement needs to be given more muscle.

Section 2, enforcement for non-unionized employees — or not: This is speaking to sections 19 and 20 of the bill, section 32 and section 21. Taken together, these provisions are an unprecedented attack on people least able to defend themselves.

Firstly, they bar civil remedies for an employee to pursue both an employment standards complaint and civil action. Our council finds it ironic and inconsistent that in the field of auto insurance the government would allow new forms of litigation, but in the employee/employer relationship that same government would move to stop civil proceedings.

In any event, litigation is not a real alternative to working people. It is resource-consuming, both time and money, which many people simply don't have. This gets us back to an employment standards action which in lots of cases, although expeditious and inexpensive, is now faced with an unrealistic time limit to decide — two weeks — a cap of six months from the time of the claim for moneys owed, a maximum recovery of $10,000, and an as yet undisclosed minimum.

Why does an employer need this kind of power over an employee? The Steelworkers area council feels these provisions are patently unfair and need to be scrapped.

Section 3, private collection agencies — or not: Section 28 of the bill, new section 73 of the act, speaks of a major departure in the field of labour relations. No longer is the employee/employer relationship seen as a special relationship, but instead treated as an ordinary activity of commerce.

This is shown clearly in the provisions of this bill as regard collection agencies recovering moneys owed to employees. At the present time, a serious problem with the act is the failure to enforce, and collections fall into this category. We feel it is fundamentally wrong to absolve the government of the responsibility to enforce the act. If the collection agency can only recover a partial settlement, that agency can take a recovery fee for its services, a user fee, to supply a poor settlement. This type of provision will likely lead to smaller settlements and open the door to abuse. Collectors will pressure employees to take smaller settlements, providing a break to the employer, and the fee will be collected from the employee, probably the least able to pay.

Unscrupulous employers will find their liability lowered, and thus encouraged to continue their violation of minimum standards. This particular provision is a working model of the race-to-the-bottom mentality of today's business community, and so it must be rejected outright. Our council feels that, as in other areas we have commented on, it is only prudent to enforce this important area of collections more vigorously through public enforcement officers.

Section 4, last-minute changes or not (minimum standards): I appreciate the fact that flexible minimum standards have been removed from Bill 49. I also understand that this concept is to be revisited in the near future. Therefore, I feel obligated to comment on this issue. The government takes the position that as a society we no longer desire or need minimum standards in the key areas of the employee-employer relationship.

The Employment Standards Act is about our society's minimum acceptable workplace rules. What has changed to cause these standards to become irrelevant? Is it that all employers have learned a new benevolence that they couldn't find under force of law? We don't think so. We at the Steelworkers area council are of the belief that the government, at the behest of business, has decided to abdicate its responsibility to the least fortunate in our society while business reaps the rewards.

The idea that minimum standards of hours of work, overtime pay and severance pay must confer greater rights than those set out in the act when assessed together is unworkable. This becomes an unruly mess when one tries to assess together purely monetary rights (overtime pay and severance), non-monetary rights (hours of work) and mixed rights (vacation pay and public holidays).

The Steelworkers have many agreements with amiable employers in this province that allow for ongoing negotiations during the life of a collective agreement to allow flexibility, as long as minimum standards are met. I fear for those relationships if basic standards are removed. Allowing employers to table what were once minimum standards while negotiating will certainly serve to frustrate in many cases an already difficult situation, we believe to the point of causing unnecessary labour disputes. This of course flies in the face of the goals of the act and does not reflect a commonsense approach.

It is the opinion of the Steelworkers area council that not only do minimum standards have to be retained; they must be improved if we are to build a better society. We ask that flexible standards not be brought back in the comprehensive review of the act.

Some minor positive changes: Vacation entitlement of two weeks per year accrues whether or not the employment was active, codifying pre-existing jurisprudence of referees. Termination pay is now due seven days after termination (section 5 of the bill). The calculation of service and length of employment will explicitly include time on parental and pregnancy leave, again codifying pre-existing jurisprudence. Although these are positive, we question the impact if enforcement is reduced.

Conclusion: We are very strongly opposed to the changes proposed in Bill 49. We fear for the employees of unscrupulous employers, both organized and unorganized. For many, it will mean undermining an already precarious existence. A modern, democratic society cannot afford to wash its hands of these people in the manner prescribed in Bill 49. Enforcement of the Employment Standards Act must not be left to the vagaries of the private sector. We feel that private collection agencies, along with the monetary cap and severe time restraints, serve only the employer's bottom line and the government's wish to withdraw from the solemn duty of protecting its citizens.

For these reasons, the southwestern Ontario Steelworkers area council asks that this bill be withdrawn from the legislative agenda.

The Vice-Chair: We have two and a half minutes per caucus, starting with the government side.

Mr Shea: May I ask you to turn to page 2 of your submission and ask if you could give me a brief elaboration on your comment, "enforcement needs to be given more muscle." Can we pursue that for a moment? Perhaps give me some illustrations that you think would be helpful.

Mr Coleman: To be quite frank with you, I think this body in front of me here is represented by all three parties. I've been around in the workplace for 25 years, so every party here has had a crack at being government, and quite frankly, you're all guilty of not protecting the unorganized in particular.

There are home workers, there are — I can certainly remember all through my career in the workplace. I've had seven jobs in 25 years, three non-unionized and four unionized. I have seen every kind of violation, and I'll tell you right now, in an unorganized workplace you have almost no rights. You can be paid below minimum wage. Quite frankly, every law can be broken, because you have no recourse, if you want to keep working.

Mr Shea: You put your finger on an issue that I know is of real concern to the minister. You have talked about home work, and that's a growing issue. As you may know, the recent city of Toronto planning statistics say one in five people is now working out of their home. That's a real concern reflecting a need to update the Employment Standards Act, so I'm concerned at how you perceive the enforcement being extended into that kind of a setting. I'd like your thoughts on that. How do you do that effectively?

Mr Coleman: Quite frankly, I'm unprepared to answer that. I've looked at it, and I'm quite convinced that what's going on here — I can't tell you what's going to happen any more than you can in the comprehensive review, but the changes here are certainly not doing anything to help it that I can see.

Mr Shea: Like you, I am as frustrated by the shortness of time to pursue questioning, but unfortunately, that's the rule of the committee. Let me very quickly ask you —

The Vice-Chair: Mr Shea, you just —

Mr Shea: See what I mean?

The Vice-Chair: Sorry about that.

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Prescott and Russell): Terry, were you satisfied with the actual Employment Standards Act?

Mr Coleman: With which one?

Mr Lalonde: The one we have in place at the present time.

Mr Coleman: No.

Mr Lalonde: I believe that the government has decided to let go 45 enforcement officers, but probably instead of letting them go, they should make sure they have proper training and make sure that what was in place was enforced. From what we have seen, and we were told ever since we started the hearings, people seem to be mostly in favour of what was in place, but it seemed to be that the enforcement officers were not properly trained to make sure that they followed the procedures. That is one of them.

The other one, the fact that we are going to go to privatize the collection, one part that I'm not too happy about is the user fee. I really believe at this point that the fact that the employer is entitled to be charged — or we will be able to claim up to $10,000, and he knows the fact that we are going to a collection agency. He knows he has to pay, and he's going to drag it as long as possible to make sure that this employee doesn't get the full amount. He will be guaranteed 75%. That is the part that I'm really concerned about. The employer will be mad that we had lodged a complaint and he knows that he has to pay, but he's going to drag it as long as possible to make sure that the employee only gets a part of what is coming back to him. Do you feel that the fact that we are going to privatize, there's a danger at that point?

Mr Coleman: From looking at what I can tell of how this would work in practice, I can almost guarantee you that — you know, I realize collections aren't what they could be right now, but of the ones that are done, they're going to get less now, I think, from the feel I get, from the look of this.

Mr Lalonde: So all the user fees should be charged to the employer, if it is up to $10,000 plus the amount that the collection agency should be getting from the employer?

Mr Coleman: Well, yes. I realize there's probably an ideological difference here in what's going on. As far as privatizing or not, which I use quite a bit in here, it's then kind of flying in the face of doing business in its most economical form. Do we accept a certain tax level in order to have a fair playing field for all, not only employees but employers? Having them pay more on top of that, if it's a good employer, a mistake was made or whatever, they will pay, plus they will pay on top of that.

Mrs Boyd: Terry, thank you for your presentation. I know you're with an international union and that your union represents people all over North America, so you're familiar with the issues that are there in right-towork states. Although the members of the government are talking very much in terms of being concerned about employees, the reality is the overwhelming thrust of their legislation throughout their term in office so far has been to level the playing field down to the lowest common denominator, which is in fact what they believe is necessary in order to maintain competition. Do you see this kind of action against our minimum standards as really the first step, the thin edge of the wedge, in driving down employment standards and driving down protection for workers so that in fact that lowest common denominator will be closer at hand?

Mr Coleman: Actually, I think I mentioned it in the brief that it was part of the race to the bottom that labour has been talking about for a long time that really came about through the various free trade deals. It is all one big agenda, from my point of view, most certainly.

Mrs Boyd: I would certainly agree with you. I think this is just one little piece in that larger picture of how to in fact increase more and more power for employers, to enable them to call the shots, so they can show that they are able to attract the large profits that are going to impress international corporations. We've certainly seen that in negotiating over a number of years. I know your union has been in a position where in order to maintain jobs at all you have had to make some concessions and that is why the whole issue around minimum standards, that, granted, has been withdrawn for the time being, is really the heart of this change, isn't it, because it can force unions as well as the unorganized into agreeing to that erosion of standards that eventually leads to the lowest common denominator.

Mr Coleman: I've kind of come up with a novel concept lately. Quite seriously, I don't know that labour ever saw a problem with the idea of increased or freer international trade and the old theory of the level playing field, but does there not need to be then a level playing field in labour? We're all saying yes, but are we going to come up or are we going to go down?

Mrs Boyd: The last thing is on the collection issue.

The Vice-Chair: I'm sorry, we've now exceeded the time. Thank you very much for your presentation this afternoon.

Mr Shea: On a point of order, Chair: I want to make a point, just to make sure we're very clear, unless there's something I don't understand, that in fact employers do in fact pay levies.

But I want to make sure in the minutes — we received on our desk a moment ago a letter that is signed by a deputant who appeared just a few minutes ago, indicating in response to a question that, in her opinion, the minimum wage ought to be $9.80 per hour. I have received on my desk, and I assume other members have as well, her attempt to correct the record. She wishes that to show $19.80 per hour as the minimum wage. I want to make sure that is in the record. My record shows that this would then raise the Ontario minimum wage to $41,184 a year, plus the ancillaries above that. I think that should be on the record.

The Vice-Chair: I will accept this as a new submission to the committee to be filed. Thank you very much for bringing it to our attention.

MICHAEL KLUG

DONNA HOGG

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that Michael Klug and Donna Hogg come forward, please.

Mr Michael Klug: Thank you. My name is Michael Klug and I'm a lawyer who acts for employees and trade unions here in the London area. I'm here today because I'm concerned about the effect Bill 49 will have on our clients and other workers throughout Ontario and on trade unions in general.

Simply put, Bill 49 is a malicious piece of legislation and I say "malicious" for a reason. It's not just the unintended consequences of this act that are bad; it's what the actual intent of the legislation is. I defy anybody to look at this piece of legislation and come to any other conclusion but that the intent of the legislation is to take money from the most vulnerable workers in this province and put it in the hands of the worst bosses, the cheats and the con artists who are the worst employers in this province. You've taken the most reputable bosses and the most desperate employees and you've shifted the power balance radically in favour of the bosses. That's wrong.

I'm not going to spend my time today giving a clause-by-clause critique of this legislation. That's been done by the Ontario Federation of Labour employment standard working group. They've done their job well and I support their conclusions.

I wish to grant the majority of my time to Ms Donna Hogg, whose daughter and some of her co-workers are clients of mine currently. I do this with the hope that in listening to Ms Hogg's story and the story of what her son and daughter have been through, you realize that this legislative gamesmanship you engage in has real effects on real people and that it causes pain to people and that you have to justify what you do under that standard. Why are we doing this to people?

Ms Hogg phoned my office a couple of months ago. She was in a state of great distress and asked me quite simply, "Is there anything that can be done or are we wasting our time with this?" The problems Ms Hogg's daughter had at work are simple. She'd been working since September 1995 without getting paid. She'd been working long hours. Ms Hogg will tell the story. I would ask you to listen to that and to consider in particular how Bill 49 will affect people in Ms Hogg's situation. Without further ado, I turn my remaining time over to Ms Hogg. 1500

Ms Donna Hogg: Good afternoon. Basically, last September 8, my daughter and son, who worked for a local landscape company, and two other employees were offered a deal from the owner, that if they worked from September till April with no pay he would turn over the company to them. They had worked there a total of about 17 to 18 years, my son working there for seven years, my daughter two years and the two other employees three and five years. They had no reason not to believe the owner. He had owned the company for 10 years, he'd always paid them, not holidays or anything, but he'd always paid them. They had no reason not to believe him. In any case, he laid them off September 8. They worked between 12 and 15 hours a day, seven days a week, until Christmas. They did snowplowing over the winter. This was building up to a future. They had Christmas Day off. But they did do litter runs, they went to the university and did ice runs, things like that, they fixed the equipment, for the whole winter. In February and March, they went out and did sales for this company. They got several sales, good sales. Besides, they still did the snowplowing, sometimes as much as 30 to 40 hours a night and then came home and started all over again. They never had a weekend off, never, since that time, right up until June 28.

In any case, when April came, after they had worked these long hours, basically without pay — and we had hardship; we really did. We were terribly in debt. No one could help us. We're each of us about $15,000 in debt, and that's at very low money; at times we didn't have money and had to go to the food bank. We're a middle-class family. We have never been on social assistance or anything.

In any case, to get that part done, my daughter-in-law is 39 years old. She had lost her job in Ottawa, at Revenue Canada, a changeover in staff — it was a subcontract for them — and she'd been there 17 years. She came down here and started out landscaping at that age, but she enjoyed it. Then, within two years, to have a chance to own a company was great.

He said he didn't care how they got through the winter as long as they got through it. In April, they were still snow shovelling, snowplowing — long hours. They asked him when it was going to be signed. He said, "We'll wait till the end of April, because you do all April's work." They still had no signed agreement or anything. He said it was against the law. Since that time I found out it wasn't, but he said it was against the law.

In any case, in May they started doing landscaping. There were four of them doing 75 contracts. They worked from 5 o'clock in the morning. I never saw them before 10, 11, sometimes 2 o'clock in the morning. They would work all day. This is seven days a week. They had one day off in May.

They believed this person when he talked to them. None of them had any kind of business experience. They were labourers. They had no idea. He said, "We bill them at the end of April, and then the money comes in the end of May" — and blah, blah, blah — "Just hold on; it'll turn out okay."

In the meantime, these people were killing themselves. They would come home, sleep for two hours, get up and go out. There was no break. They asked him for more help. He said, "No, it'll come out of your money." But they weren't getting any money. They got $286 twice in May and two $100 cheques in June. Out of that money, my son paid $270 for gas for the truck, and he's never been reimbursed. One of the other lads paid $162 out of his money — they have all the receipts still — for gas. The trucks were brand-new trucks, bought last year. They have bald tires. They have 70,000 miles on the trucks. They have no rear lights. They were stopped by the police and the Ministry of Transportation because a trailer didn't have the right licence on it. He was fined $105. This has gone on and on.

In June they still had not received — except for that $286 twice and $100 each. They're thinking that this is the Canadian dream, they're going to own this company; they are still believing in this person. Like I said, he is reputable. He has a 10-year company, actually 13, but 10 years where he has done reputable work. My son has worked there for him for seven years.

But during April when they went there, he said, "There's no money for you," slammed the door, "Don't come over to my house." You know what I mean? "You are this. You are wussies. What's the matter?" He's sitting at home; they're working between 100 and 120 hours a week, for nothing. Of course, they couldn't do quality work. What person who has three hours' sleep a night can work those hours? From May 1 until June 28 they had one Sunday off, and they were working 100 to 120 hours a week. They didn't know what to do, because he told them it was illegal, right, and until he signed the papers over to them they would have to follow his rules, so they listened to him. In the meantime, I'm harping on.

On June 28, something happened to one of the tractors. Now, none of the equipment was up to par. They had to sharpen their own blades. One night at 11:30, one of the guys was sharpening the blades in the dark in the shop and got a piece of steel in his eye. He left it in his eye and went home because he was so tired. The next day he had to go to the hospital. He worked all day his fingers holding open his eye because they couldn't get behind schedule. He went to the hospital and he was warned, "Do not tell them you were at work when you did it." So he didn't.

My son had a hydraulic line stick in his finger. He had to go to the hospital. He had to tell them he wasn't working. They cut his finger up. He had surgery to stitch it up because it was very poisonous. These people worked with no unemployment, no nothing, for 10 months.

On June 28, after they were asking questions — they were getting to be really militant about it. They said, "We're supposed to get a pay at this time. Come on, we're supposed to get a pay at this time." We did go and see a lawyer in May who didn't help us at all. He just told us that he didn't know what he could do. So in June, after this kept carrying on, they flatly refused to work.

We're in such debt — we owe two months' rent on our house; our phone was going to be cut off; our hydro was going to be cut off — because we were supposed to get paid in April. In June, we were supposed to get — and I phoned him and I said: "Listen, you have to help us some way. I'm going to be evicted from my house." He said on the 24th, which was a week later, he would have the money for me. I phoned him on the 24th and he told me, "You and your family are at the least of my list right now." This was June 24. So what happened? I borrowed the money off someone else. But we're in debt. We have nowhere to turn. My children have started working now for a new company.

Anyway, on June 28, one of the tractors broke. He said it was demolished. It was $3,000. They said, "Well, we're so tired." Like, when they staged a work refusal not to work for one day and he promised them the world, they slept the whole time because they were exhausted. They were young, though, so their bodies are pretty resilient. Anyway, on June 28 they broke the tractor. They went there and saw him. He screamed and yelled and punched the truck. This is not normal for him, but he has been like this for the last year, or the last six months, I would say. Anyway, he left. He came back on Tuesday after going away for the weekend, but they worked. He told them what to do with the other tractor. He came back on the Tuesday, wrote out a letter and said that the company has ceased operations.

I tried every member of Parliament, every bank, everywhere to try and get money so that I could get these contracts so that my kids could start a business, but we had no money for a year. Where am I going to get money in two days? That was it; they were out of work. There was no money. There was no nothing. There was no proof. There was nothing. So my daughter went around to some of the contracts and spoke to the people. They said, "We won't pay them," or, "We'll try and hold your money." But this has gone on for almost two months now. We don't know if they're still holding the money. He offered them nothing. He offered my daughter $5,000 and the other guys maybe $200; there was no set amount.
